LETTER FROM PRESIDENT SWAIN.

Now that Conference has come and gone let each of us take inventory of stock. We have something in us and about us which we brought over from the Conference year just closed. We also left a part of ourselves in that which we did during the past. We are not quite satisfied with the work we did last year. Possibly at the time we thought we were doing the best we could, but taking a retrospective view of the things we did and general surrounding of the situation, we readily see how we might have done better. Possibly there is not one honest man, woman or child who is perfectly satisfied with what has been done. How then shall we hope to be satisfied with what others have done affecting us? Under the circumstances what shall we do? Sit down and whine, morosely refuse to take any active part in the battle yet to be fought, peevishly decline to accept the joys and blessings that come to us out of the past and foolishly close our hearts to the sunshine and joys that come us as the result of some one's sacrifice and toil?

To do so will be both a grave injustice to ourselves as well as painful ingratitude to others, Possibly every preacher is not entirely satisfied with the charge to which he has been assigned. Possibly every charge is imperfectly satisfied with the preacher assigned to it. If so, to be sure, it is nothing unusual, but can not be justified on the ground that such is common. Now assuming that either the pastor or people or both are not pleased, what is the most sensible thing to do? I am quite sure if we lay our prejudice and conceit aside and think prayerfully over the whole situation we will all arrive at practically the same conclusion.

If one has a poor field, it is folly to sit on a stump and complain. This will never increase the fertility of the field nor the happiness of the one complaining. The stones will remain on the ground, the briars and weeds will take the field and the poor disconted complainer drive all the sweetness out of his own life. Suppose one has a horse that is somewhat inferior. Does it increase the usefulness of the horse to neglect and abuse it? An ordinary "plug" can be made a fairly good work animal by proper handling and feeding. Is there no lesson here for those who are inclined to neglect the preacher simply because some other preacher was preferred? It is so very easy for unguarded human nature to find fault with others. It is another thing, and quite a different task, to get rid of ouro wn faults. However, the last mentioned is by far the most profitable if not so easy to do. We want to make this the best year yet. Let the pastors go at the work as if there were sixty days till Conference and let the people pay and pray as if they had but a few weeks in which to work, and I am quite certain we shall have the most glorious year of all our history.

W. E. Swain.

THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Report of Committee on Ways and Means.

We, your Committee on Ways and Means, beg to say that we have recommended different plans at different times, and finding that the brethren have their different plans and times for collections, we therefore recommend the prosecution of such plans on the different fields as are the most effective in teaching the people liberality and also teaching them the importance of supporting the different causes to which we are asked to pay.

We recommend that the assessments be as follows:

President's salary	$1,200
Church Extension	3,274
Foreign Missions	2,080
Home Missions	2,000
Superannuates	750
Ministerial Education	446

THE OBER-AMMERGAU PASSION PLAY.

By Rev. J. J. Summerbell, D. D.

The following is not an essay on the celebrated "Passion Play" of Ober-Ammergau, Bavaria, of the peasants of that village, who picture in a theatrical, or dramatic manner, every tenth year the sufferings and death of the Savior; but is a passage from a public address delivered by request at Dayton, Ohio. by me concerning my late European trip; and in this address the Oberammergau subject was only introduced because of its relation to the spirit and tone of the party surroundng me on my journey. The tone of the Ober-ammergau show was so subversive of the spirit of the Berlin Congress, that I should copy the whole as delivered, believing it would be more beneficial to young ministers than a description of the show, of which you have had a better account than I can give:

Although the meeting at Berlin was called in the name of religion, and the official title of the gathering was, "The World's Congress of Free Christianity and Religious Progress, 1910," much of the time there was little religion about it, as I understand Christianity. Sometimes the Berlin Congress did not seem to me to be even religious from any point of view. I do not know of any Christianity without Christ. I do not know of any salvation without a Savior. In the speeches much effort was made to separate us from Jesus as the Christ; and to put him on the level of Mohammed and Buddha. Much effort was made to show that each great country, or race of the world, had the religion best adapted to its need and capacity.

This was very repellant to me: for its logic would justify even the suppression, in the beginning of his work, of the very prophet that established the religion said to be the best for a race; such as Mohammedanism, or Buddhism. And it would turn the world over to its prevailing moral condition in any district, at any time. There could be no bettering of the morals of heathen lands; there could be no preaching of the gospel on the frontiers in our own country; there could be no converting of the sinners in the slums of our great cities. I would leave man everywhere to be the prey of his own appetites and passions, or the victim of stronger men of animal desires. There could be no salvation: for the argument would leave mankind everywhere in its prevailing condition, as the one best fitted for it.

This one element in the Congress really argued against the elevation of mankind any where, and would leave man everywhere in beastly depravity.

This spirit was evident from the speech of one man, who argued, if I understood him, that even an atheist might have a religious spirit: for his opposition to God might merely be to the God of a given revelation; and a man called an atheist might have a different god, the god of his own consciousness. But I know of no such god. The logic was only meant to get rid of the God of our revelation: the God of justice, mercy, and spiritual law; the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ who demands self-denial and service. Those men were unwilling to obey. They wanted to rule. But their desire to rule was not based on self-discipline; it was not based on ability to rule themselves, either physically, or spiritually. They could not control their own desires; but they wished to overthrow the government of Jesus, who does enable men to rule themselves. They virtually crowned Jesus again with thorns, vacating his kingship of any real power.

They talked pompously of "religious progress". But the spiritual goal toward which they pointed, was that of the dog, or monkey; without a Christ, without a Bible.

That I am correct in my representation of the spiritual tone of the assembly is probable, from the lack of self denial in the banquets; where beer and wine were more valued, apparently, than bread and water. At some of the banquets, our hosts, in their great and generous hospitality, furnished us with beer and wine coupons, attached to our admisson tickets: for many of our party desired these drinks.

(Here, in my address, I referred to the gradual weakening of the physical strength of some of our party in our travels, who indulged in drink, and the better endurance of those who were strictly temperate; also, related an incident suggesting that the temperance conduct of the delegates of the Christians really did not cost them the respect of any persons worth considering.)

The tone of our party of "Liberals" was largely favorable to (moderate) drinking, dancing, card-playing, and similar practices.

Some of the party were inclined at times to ridicule the sign of the cross and the "holy water" we found in the cathedrals. And they would swell with expanded vanity when explaining their own freedom from the delusions of the New Testament.

And yet these people were far more superstitious than I was. They seemed to believe the uncorroborated tales of ignorant guides about the show places of Europe with a trustful credulity that was amusingly pitiful; and yet they could not believe the thrilling and ennobling New Testament account of the resurrection of Jesus, for the truth of which many early Christian witnesses gave up all that the world values.

For instance:—At the Church of San Marco, at Venice, I happened to be standing at a certain moment where I could see the faces of many of our "Liberals." The Roman Catholic guide was describing the features of the remarkable church; and, pointing out four great columns of stone, he informed us that they had come from the tomb of Solomon at Jerusalem. On not a single "Liberal" face did I see a sign of amusement at the ridiculous statement; not a sneer of unbelief. But there they stood with open mouths drinking down the interesting assertion, that had not any real evidence to support it, and was contradicted by all probabilities of history. They seemed to forget that Solomon's temple at Jerusalem was destroyed many centuries before Herod's temple was built there; that Herod's temple was thoroughly destroyed half a thousand years before Venice became a Christian settlement; and that the temple of Herod was destroyed nearly a thousand years before the San Marco Church was begun. They seemed to forget that there were no documents; that there was no succession of anicent traditions; that there were no possible witnesses attesting the silly story. They seemed to stand there in rapt wonder and reverence, swallowing a modern fiction, that gave no glory to God, that did no good to man, and could only be, if true, an unimportant peculiarity of the Church of San Marco. But if I had told them that God had fulfilled prophecy, in sending his Son into the world, they would have sneered in "Liberal" superiority; although the mission of Jesus convulsed an antagonistic race that survives to this day; although it turned cities upside down in the very heart of civilization; although it was attested by multitudes of martyrs, captured an opposing empire, was confirmed by carefully preserved documents and corroborating circumstances; and worthy of the power of God, in winning sinners to righteousness; and has often turned cannibals into Christians, and savages into saints.

But in these cathedrals there was sometimes something of far greater value to the worshiper than the criticisms of the self-styled "advanced" thinkers of Berlin. In St. Peter's, at Rome, while I was strolling through the great church I saw a well dressed and intelligent looking man not only crossing himself, but, when he passed the altar, prostrating himself and kissing the very stones of the pavement. Once we were in such position that he looked me squarely in the face; but it made no difference to him. Again he bowed and kissed the stones. . . . Of course, I do not know that he might not go out of that great church and cut an Italian's throat, or cheat an American; but the presumption would be in his favor; that he would not.

But the power of a real religion was illustrated in Oberammergau, a village in a cleft high up among the Bavarian Alps, where we saw the "Passion Play," representing the sufferings and death of Jesus. In the drama there are about three hundred and fifty actors, with possibly a hundred in the orchestra. How many are in the tableaux I do not remember; possibly a thousand altogether. It is an exhibition given every tenth year, twice a week during the summer months, by the villagers, who number possibly less than four thousand. The audience sits under cover, but the actors are in a stage in front of them, wholly open to the sky. Back of this stage is another portion, roofed, on which the fixed tableaux are shown. The performance begins at eight in the morning, continues till noon, when there is an intermission till two o'clock, when the play is resumed and continles till six o'clock. Thus it lasts eight hours at every performance. The audience, the day I was there, numbered five thousand. The spectators come from all parts of the world. The peasants are compelled to render the exhibition on other days of the week beside the two scheduled, on account of the crowds. Great railroad trains are run especially for it. When it rains the peasants give the exhibition, with no change, their costumes though of the most gorgeous colors, being comparatively uninjured by the water. The performers give the exhibition in fulfillment of a vow made in the year 1633, when they believed the black plague that was ravaging Europe was stayed by God in response to the prayers and vow of their ancestors. It has been given every tenth year ever since; and the religious sincerity of the village is indicated by the fact that no joyous gathering, "not even a public wedding, is permitted from January to September", in the year of the play. It is said that in the village there is no policeman, and no jail. And this is related as if it were significant of a high degree of character. Perhaps it may be for a European village. I do not know. But in the United States there is many a village of that size wthout a policeman or jail.

In the audience the day I was there, were all classes of society and religion. Some believed in the New Testament, and some derided it. Some were religious, and some were unconverted. Some prayed to God regularly, and some only used his name profanely. But we all sat there in quiet reverence for eight hours, while ignorant peasants pictured before us the Bible story; especially the sufferings and death of Jesus.

Before I went there I had been requested by a fine singer, whom I had known for many years, to determine for her the merits, from a religious or artistic standpoint, of the exhibition. Consequently I entered the building with determination to preserve my critical attitude in perfect impartiality. Because the peasants were all Roman Catholics, and all went to mass in the morning before going to the play, I anticipated that popish influence would be marked. On the contrary, the story shown us was substantially that of the Bible. Notwithstanding the great length of the play, and not withstanding the fact that the performers had been rehearsing the same words, walking the same entrances and exits, making the same gestures and singing the same music for months, I saw no smile on the face of any performer, and no frivolous action of any kind. They were evidently going through the performance in a religious spirit, just as they should do in fulfillment of a vow. In the play they were serving God.

The effect on the audience was decided, almost from the beginning. The acting was not remarkable; the singing was not of the highest quality; the play had in it none of those artificial combinations woven together to excite the curiosity as to the "how it comes out" of ordinary fiction. It was just the story of Matthew, or Mark, or Luke, or John; the New Testament history, with regular tableaux of the Old Testament history, showing its b arings on, or analogy to, or prediction of the New Testament. That was all; except the deeply religious spirit of the actors.

I saw no smile in the audience. I looked carefully for this. Infidels had strutted in there, ready to deride; having "advanced and progressive" views as to all revealed religion. I saw no whispering. I saw no laughing. I saw no dozing, or sleeping. I saw no sneering. I do not say there was none; I only say, I saw none, though I looked for it. I heard sobbing in various directions from where I sat. Millionaires in their fur-lined overcoats, sitting there in the chill mountain air, forgot their aristocratic manner and looked with fixed, intense, gaze on the great world story before them; moved by the same powerful emotions excited by the New Testament narrative, that makes the gospel the salvation of the world. We all had read the story; we knew the end from the beginning. And yet it was there spread before us for eight hours, and that vast audience sat awed to the end.

I was deeply interested in the experiences of one spectator whom I had observed carefully, whose reserved seat was close to mine. He did not remain all through the performance.. In the middle of the forenoon he was so overcome by his feelings, he informed me at noon, that he feared he would faint, and left the theater. He also informed me that he did did not know whether he would return in the afternoon; not being well. And when I found that his reserved seat near me was not occupied I inferred that he had not come. But he had come. He did not take his appointed seat, fearing that again he might be compelled to leave, and it might disturb other hearers; and he stood at one of the entrances for four hours, from which place he might, if necessary, quickly go without disturbing the people. His experience will indicate to you the effect of the gospel story on the human heart. It is true that this hearer loved Jesus, honored Jesus as his Master; but that was not the whole. The effect was like that. on hearts that did not love the Lord. Many were deeply touched, as their faces showed, who quietly stifled their sobs. Old and young, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, all nationalities, Christians and sinners, felt the message of the gospel. The play showed to us the sin of manknind; the sinner "killing Jesus".

The powerful effect of the Oberammergau performance came from its fidelity to the Bible; not from criticisms of the gospel; not from art; not from literature; not from philosophy. The religious meaning dignified every sound, step and gesture.

There were critics in that audience, who at home could not produce any special effect on their hearers. There were philosophers in that audience whose high-priced sermons could not hold a congregation. There were literary preachers there who at home regularly discoursed to a "beggarly array of empty pews." There were pastors there whose churches declined in influence over the people, not withstanding they called themselves "modern" or "progressive," "advanced," and great "thinkers."

The "Liberals" of our party afterward said very little about the play. I am sure that our critics, although the Christ of the play was far inferior to the Christ of the New Testament, could not help feeling, though they might not say it, that the Bible Jesus was more than Mohammed; greater than Buddha; higher than Confucius: in fact, that he was from heaven, and was the Son of God.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

Our aim: $50000 in 1910 for Foreign Missions.

The Annual Conferences.

In my official visits to the conferences this year the members generally seemed more hopeful, and went forth to build up a larger Methodist Protestant Church. Drought in some sections seriously affected the finances, but the zeal and loyalty of pastors and people were not dampened nor lessened by material considerations.

The Colorado Texas Conferences, for example, after two years of drought, reported nearly four fold increase in membership, better financial conditions, and an improving ministry.

Superb opportunities are in the great Southwest for our church to become established in the new towns springing up where churches have not been built, but these important matters will be duly considered by those authorized to act. The representatives of the general interests were cordially received, given special and attentive hearing, and assurances of co-operation.

The church at large seems slowly to be awakening to the fact that the denominational enterprises must be properly supported, if the church is to grow and be a power for good in the world. In some Conferences the secretaries are asked for advice, to aid in deciding questions of procedure, to suggest plans and otherwise help. Unquestionably this sole connectional tie is proving of great benefit to the church in many ways not generally appreciated in some quarters.

Our present Campaign.

The results thus far have not met expectations. Special letters by the hundred have been sent throughout the church, and repeated appeals in my Bulletins have fairly set the case before our people.

The Board has not cleared off its obligation, it is unable to provide the imperative needs of the Japan work, land church buildings, a missionary home, the sending out of at least one Missionary and the return of one after seven years of faithful service, etc. The receipts to date, while in excess of last year, are insufficient to meet the regular demands, now that we are nearing the period of the year when receipts fall off, following the meeting of the Annual Conferences.

We face a serious condition. It is a matter of income. The Board is your agent delegated to manage this part of the work, but the Board must look to the church members for the funds necessary to carry on the work. Every member is under solemn obligations to help in the support of both the local and general interests of the church. Wherever possible pastor's should at once raise the amount for Foreign Missions, and forward to me without delay. Lay this great work on the hearts of your people, and appeal to them, in the name of our Lord and his needy work, to contribute generously. There might be a special effort to raise the Assessment on Christmas throughout the church. Nothing would be more appropriate on that day than to have God's people lay on his altars their offerings for the extension of his kingdom in heathen lands. I have already asked pastors to mention facts of our Japan work in their Christmas sermon, and give the people a chance to make a Christmas offering for it. This could apply on the Assessment, and even if the Assessment is exceeded send it on.

Sunday Schools and C. E. Societies.

We are mailing an appeal to all our Sunday Schools Superintendents whose addresses we have, asking them to have their schools make a Christmas offering for Foreign Missions to aid the Board to do its assigned work. We aim to make it educational, for we should teach the young of Christ "as he is today in his church and world, and as he will be as conqueror. That he lives and reigns and saves and develops men." That Christmas means God loves the heathen as well as us, and has provided for them as for us his gospel, his church and agencies, and we who know Him must send the gospel to those without it, and so have them give for this great work which cannot be maintained, much less developed without larger receipts. We had noble examples of the Christ spirit displayed by some of our schools last year, for they dispensed with their usual Christmas treat, and sent the cost of it to our Board. Some voted an appropriation from their treasury, others exerted themselves to make a creditable showing. Weather conditions, epidemics and other causes interfered with holding the Children's Day Service, and lessened the offering in a number of places. Here is an opportunity to make up all that, and give more. Every penny is needed, and needed now.

We must have a large Christmas offering or we will be more seriously embarrassed. The church and the schools must arouse themselves and do their utmost to prevent further financial trouble, and to enable the Board to properly take care of our Japan work which God is abundantly blessing.

The Christian Endeavor Societies are urgently requested to make their offering for the support of their Missionary not later than January 1st. The Denominational C. E. Union supports Rev. E. J. Chee at Nagoya, and the Md. Conference C. E. Union supports Rev. L. Layman at Yokohama, Japan. Why not, on the first Sunday of the New Year, make your offering for this worthy purpose, and thus conserve vital interests of the church? I plead most earnestly with every member of the church, every friend of Missions, every pastor and superintendent in the denomination come to the help of your Board in this time of need with your special gifts, your influence, your sermon and leadership in the school.

No disaster has overtaken us, no failure has come, no mistake of administration has been made, but success has been vouchsafed to our efforts in working for God, and we must care for and extend the work upon which His seal rests. Let us move forward to greater things.

Fred C. Klein.
Corresponding Secretary-Treasurer.

HELP YOUR PASTOR.

The new conference year is now open to us with all its possibilities and responsibilities. Let us each one make it the banner year of our lives. Lay your plans, and work them. Do something definite.

Help your pastor by co-operating with him. Had you thought about it? What? That he needs a part of his salary at the beginning of the year. Just after conference the preacher is about as scarce of money as any time during the year. After settling up, and as he settles down to rest a few hours, before he starts again on another year's work, right in the midst of winter with his wood, feed and every thing to buy. Clothes for his family and he finds he is short. The salary of our average minister is so meager, the wonder is how he lives. Won't you help him to start well? See the steward and hand in part of your assessment at least. Talk around to others about it. He is a very dependent man and in a condition he is not granted the right to say much about it. Won't you help him? Yes I believe you will, if you will only think. Truly, Z.

Tabernacle Circuit.

I will preach at Tabernacle the first Sunday in D cember at 11 o'clock, and at Julian at night, and at Moriah on the second Sunday at 11 o'clock, and at Shady Grove at 3 P. M.

C. A. Cecil, Pastor.

Haw River.

The first quarterly conference will be at Fair Grove on Saturday before the 3rd Sunday in December. Please come. Some matters will come up and I want your immediate advice and action. You were good to come last year. I shall expect you this year.

I have met with such reception on my return that I feel like a good year's work is ahead of us. We have been kindly remembered by Bro. Asa Hopkins and wife many times with butter. On Monday last, Sister Lon Lester gave us peaches, potatoes, butter, today Rev. George Wright, potatoes and pumpkins. Sister J. M. Jones and mother butter and apples. "So" kind. Many the Lord bless.

C. E. M. Raper.

Albemarle, Stanly Circuit.

We wish to acknowledge the following amounts for the completion of our new church in Albemarle:

John Garmon, 1.00; Miss Minnie Garmon, .50; Miss Daisy Garmon, .50; J. B. Garmon, .50; Rev. A. O. Lindley, 15.00; S. T. Forest, 1.00; R. F. Wyatt, 1.00; Rev. T. H. Matthews, 1.00; Rev. W. A. Lamar, 3.00; Rev. W. M. Pike, 1.00; Rev. T. F. McCulloch, 1.00.

Many thanks to each of the above. Now are there not others who have almost been persuaded to help us in this good work, I feel sure there are, and if so, won't you become fully persuaded, and send us the amount you wish to give at once.

The fully persuaded are the ones that make it count for us now.

We wish to add the names of some little Sunday-school folk of of Friendship church who have contributed for the building of the above named church:

Attie Hatley, .25; Hugh Harkey, .25; Maude Haltey, .25; Oscar Hatley, .10; Ernest Snotherly, .25.

Many thanks to you little folks. I am glad that young people, like you, can help build churches. I wonder if there are not some other little Sunday-school folks that want to help us. We will wait and see.

E. G. Lowdermilk, Albemarle, N. C.

P. S. On the 2nd Sunday after we organized in Albemarle our Sunday-school numbered forty.

Spring Church.

As the reporter from this place is very ill and can't write, I, her sister, will make just a short report. Our pastor filled his last appointment here last Sunday. It made us feel very sad to think that it was his last time to be with us. We all loved Bro. Fogleman, and wanted him to stay with us another year. There has been very much good accomplished during his stay here for the past three years. We do hate to give him up, he has done so much for dear old Spring Church. Our new church isn't quite finished yet, but was near enough done for Bro. Fogleman to preach his farewell sermon in last Sunday.

We were delighted to hear that Rev. W. F. Ashburn would be our pastor next year, we feel confident that he is the right one for us. We all know Bro. Ashburn, and we learned to love him, at least sixteen years ago, and it was a love I am sure, that some of us haven't forgot. I was but a little "tot" when he was our pastor here, but I haven't forgotten him.

Our Sunday-school is moving on nicely. We are preparing to have a Christmas tree here Christmas.

I will ask the Methodist Protestant Herald readers to pray for the recovery of my sister, who has had the fever for seventeen days.

Welch Memorial.

We ended up the year about as well as could be expected. The church has not had very many conversions this year, but it has taken in some good reliable members. And while there are many things to be accomplished before the church can be self-supporting, yet great improvements have been made. I have been serving the church this year as secretary and treasurer and in making out the report, being rushed and over worked, I made a mistake in the amount raised for parsonage. It came about by adding a wrong number. It should read like this: pastor received, $300.00; general interests, $33.00; building and repairing church, $44.00; building parsonage, $375.-54; miscellaneous, $93.07; total, $845.-61.

I hope this correction can be made in the journal of last conference.

We are very glad to have Bro. Davis return to this work for another year. This church needs a man like him, for it is in its youth although it has been organized for years. I have been trying to serve as superintendent of the Sunday-school this year and I believe we have as good Sunday-school as can be found in the city. Not as large but good order and attendance. I was sorry when my M. P. Herald came and I found that so many charges were left unsupplied for the want of men. I could not attend the conference this year, but if I can assist in any way I will gladly do so.

With best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

F. W. Easter.

A Word To The Brethren.

I wish to say to the ministers and leaders in our church, that while it was not convenient for me to attend our last Annual Conference, I am much interested in the Master's work, and have a great desire to see the M. P. Church prosper. But owing to age and rheumatism, and by the advice of my physician, I do not I would be better satisfied to be engag- work, that would cause me to have to expose myself in very bad weather; yet I would be better—satisfied to be engaged in the Master's work just as much as prudent for me.

And for the information of all will say, I could go through the winter, to any town or village, that I could reach by rail, and hold or assist in holding special meetings, where there is a prospect of building up, or organizing an M. P. Church.

And I would be glad to have a call to any such place or places. After reaching the place I can preach twice per day if necessary, and I have preached three times when necessary.

Through spring, summer and early fall, I could go to country churches or places, to assist, or hold special meetings, when the people desire an organization of an M. P. Church.

We as a denomination, should not be contented with past and present attainments but widen out and occupy territory not now occupied by us as a denomination!

Any one wishing my services, can address me at Lexington,N. C.

Let all work to make this year the most successful of any in the history of our Church in N. C.

Fraternally Yours,
Geo. E. Hunt.

THE BEGINNINGS OF CHEMISTRY.

A Historical Discussion of Chemistry Among the Ancients, and of Alchemy.. In Two Parts. Part II.

By Professor N. F. Brannock, M. A., Of the Chair of Physics and Chemistry, Elon College.

From our last week's article it can be seen that the ancients possessed but little real chemical knowledge. Indeed, they were acquainted with many snatches of chemical operations, such as dyeing, glass-manufacturing and soap making, but they followed these by the mere rule of thumb. They were satisfied with speculating as to the composition of substances, without any actual proof, based on well-tried experiments as to their natures. So we conclude that the scientific chemical knowledge of the ancients might be considered as a negligible quantity. However, one theory which at an early date found credence among them led to quite extensive experiments. Owing to th mythical and mystical nature of the early writers on this transmutation theory we cannot say with certainty where this strange belief had its birth; but, from the best available sources, we find among various nations distinct signs of alchemy having been pursued as a secret science and having been held in honor.

When one recalls to mind that ancient Egypt was the center of the higher culture, and, especially, that it was a country where the chemical art was practiced, one feels no surprise that the earliest reliable records of alchemy are to be found there. From the Leyden papyrus and the writings of the Alexandrians from the third to the seventh century A. D., we get the most valuable aid at our disposal for a historical proof of the origin of alchemy. From these records we find as tradition that the art of ennobling the baser metals, which was universally diffused in the first centuries of our era, had been brought from heaven to earth by demons. Zosimos states that the mystical book from which this art was to be learned was termed "chamen" and the art itself "chamesia." This myth is supposed to have sprung from one exactly similar found in the apocryphal book of Enoch; indeed, we find indications of it in Genesis. The alchemists of a later date were often found referring the origin of their art to the time before the flood, thinking that a special sanctity would accrue to alchemy on account of its great age. Some even went so far as to include Moses, the evangelist John and certain other Biblical characters as alchemists. When legends such as the above, were given prominence and credence ,we are not at all surprised at their having had great influence and authority over a very long period.

Hermes,——At the end of the second century of our era, we find the mention of the first personality with which the origin of alchemy is associated.

This wonderful character, Hermes by name, "The three times great" is supposd by some to be identical with Canaan, the son of Ham. The name is synonymous with Toth, the God of intellect, the patron of the arts and sciences of the ancient Egyptians. Hermes is said to have been a volumnious writer as to him is attributed the authorship of thirty-six thousand five hundred books, which probably means that, as god of letters, all books were dedicated to him. The follows of Hermes called themselves the Hermetic philosophers, and their art the Hermetic art. To seal anything very secure ly, as in a glass tube is called to this day sealing hermetically. Alchemy as a holy art, whose special task was to prepare metals, was held by some to acount for the wealth of Egypt. Alexander, the Great, as the report is, found in the sepulher of Hermes certain emerald tablets inscribd with his wisdom. Th most careful commentators agree that they refer to the univrsal mdicine or the Philosopher's Stone, although they are sufficiently obscure to receive almost any interpretation. They consist of thirteen parts; two of which are as follows:

No. 7. Separate the whole earth from the fire, the subtile from the gross, acting prudently and with judgment.

No. 8. Ascend with the gretest sagacity from the earth to Heaven, and then again descend to the earth, and unite together the power of things superior and things inferior. Thus you will possess the glory of the whole world, and all obscurity will fly far from yoou. Although this seems meaningless to us, yet this mystical personage had great influence for many centuries.

The Alexandrian School.

One of the most serious events in the history of the world was the breaking up of the Alexandrian school. Alexander had been, during ancient history, the center of science and philosophy, the great bulwark of Greek culture and medical and alchemical study. Under Roman depredations nearly all this valuable information was destroyed.

Alchemy Among the Arabs.

In the seventh century A. D., the Arabs having succeedd in over-running Egypt, absorbed and develloped such scientific knowledge as was then in existnce. When they first conquered Egypt, they destroyed much priceless literary treasure. However, they soon began to assimilate the education of the Egyptians and as a result of which we soon find many cities of learning spring up. Thus the Arabians, originally strangers to science, soon became very learned, and under them science flourished to an undreampt of degree, at a time whn culture remained at its lowest ebb in most European cities, everything having given way to the pressure of the conditions produced by Humboldt says the Arabians, and original Semetic stock, partially did away with the barbarians which had overwhelmed Europe for two centuries, convulsed as it had bee by revolution. They turned to the everllasting springs of Greek culture and philosophy and thereby assisted not only in preserving the culture of science, but in widening it and opening out new paths to investigators of nature.

The leading represenative of these Arabs is found in the renowned Geber. So great was his influence that he was the great authority all through the middle ages. Geber supposed that the metals were compose of sulphur and mercury. By varying the relative proporton of these, one metal could be transformed into another. Gold was considered very rich mercury, while the baser metals contained a large proportion of sulphur. On this view it ought to be possible to change one metal into another by merely altering the relative proportion of the two constituents.

Therefore he concluded that gold could be obtained from the baser metals by using agents which would extract sulphur from and add mercury to them. The arts whereby this transformation could be brought about were calcination, sublimation, coagulation, (chrystalization) and fixation. The active agents were the salts, alums, vitriols, borax, the strongest vinegar and fire.

In our day of enlightenment and progress, we are not able to understand how it was possible for such learned men as Albertus Magnus, Roger Bacon, Villanovanus and Valentine to believe in the transmutation of metals. We can account for this in but one way; they wer guided wholly by the speculations of the Ancient Philosophers, in their blind search for the Philosopher's Stone, which dominated chemistry for eight centuries. They missed the spacious chambers of marvel and wonder and lost their way in the winding passages of mystical and mythical speculation.

Roger Bacon held that the Philosopher's Stone could transform a million times its weight of base metal into gold, Villanovanus, who was more modest in his views, claimed that it could convert one hundred times its weight of mercury into gold. Lully surpasses even Bacon as is shown by the following: "Take of this precious medicine a small piece as large as a bean; throw it upon a thousand ounces of mercury, which will thereby be transformed into a red powder. Of this again an ounce thrown upon a thousand ounces of mercury, will convert it entirely into medicine. Throw an ounce of this on a thousand ounces of fresh mercury and it will likewise turn to medicine. Of this last medicine throw an ounce more upon a thousand ounces of mercury, and this will be entire changed to gold, which is better than gold from the mines."

In a book of alchemy which appeared in 1608, the Philosopher's Stone thus described itself: "I am the old dragon that is present everywhere on the face of the earth; I am father and mother; youthful and ancient; weak and yet more strong; life and death; visible and visible hard and soft; descending to the earth and ascending to the heavens; most high and most low; light and heavy; in me the order of nature is oftentimes inverted, in color, in number, in weight and in measure. * * * * * I am the carbuncle of the sun, a most notable classified earth, by which thou mayest turn copper, iron tin and lead, into most pure gold!"

All the above sounds very nonsensical to us. Nevertheless, let us for a while lay aside our chemical knowedge, and fancy that we are in the laboratory of one of the masters of this sacred art. Let us watch him perform some of his operations.

Ex. 1. Place some water in an open vessel and heat it, the water evaporates, leaving at the bottom of the vessel a white powder.

Conclusion. Water changes into earth. Could there be any objection to this since we are wholly ignorant of the power of the water to hold substances in solution.

Ex. 2. A piece of red hot iron is put under a bell in a basin of water. The mater diminishes in volume, and a candle being introduced into the bell the gas takes fire.

Conclusion. Water changes into fire. We could raise no objection to this since we are supposed to be ignorant of the fact that red hot iron decomposes water and sets the gas hydrogen free. On coming in contact with the lighted candle the hydrogen is oxidized to water.

Ex. 3. A piece of lead is burned in contact with the air, it loses its identity as such and is changed to a white powder. This powder is then heated in a crucible together with some grains of wheat. In a short time the lead begins to appear again.

Conclusion. Metals are destroyed by fire and revived by wheat and heat. No objection to this for the lead oxide has been reduced by means of the carbon contained in the wheat.

Ex. 4. Lead containing silver is burned in a cupel made of pulverised bone; the lead dissappears and at the end of the operation we find some silver at the bottom of the cupel.

Conclusion. Lead has been transformed into silver. This and analogous facts lead to the belief in the transmutation of metals, and finally to the search for the Philosopher's Stone.

Ex. 5. Some copper is treated with an acid. The copper losses its identity and we have a green liquid as a result of the action. A knife blade is plunged into the liquid and immediately it is covered with a thin layer of copper. If instead of the copper a solution of silver or gold had been used the conclusion would have been that the iron was transformed into gold or silver.

Ex. 6. A shower of mercury is allowed to fall upon liquid sulphur and a substance is formed as black as a raven's wing. If this is heated in a closed vessel it is changed into a brilliant red. This phenomenon which is due to the re-arrangement of the molecules is regarded even with wonder by the chemist of today. To th ancients it was like a flash of lightening across a clear sky, for to them black and red were nothing less than the symbols of light and darkness, good and evil.

It is very likely that results such as the above would go far to establish the four element theory, the belief in the transmutation, and the search for the elixer vitiae, the universal medicine,the all powerful and sacred Philosopher's Stone.

Then, do we not, indeed appreciate far too little the struggles, privations and sacrifices of those who have wrought before us and for us; with what information they had at their command they labored to lighten our burdens, they strove to increase our comforts; they pressed forward to enlarge the knowledge of the world about them so that we, standing on a higher plane view our universe with that perfect knowledge which is akin to wisdom.

A leper woman in Taiku preaches the Gospel diligently, getting about on her hands and knees. She is at church every Sunday and, having lost her fingers, with her teeth unties the strings of the napkin in which she carries her Bible and hymn-book. Other Christian women invite her to teach them to read. —Sel.

CHRISTIAN COURAGE

In a certain part of my district an ignorant farmer got hold of our books, read and believed. He gathered together a few farm hands, built them a little building to meet in, in the corner of his dooryard, and called it a church. The district was infested with bands of outlaws and the common people stood in constant terror of them. One night an outlaw leader visited this man's house, entered the court, fired off his gun, aroused the inmates, and demanded everything he had. The old man stepped down and quietly laid him out, took away his weapons and said, "I think you have made a mistake in the house. You don't know who we are, do you? We are the servants of God Almighty, who stands with us day and night, and we have no call to fear any such small persimmons as you. Go,"—and he went. But a few nights later he came back, fired the house and church, and they went up in smoke. The old man never turned his hand to his own house until he had put the church up, better and larger than before Now there is a congregation of 150 there, with a new building and a thriving spiritual work.

Some time ago a certain clan was fixing up their ancestral worship house. A Christian member was approached for his share, three cents. He refused. The collector had him haled before the magistrate. The magistrate roundly abused the Christian and ordered him to pay the money. He refused. The magistrate in a rage ordered him stripped, tied to the beating board and flogged till he paid it. As the flogging was about to begin, the man raised himself on his elbows and asked if he might say a word. Permission was granted. Said he: "Your most honorable greatness, it is not from the love of money that I refuse to pay this. It is because I believe it is wrong, for I am a worshiper of God and try to do what I believe is right. What is three cents? Nothing. Yet one may commit a great sin with three cents. My life is in your hands. You have the power to flog me to death, but you cannot make me pay this money; therefore I beg you to consider. Is not a man's life worth more than three cents?" The official ordered him to be loosed and driven out.

The man who related this to me made only one brief comment--Ie pyen himero mot hal il io, "That was something that couldn't be done with the strength on this side" (i. e. natural side), meaning, it is a matter on the spiritual side. —J. E. Adams, in Korea Field.

We are glad to have our pastor to return to us. May we all co-operate with him and each other and be co-workers with God and make this the best year of all. He will begin his work the 1st of December. We are glad to hear his little boy is improving and hope he will soon be well. The S. S. is doing very good work; we have decided to have a Christmas tree at our church for the Sunday school.

On Sunday evening at three o'clock, Nov. 20, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Tullia Hartley, Pearl, the second daughter and Mr. Thomas Wood were united in marriage, Mr. H. H. Hartley officiating. After the ceremony a sumptuous supper was served. It was a very quiet marriage only the relatives being present. The pretty bride was attired in white serge cloth. The bride is a member of Shiloh M. P. Church and both are faithful attendants at our S. S. They are residing with the groom's parents at the present. We wish for them a long and happy life.

We are glad to have Bro. Suits back with us for another year. Through his effort much good has been accomplished and with our help and encouragement we are hoping for this to be his best year with us yet, and "our" best by feeling at the close of the year "I have done what I could to help God's cause this year."—Lord, help us to do our part and help others with theirs too, if necessary. May each of us ask this in sincerety.

Ladies' Aid Society met Thanksgiving day, at the church. After an interesting and well attended meeting and a talk from Bro. Suits we got busy at packing a box to go the Orphanage at Denton with various kinds of eatables which the ladies had carried in and others sent to put in that box. It was a pleasure to us to have the privilege of helping a little anyway. Yes, we are already feeling proud of "Our Orphanage."

Our pastor who had served us so well in 1910 is returned to us by the conference to work for us in 1911. Our school has for several years under the guidance of Joel Trogdon as superintendent, one of the best we have had in 25 years. Like our Bro. Hatley, a man that all seem to like at other points. Our Sunday-school work in the past has shown in the number of converts at our special meeting in September last. Bro. Trogdon leaves us 1st of Jan., 1911, for his work as pastor in a field in North Carolina.

We must console ourselves as did the apostles when told by the Saviour that He was going away. He said to them: "Let not your hearts be troubled." We regret to lose him, our prayers go with him to his work in his new field, preaching the Gospel.

Bro. Hatley came on this work 12 months ago. He took with the brethren on the circuit, made friends all over the circuit. So of Bro. Trogdon. Has made friends all over the circuit and out also by his great work in the cause of Sunday-schools in North Carolina. He is a man that both saint and sinner have confidence in; he, like Bro. Hatley, will make a good pastor on any work in the field. They surely are called and able and efficient with some of the spirit that Paul had on his journey to Rome at the time of ship wreck when he taught the barbarians that he was a man of God when they saw no harm come to him from the bite the serpent. Healed the chief man of the island and they had still greater faith in him. So of Bro. Hatley and Trogdon. They have a tact to get the attention of their hearers and also their confidence, as men of God. That is what counts in this day; men that every one has faith in, as being good, serving the Lord. We must have men sent out that masses have confidence in, those who can get men and women and the young too. The field is ripe and the harvest is great even in our great and beloved North Carolina. The preacher must be sent who is thought to be most efficient for the work to be done by him.

Roseneath, Roanoke Ct.

It has been some time since any report has been made from this church, however, we are yet alive, and getting along very nicely.

We are delighted to learn that Bro. Clifton L. Whitaker will be with us another year. We would have been thoroughly disappointed if he had not returned. He fills his appointments regularly, and always prepares exvellent sermons, and those which we so much enjoy.

On Thursday night, we enjoyed a Box party at Roseneath school which was for the benefit of our church. Quite an elegant display of dainty boxes was sold. After each box was sold, we had a voting contest of the "most beautiful" young lady present. A lovely cake found its way into the corner where a small table laden with a profusion of chrysanthemums and ever-greens awaited it. After the last vote was over, Mr. W. L. Strickland, auctioneer, gracefully presented this cake to Miss Margaret Strickland who play, called Andnia, which was produsd the winner... Quite a handsome sum was realized which amounted to twenty-five dollars.

New doors, a carpet, and collection plates will be purchased. We are anticipating another entertainment on Thursday before Xmas; the proceeds will go to the church. We are hoping that in a short while we will be able to carry Roseneath to the front, and be as though we are not entirely "in the lands of the dead."

Our Sunday school has not been in progress for quite a while, although we will begin anew immediately after Xmas, and trust that we can continue same.

I don't want the readers to think that we are asleep; for we are coming to the front steadily.

I wish to again express my appreciation to the Conference for permitting us the most highly honored pleasure of having Bro. Whitaker with us again. We do enjoy his sermons so much, and so delighted to reclaim him as our pastor.

With best wishes to the "Herald" and each reader.

Yours fraternally,

Mary Julia Simmons.

Onr first new Sunday was very promising. 117 in S. S. 36 at Woolsey Hall, 48 at Burnsville Hill. In the morning service there was one splendid young man who surrendered his life to Christ.

The cottage is looking fine in its new setting. It is rapidly getting in readiness for occupancy. Our representatives gave a happy account of their enjoyment of Conference and of the encouragement they received from all. Brother Curry will soon be out of the hospital. Our young friend, Walter Havner, is recovering from a serious illness.

MARRIED.

Huffines-Taylor.

On last Wednesday at high noon at the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. William Cunmings, of Monroeton, Miss Lillie Huffines, the accomplished daughter of Mrs. S. A. Huffines, and the Rev. Samuel W. Taylor of Littleton, N. C., were happily united in marriage, the ceremony being performed by Dr. H. L. Elderdice, president of Westminster Theological Seminary, Westminster, Md. The parlor was beautifully decorated in green and white. The ceremony was performed under a large arch draped in white, with the trailing cedars wound around it. Potted plants and mountain ferns formed a beautiful back ground for this arch, while on either side, there stood pedestals draped in white, holding silver candelabra. The whole house expressed a scene of mixed beauty and the presents given were many—cut glass, silver,bricabrac and linen. Besides the names mentioned, many friends from Reidsville and around this country home were present and congratulated the happy couple and wished for them a happy life.

Before the ceremony Miss Katherine Anderson, of Reidsville, wearing cream crepe de chine, sang in her own peculiarly sweet way "All for You," accompanied at the piano by Miss Susie Huffines, of the faculty of Greensboro Female College, who played Mendelsshon's Wedding March, also his "Midsummer Night's Dream" during the ceremony.

As the first notes of the wedding march were sounded Miss Annie Cummings, of Monroeton, and Miss Louise Huffines, of Rocky Mount, gowned in embroidered batiste, entered bearing the ribbons. Then came the groomsmen, Mr. Wallace Huffines, of Reidsville, and Rev. Homer Casto, of Efland, N. C.

The bridesmaids, Miss Gladys Cummins, of Monroeton, in a creation of blue and white crepe de chine, and Miss Myrtle Moore, of Monroeton, in white nun's veiling, then entered, followed by the groom and his brother Mr. Thomas Taylor, of Lexington.

The bride, in a tailored suit of dark blue, with hat and gloves to match, entered with her maid of honor, Miss Nannie Walker, of Winston, in light blue carried white carnations and the bride white bride's roses and asparagus fern.

Immediately after the ceremony the guests were ushered into the dining room where a three course luncheon was served.

The out of town guests were Rev. H. L. Elderdice, Westminster, Md.; Rev. Homer Casto, Efland, N. C.; Messrs. J. H. Harrison, Brinkleyville, N. C.; T. J. Taylor, Lexington; Edd Huffines, Durham; Mesdames R. L. Huffines, Rocky Mount; B. S. Cummings, High Point; Misses Nannie Walker, Winston; Susie Huffines, Greensboro; Bessie McDearman, Rocky Mount; Mr. and Mrs. Geo. L. Batten, of New York; and Mr. and Mrs. Crane, of New York.

The bride is the accomplished and attractive daughter of Mrs. S. A. Huffines, of Monroeton, and a member of one of the county's foremost families.

The groom is the worthy pastor of the Methodist Protestant church of Littleton, N. C.

The happy couple left Reidsville on the afternoon train for Yadkin College to spend several days with the groom's parents. C. E. M. Raper.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

In the midst of life there is death, and whereas, the Great and Supreme Ruler of the Universe has, in his infinite wisdom, removed from among us, one of our worthy and esteemed fellow-laborers, William M. Loy, and whereas, the long and intimate relations held with him in the faithful discarge of his duties in the Burlington Methodist Protestant Sunday School make it eminently fitting that we record our appreciation of him, therefore, Be it resolved.

First: That the sudden removal of such a life from our midst leaves a vacancy, and a shadow that will be deeply realized by all the members and friends of this school, and will prove a serious loss to the community and its people.

Second: That the wisdom and ability which he has exercised in the aid of our school, by service, contribution and counsel, will be held in grateful remembrance.

Third: That in deep sympathy for the bereaved relatives of the deceased, we express our hope that even so great a loss to us may be overruled for good by Him who doeth all things well.

Fourth: That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the records of this school, that a copy be sent to the family of the deceased, and copies sent to the Methodist Protestant Herald, and the local papers for publication.

The Death of Two Good Men.

On Tuesday, November the 22 , 1910, uncle Elijah Waters died. He was over ninety years old. He was Mt. Moriah's oldest member. Brother Waters will be reatly missed in his home and also in the church. The last word that broth r Waters said was , "Glory, glory to God." He was buried at Mt. Moriah cemetery November 24th. The funeral serivce was conducted by brother A. P. Ivester. There was a large crowd of relatives and friends to mourn his loss, but our loss is his eternal gain.

Uncle Billie Hicks died the 26th of November. He was over eighty years old. He leaves a wife and a large number of other relatives and friends to mourn his loss. He was Mt Moriah's next oldest member. He was buried at Mt. Moriah cemetery November 27th. Brother A. P. Ivester also conducted his funeral service. There was a large crowd of relatives and friends to mourn his loss. But our loss is his eternal gain.

May God's richest blessing be upon the bereaved families of brother Waters and brother Hicks and some sweet day may they he an unbroken family in our Father's Kingdom.

LORD, REMEMBER ME.

O Lord, remember dark Gethsemane,
The burden of grief so painful to Thee,
And Thy shameful death on Calvary's tree,
Then remember me, I'm sick and lonely.

The way seemeth dark, and my steps are slow;
My feet, oft pierced by thorns, so weary grow,
My heart is burdened with grief and sorrow,
Then remember me in tender mercy.

Against temptations I have battled hard;
Gloomy doubts often my progress retard;
I'm wounded in spirit, I'm helpless, Lord,
Oh! remember I need Thy sympathy.

Thou dost the power of temptations know,
Thou art acquainted with grief and sorrow,
Thou alone canst the needed help bestow,
And Thou hast promised to help the needy.

The throng who through great tribulation came
Overcame through faith in Thy holy name,
Thy love and Thy power are still the same,
Thou canst through all dangers lead me safely.

Then when life's rough, toilsome journey is o'er,
And my spirit to fairer worlds shall soar,
In sweetest strains I'll praise Thee evermore,
And to Thy name ascribe the victory.

Transplanted.

Believe not that the blossom snatched away
Relentlessly, it seems to human ken,
Yields not its fragrance still; for some glad day,
Amid the fair green fields of God, again—
Nor darkling vail between—we shall behold
The opening bud into the rose unfold.
Could finite minds but half way understand
Unbounded Love and Goodness, would we then Rebellious prove, when so divine a Hand
Removes from blasting frosts, from pain and sin,
Into the summer land, the cherished flower?
Nay, none could ever doubt his love or power.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR AND SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

Every Little Helps.

Don't think that because you cannot make a long and eloquent speech at the prayer meeting, therefore the few words that you can say do not count. Very likely the long and eloquent speech would kill the meeting, and the few stumbling words that you can say would be just what the meeting needs.

Don't think that because you cannot plan fine work for the committee of which you are a member, or lead in carrying out such plans, therefore you are of no use on the committee. Very likely the little bit of faithful service that you can render will turn the balance from failure to success in the work of that committee.

You cannot sing a solo, but the prayer-meeting hymn will be the stronger for your voice, and if it is not heard the Saviour's ear will find something wanting in the song. You cannot make a long prayer, but your sentence in the chain prayer will add more than you can realize.

Committee Work.

No Christian can do so much by himself as in co-operation with other Christians. This is a great lesson to learn, and our Christian Endeavor committee work teaches it.

Then let us all make our committee work really co-operative. It must not be one-man work. All the members must contribute to it. The chairman is not to do all the work, nor any one member, but all are to share in it in proportion to their ability.

This means that all the members of a committee are to have the work of the committee in mind, thinking about it and planning for it. It means, too, that the committee is to be so divided as to give every member a part, and a worthy part.

It is the business of the committee chairman to see that the work is carried out. If it is, he will have an enthusiastic committee, and one that will accomplish results.

Be a Leader.

Be a leader in the prayer meetings, by being the first to take part.

Be a leader in the singing, by singing clearly and with feeling.

Be a leader in prayer, by thinking beforehand what you will pray, and asking that others will follow you with prayers.

Be a leader in the business meeting, by always being prompt to make or second motions.

Be a leader in committee work, by your prompt presence at the meetings, and your interested and well-considered suggestions about the work.

Be a leader in the socials, by taking part in the games with all your heart, and trying to lead others to take part heartily.

Be a leader in union work, attending the meetings and taking part in them whenever called upon.

Be a leader in church work, by following the expressed desires of your pastor, and getting the other Endeavorers to do the same.

The rewards of leadership are a continually increasing power to lead others, and conduct your own life happily.

C. E. TOPIC FOR DEC. 4—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

By Prof. W. A. Harper, President State C. E. Union.

The Life Worth While—Prov. 10: 1-7, 22, 29.

(Consecration meeting.)

Let the leader take with him on the platform one of those who have never led the meeting. Have this new leader-in-training to read the Scripture and announce the hymns. The second time he will perhaps make the comment in addition to these duties. A third time will find him also prepared to pray from the platform. Later he will lead all alone. Why not train up leaders in this way? It can be done; it has been done; will you start it, brother old-time leader, in your society?

The Leader.. Brother leader, make your talk worth while this time. Speak of the differing types of life led by the people to-day, of the wild ambitions that influence our actions. Show how all of these are but vanity and vexation of spirit, unless we sanctify them all with the holy incense of the worth-while life. Give some illustrations from sacred and secular history of how this sort of life gives evidence of its great value.

Some Questions for Voluntary Answer in the Meeting

How may a wash-tub become a cathedral?
How may a throne be worse than a hovel?
What is it to live the worth-while life?
What present reward does the worth-while life bring?
What future gain does the worth-while life insure?
How can we help others to live the worth-while life? (To several.)
What is one ingredient of the life worth-while? (To several.)
How can we live this life?
Can every one live this life? (To several).
How does the church contribute to this life?
The Sunday school?
The Christian Endeavor?
The church prayer-meeting?
What influence does this life exercise in the home
In the school-room?
In the community?
In the world?
What relation is there between this life and missions?
How did Peter exemplify this life?
David? Samuel? Moses? James? John? Stephen? Paul? Jesus? Gladstone? Lincoln?
Any other sacred character the leader desires?

1. Chain of prayers for the life worth while.
2. Song service—Consecration songs.
3. Scripture and comment.
4. Prayer by the pastor.
5. Leader's remarks.
6. Special music.
7. Voluntary participation in any form desired, interspersed with stanzas of appropriate hymns and sentence prayers.
8. Pastor's remarks.
9. Roll call of absent members only, that their Scripture verses may be read or their other form of greeting received.

10. Song. Offering. Lord's prayer in Concert.

Preparing to be a Leader.

Leading a prayer meeting is a matter of great importance; begin to get ready at least two weeks in advance.

The foundamental preparation is prayer, to clear your mind and receive the impulse of the Spirit of all wisdom.

Then, study the assigned Bible passage, and use the best commentary you can find.

Next, study the commentaries on the topic that are accessible to you, all of them.

With all this, think! It is your meditaton that is to make fruitful all that you have read. Carry a note-book in which to record your thoughts as they arise.

..Then, plans! Select, arrange, condense, write out what you want to say.

Then, practise; go over, wthout your notes, what you will say, again and again.

Add a selection of the hymns you will use; and, especially devise some way to bring out the participation of others, as by answers to questions that you will give out, or original comments on quotations that you will distribute.

Remember in it all, that you are to lead others, not to unfold or display your own ability. Be a true leader.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOI LESSON, DECEMBER 11, 1910

BY Dr. W. C. Wicker.

The Crucifixion. Matt. 27: 15-50.

Golden Text: He was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities. Isa, 53: 5.

Lesson Setting.

It was Friday April 7. A. D. 30 from 6 o'clock A. M. till 9. P. M. that the scenes and events of our lesson transpired Jesus had been condemned at the preliminary trial before day. Later he was formally tried before the Sanhedrin, and the former sentence was quickly confirmed and the condemned victim was referred to the Roman Court for further trial. Before this Court, in Pilate's judgment hall either in Herod's Palace in the Western part of the the city; or in Castle Autom's adjoining the Temple on the north is where the Roman trial was conducted Here the charge was not that Jesus had blasphemed the name of God and was a traitor to the Jewish common wealth as it had been at the Jewish trial; but the charge was sedition against the Roman government. The only basis for such a charge was the silent spiritual work and teachings and life of Jesus which were destined not to establish a temporal kingdom but a spiritual,—a kingdom within a kingdom that should include and transmute all kingdoms into higher ideals under the King of kings. Their charge was so absurd that Pilate semed not to take it seriously, for it was absurd to think of a poor man with a few peasant followers unarmed, whose only purpose seemed to be to do and teach good, being rebellious to Rome. The second charge was that he refused to pay tribute to Caesar, but Christ had only a few days before taught duty to God and to government by saying, "Render therefore unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's." They knew that the charge was false, but Pilate could not know whether it were true or false. The third charge was that he claimed to be Christ, the king. This charge had truth in it formally but the falsity of the charge was in the application of the term king. He claimed to be a spiritual king and not a temporal ruler seeking political power. His kingdom was declared not to be of this world—temporal, but of the world of spirit. His purpose and kingdom was to revitalize all kingdoms and impart to them a spiritual dynamic power that should make them "come to themselves" and realize true ideals in progress, growth, and self-realization. History has revealed the truth of his claim; and his interfusing, over-ruling spiritual power has built up kingdoms and inspired rulers with higher ideals.

After this trial in which Pilate said, "I find no fault in this man," Jesus was sent again to Herod who said that Jesus was innocent of crime. He was then returned to Pilate whose verdict was, Why, what evil hath he done? With all this evidence of innocence, his enemies cried out the more, Crucify him! Crucify him! It was not truth or justice that they wanted, but innocent blood. O, the cruelty of ignorance, superstition, malice, envy, prejudice. They are heartless in all ages as in that and would stab to the heart an innocent man or God. They crucified Christ on the cross.

I. The Crucifixion. Vs. 33-38. Come unto a place called Golgotha.. Aramaic, Hebrew dialect in common use. Calvary is the Roman name, for the place of a skull, because it resembled a skull when seen from the Mount of Olives on account of the shape of the hill and the presence of two caves which suggested eyes.

34. They gave him vinegar, a mixture of sour wine and water used as a beverage by the Romans. This potion had some juice of the poppy plant mixed with it and was said to be mingled with gall because this juice was bitter. It was given with the drink to deaden the pain of those who were crucified and is expressive of the "milk of human kindness, of the Jewish women of the time. When he had tasted thereof, so that he recognized the nature and purpose of the drink, he refused to drink it because he preferred to retain all the powers and activities of his mind unto the last. He doubtless desired to retain a clear consciousness of sin, of the suffering for our transgression, of dependence upon God and of communion of spirit with the Father. He wished to suffer unto the uttermost and drink the cup of sorrow which God had given him to the dregs that he might succor those that suffer the tortures of remorse of conscience. In him we can find heroism, sympathy and helpfulness that have grown out of the keenest sufferings for our salvation.

35. And they crucify him. .They nailed him to the cross while it was lying upon the ground, after which it was raised with Christ upon it and dropped into its place leaving the feet of the crucified one only a little above the ground. Crucifixion is an awful form of execution, the most cruel, shameful, and torturous of all punishments. The prolongued torture, the lingering consciousness, the burning wounds, uneasiness of position, the swollen veins, the burning thirst, the ignominious agony always increasing unto death were some of the cruel characteristics of crucifixion.

37. Over his head his accusation written. "This is Jesus the king of the Jews." This superscription written in three languages, Hebrew, Greek and Latin sought to publish to all the world of culture, power, and religion the shame of Jesus as a criminal but they published to the nations and to the world of culture. power and religion, the salvation of Jesus as the Christ. He transformed his shame into their shame, his crucifixion into their crucifixion and his death into their death. Wonderful transformation! Wonderful power!! This superscription is now written in over four hundred tongues, not to the shame, but to the glory of Jesus' name.

38. Then were two thieves crucified with him. This was to place greater discredit and disgrace upon Christ as a criminal. They tried to place the stamp of eternal disapproval upon him, but the ruling, dominant power of real goodness condemns and eternally placed under ban their hatred and evil, and history deepens their shame and magnifies their crime while His name and fame shall reach from sea to sea and from nation to nation. Jesus was not in objectionable company then for he came to seek and save that which was lost. He revealed the redeeming power of a pure personality in the salvation of one of the thieves or robbers, even in the hour of death. He has been saving sinners ever since.

II. Events that Transpired at the Cross. Vs 39-50.

There were three classes of people gathered about the Cross, representing three different attitudes of spirit. First, the soldiers who were indifferent, careless, unconcerned about Christ, represent a great class of humanity at all times, places, and situations in life. In the church, out of the church, professed followers and non-professors, are indifferent, apathetic. Second, the rulers, who were filled with hatred, envy, antagonism, opposition to Christ, and were enraged and arrayed against him. They represented the great aggressive opponents to Christianity, those who fight it openly and secretly with thought, and purpose and will, by sin, crime, cruelty, by gambling, profanity, drunkenness, and by impurity, dishonty and treachery. These are not apathetic but are filled with antipathy. Third, the women and the disciples, who were filled with love, devotion, consecration, conscientiousness, and conviction. These represent that great class who are timid because of their weakness but courageous because of the power and spiritual encouragement of Christ. They follow him to death. They give their life for him, they never forsake his cause, never deny their Lord, but hold up the banner of the Cross to all the world. They rise above "apathy," but are filled with "sympathy" for the progress of his kingdom and glory in the Cross of Jesus Christ, and live and die for its defense.

39. They that passed by reviled him, ridiculing him because of the contrast between his claim as the king of the Jews and his condition as the crucified one; this chasm was too broad for them to span, the breach is too great for them to cross, but Christ could fathom hell, and encompass heaven, and conquer earth by his wonderful self-sacrificing love that extends beyond the heavenly ken, in length, and height, and depth. He could bring harmony out of this confusion, life out of death, victory out of defeat, and salvation out of suffering, so when they reviled him, he reviled not again.

42. He saved others; himself he cannot save. A half-true and half false statement. "He that saveth his life shall lose it, but he that loseth his life for my sake and the gospel's shall find it." Christ could, by supernatural power, have overcome his enemies and saved his life from cruel hands, but to save the race he must die upon the cross as the great sacrifice for the salvation of mankind. We should recognize in his attitude toward the cross our attitude toward service for the salvation of humtnity through the cross.

43. For he said, I am the Son of God. If he was the Son of God, as he claimed, they thought he could come down from the cross and save himself, but since he did not prove his sonship by saving himself, they thought their position invincible and their crucifixion of Christ just. but Jesus was performing a higher service to God and man than selfish salvation, for his salvation for all humanity was for the soul and spirit and not for bodily deliverance from the cross.

45. From the sixth hour unto the ninth. For three hours, from noon until three o'clock there was darkness, typical of the spiritual agony that passed over his soul for the sins of the race. Sin eclipses the soul from God, it comes between man and God and darkens every faculty, blunts every noble impulse. blinds every source of illumination and brings stagnation and death to all spiritual powers.

50. Yielded up the ghost. It was finished. The work was done, He breathed out his spirit in death for our transgression. He paid the whole debt for our salvation. The law had brought condemnation; for the law operates from the exterior. Christ brought justification, for he co-operates from within the soul. Faith and love and devotion on man's part meet love, sympathy, forgiveness, salvation on Christ's part and spiritual life is begotten within us like unto his own glorious life—the life of the spirit in the soul, the glory of God in the life and Christ lives within us the hope of glory. Paul could say, I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.

Lessons to Learn.

1. The awful and exceeding sinfulness of sin.
2. The wonderful, boundless love of Christ.
3. The diametrical antagonistic relation between Christ and sin.
4. The necessity for freedom from sin for salvation.
5. The incomprehensible value of salvation.
6. We should do right at any cost.
7. We should accept Christ as a personal Savior without which we commit the greatest of all sins.

ONE OF GOD'S CHARADES.

This morning I witnessed a deel that ought to be recorded and rewarded.

I had been enjoying an all too rare treat, a mornng gallop with Kitty—kindliest of little beasts man ever bestrode. I had left her at the stable, and was walking home along Broadway, when, at the crossing, I came upon a knot of twenty or more men, boys, policemen, and standing teams. A sewer main had lately been laid across the street and the hind wheel of an over loaded truck wagon had found in the new pavement a soft place close by the track of the tram, and had sunken so deeply that the horse, great noble-looking fellow that he was, could not have drawn it out had he been multiplied by four.

Drivers, policemen and volunteers had been at work with great timber levers and planks and blocking, to pry up the sunken wheel; but the most they had accomplished was to get the end of a scantling nearly under the wheel in such wise that if it could be rolled forward at all, the scantling would make an inclined plane up which the wheel could climb until it should reach the pavement level.

With every thing in readiness, and all the "pries" at work, the men made a final appeal to the strong and spirited bay to pull once more. Once again he responded generously, but without effect. Then he desisted and continued to desist, saying good naturedly, but as plainly as ever horse could, that it was useless and inhuman to put one horse, however strong, to do the work of four.

It was now nearly time for the electric to come whizzing down the obstructed track. Something must be done at once. "There is no help for it," said the boss of the trucking teams—"there is no help for it; we shall have to bring Old Whitey." So the well-groomed bay was led out of his shafts and Old Whitey taken from another loaded wagon. She had by no means the spirited look of the bay. Her arching neck had long since sunken to the general level of her dorsal skyline. Her great ears seemed incapable of motion, and her face was pathetically heavy and sad. Each several hair lay just where the drying from unnumbered sweats had left it, and no two seemed to lie together.

Her gaunt hulk was soon backed into the heavy truck shafts, and the trace chains made fast to the whiffletree—at first a little too short, then lengthened a bit to give her sea room. There was no brandish of whip, no blow, no angry yell, nothing but a giving of a free rein, and the projection of—what shall I call it? I have heard all sorts of sound addressed to equine ears by men of many tongues and languages, but this I never heard before. It had for a basis the kiss-like sound so commonly used by American horsemen, yet some way it peculiarly vocalized with an indescribable guttural explosion that was amazingly penetrating and human. It was at once coaxing, commanding, trustful, strenuous, kindly, authoritative, desperate, and I know not what else.

Old Whitey at once lifted her heavy ears, and as another and another of these insistent kisses were thrown at her, she suddenly took on the aspect of a new embodiment of life. She tested her tackle carefully, she felt the ground over with her feet to find if there were the slightest points of vantage, she ascertained the central line of dead-weight draft, and swinging herself one point off to the left, gave a good, generous one-horse power tug at the immovable mass.

In vain.

Then swinging around two points to the right, she gave another, surely a two-horse power lift at the terrible load.

Immovable it remained.

Another coaxing, confident, kindly, anxious kiss thrilled through her excited brain —another.

She now fully took in the situation. It was an emergency. She knew what an emergency meant. She had been called on before. She knew she was counted on. She was this man's only present hope. Swinging once more a trifle on the great kingbolt and drawing a deep breath, she suddenly bowed her sinewy neck and bony frame, and with a lunge that would have launched a world had creation been her business, she dashed with straining sides across the twenty feet of treacherous pavement, and trembling in every fibre of her being, landed her inhuman load upon the solid street.

Well might the crowd stand breathless, as it did. Such a perfect intelligence as to every ounce of help she could extort from the lay of the street, and from the leverage of the kingbolt—I fear also perfect intelligence as to the cruelty of the imposition. Such a desperate power of will; such willingness to do desperately; and all, not to escape the task; all merely to serve and please her master in his hour of need. I could not stop to pat her infinitely pathetically face, nor even to see if her driver gave her unkempt forelock one little approving pull. The tears were rolling down my cheeks and I had to hasten away.

Postscript.—The foregoing illustrates so many things in human life, and is so capable of yielding a moral that I fear some readers will be tempted to take it for a parable merely. To any such I wish to say that I have reported the incident exactly as I saw it on the open streets. It is not a parable.—Dr. Warren.

—President Swain was here on church business Tuesday and Wednesday.

CHURCH ETIQUETE.

A church should be entered with a most reverent feeling. The object of attending divine service is to improve the spiritual nature, and hence business and everything of a secular character should be left behind when you enter the church portal.

If a stranger, you will wait in the vestibule until the arrival of the usher, who will conduct you to your seat.

Enter the church quietly, removing the hat, and never replacing it until the door is reached again at the close of the service.

If a stranger and accompanied by a lady, you will allow her to precede you, and follow the usher up the aisle until the pew is reached, taking seats at the further end if you are first, so that you will not be disturbed by later arrivals. It is no longer a custom, as formerly, for the gentlemen to step into the aisle and allow ladies that are strangers to pass to the inside.

The gentlemen will place his hat, if possible, under the seat, and while in church the occupant should avoid making a noise, staring around the building, whispering, laughing, or nodding to others.

All greetings, recognitions and conversation should be conducted in the vestibule after service. While in church the passage of a fan or hymn book to another should be recognized by merely a quiet bow.

Should you see a stranger waiting, you may invite him to enter your pew. No speaking is neccessary then, nor when you open the book and point out the service.

If a stranger, it is best to conform to the rules of the service, rising and sitting down with the congregation, and although the forms may be radically different from what you are accustomed to, you should comport yourself with the utmost attention and reverence.

Avoid making a noise when entering a church after the services have commenced. It is disrespectful to come late and shows bad manners to leave before the service is through. You should wait until the benediction is pronounced before putting your articles in order for leaving.

It is a breach of etiquitte for a number of young men to congregate in the vestibule and there carry forward a conversation commenting upon the services and various members of the congregation present.

If a member of a church, you should be regular in attendance. While the pastor has put forth, possibly, extra efforts to prepare an ertra sermon, it is poor encouragement to find members of the congregation absent because of a trivial storm away upon a pleasure drive or absorbed in the contents of a Sunday paper.—Zime's Watchman.

TOLSTOI.

Count Leo Tolstoi, the great Russian writer and philanthropist, died at Astopava, Russian, early Sunday, morning Nov. 20th. Having been ex-communnicated from the Church in 1901, he was denied burial according to the rites of the Orthodox Church, but the esteem in which the venerable count was held by the people whose cause he espoused was such that no ediet from any state or religious authority could prevent the populace from giving an honest expression of its grief at the loss of a man whose "heart was burst by his unbounded love for humanity,"—words used by one who broke out in sobs when it was announced from the hut in which Tolstoi died, at Astapova, where he had been taken ill while on his way to voluntary exile in a colony he had founded in the Caucasus.

When it was learned that the aged man had been taken ill on his jouney the Countness Tolstoi hastened to his side where there gathered and were present at the time of his death other relatives of the author, Tolstoians, villagers, and many churchmen who kept vigil at the lowly hut all through a foggy, raw, November night.

At Moscow the police forbade the theaters from suspending their performance because of the death of Count Tolstoi. Neverthless, the playhouses were closed, as the actors refused to appear. At the Moscow Armenian church a public requiem was permitted.

Tolstoi left a written wish that he be buried without pomp, wreathes or rites under "Poverty Oak," on a hillock at Yasanaga Poliana, where he played as a child and where the peasants were accustomed to congregate.

"True worth is the deposit which good life makes in the storehouse of character. A man may leave the doors of that storehouse wide open without fear. Only his own hands can remove or waste the treasure."

"Take your needle, my child, and work at your pattern; it will come out a rose by and by." Life is like that—one stitch at a time taken patiently and the pattern will come out all right like the embroidery. —Oliver Wendell Holmes.

—Representatives of more than 30 states attended the convention in New Orleans on Tuesday to discuss matters pertaining to pure food. The war against adulterations is a just and necessary one while there are men base enough to practice such arts.

THAT LITTLE HAPPY THOUGHT.

A helpful little Happy Thought went hastening on its way,
All in the early morning of a long and busy day.
I've neither hands nor feet nor tongue, it mused, but I'll not sorrow,
For boys and girls are plentiful, and so I'll merely borrow.
Now little Nell was skipping by, to visit little Jane,
Presto, the little Happy Thought was beaming in her brain;
And so she turned, and hurried back, stayed at home instead,
Reading, with merry, tripping tongue, to poor blind cousin Ned.
Off went the little Happy Thought, and saw some idle feet
Drumming their heels against the steps, upon a quiet street;
And soon those feet were carrying, upon an errand hot,
Their smiling owner, who had whined, and said he'd "rather not."
If "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do,"
Why, then, a little Happy Thought can set them working, too.
And, judging from a-many things I notice every day,
That helpful little Happy Thought is still upon its way.

BOYHOOD OF LIVINGSTONE.

By Cora Lowe Watkins.

In the little village of Blantyre in the year 1813 there was born a little baby boy who was destined to become a great pioneer, an explorer, a scientist, a doctor, a missioner, and a freer of slaves. Although he began life in a workman's humble cottage, at its close he was laid to rest in Westminster Abbey among the great men of his country. The baby's father was an honest, hard-working man, who took an interest in all the world's doings. He was a great reader, and was very fond of books on missionary life. From his father the little David inherited pluck and hardihood and thirst for knowledge. His mother, who had a gentle and kindly nature, taught her boy to be neat, orderly, and exact, and by her tender training gave him a firm hold on truth, honor, and justice. This heritage from his parents proved more valuable than any amount of money, for David Livingstone grew into a man ready to do and dare all things for duty's sake.

At the village school David learned to read and write; but so poor were his parents that they had to take the boy away from his lessons at the early age of ten and put him to work in a cotton mill. No matter what the weather was, the little lad had to be at the factory at six in the morning and stay there until eight at night. Fourteen hours a day at a mill was enough to ruin the poor child's health, but David was made of hardy stuff. Very soon he learned to work the "spinning jenny," and then he was raised to be a spinner with a small wage. His first earning he took home and slipped into his mother lap. To the boy it was a small fortune, and he thought of many things it would buy; but his mother's needs came before his own. As he earned more money, he bought some books, and fixing them on the "jenny," he would read a few lines whenever he could.

In spite of the long and tiresome day at the mill, David joined night classes and sat up reading until mother took away his books and made him go to bed. When his holidays came, he would range over the country with his brothers and sisters, and nothing escaped his keen eye. Every animal, bird, and insect was interesting to him, and he tried to find out all he could of their forms and habits. In this way he began to learn the wonderful science of nature, never dreaming that one day in the wilds of Africa his knowledge would prove useful.

As the boy's mind grew he longed for other work than watching mill wheels. While spinning cotton was a useful work, he wanted to do for mankind something greater, something more lasting. In his father's books and papers on missionary work in China and India he read of the beauty of the country and the ignorance of the people, and thought he would like to be a missionary. The idea took a firm hold on his mind, but he doubted that he was the right person for the work. When he was about twenty years old, his mind was stirred by a sad tale which he read about the poor of China. The story of human suffering and wrong weighed so heavily upon him that he took his country walks alone and thought the matter over. Each morning he asked himself if he could do nothing to help, but night came with the question unanswered. One evening as he watched the sun set and heard a bird sing out its evening songs in the starlight the peace and beauty of such a lovely world made him wonder why men could ever want to cheat and rob and kill. In the depths of his sadness he remembered how in the quiet of the sunset hour Jesus had gone into an olive grove and there wept in bitter grief over the troubles of men. In a moment his mind was made up to imitate the life of Christ as far as he could. With a quick step and a light heart he went home and told his parents that he was going to Glasgow to college and learn to be a doctor, and then to the Far East to help the sick and to tell men how to make the world happier and better by imitating the life of Christ.

At once David began to save all he could from his earnings at the cotton mill. His chief need was money; and when at at last he went up to Glasgow, he and his father walked all the way and trudged the streets till a lodging was found that cost only two shillings a week. By spending his savings very carefully young Livingstone managed to keep at studies one whole winter; then he was forced to return to the cotton mill and make more money for another winter's training. Livingstone's idea was not to be ordained a regular missionary, teaching a special creed, but to go among the natives as a plain and simple man, trying by his daily life to do as Christ had done, hoping thus to win their love and lead hem to a noble life. But he yielded to advice and offered himself to the London Missionary Society. He was accepted and sent to Dugar for a three months' training among the missionary students; but do what he would, he could not learn to preach. One time he was sent to a neighboring parish with his sermon carefully prepared; but he could get no father than the text, and with a hasty apology fled from the pulpit. Accordingly he was sent back at the end of the three months with a bad report of his powers as a missionary; but one of the governors of the missionary society befriended him and insisted that he should have another trial. After three months more of study, his fitness was no longer doubted, and in the year 1840 he was formally ordained a missionary.

Meanwhile war had broken out in China and it was unsafe to go there. While waiting for peace young Livingstone went on with his medical studies, and took his degree as a physician and surgeon. As the war dragged on, rather than waste any time, he decided to go to Africa; and so on the 8th of December, 1840, David Livingstone set sail for the vast and unknown continent, into which he was to bring new light, new hope and new freedom.

GOOD NATURE BY RULE.

"Make all the sarcastic faces you like," said Minna to her best-beloved sister at the close of a hot discussion. "It doesn't improve your beauty though."

"What do you mean? I haven't made any face."

I don't know what you call it then. You threw up your head and looked like—this!"

"Horrors! I hope I couldn't look like that!"

It was the morning after a late frolic, and both girls were tired, nervous—not to say cross. Minna presently left the room feeling deeply injured. All the time she was dressing to go down town she brooded over the unpleasant scene, and even after she was seated in the alteration-rooms of the large department store where she was to have a fitting at eleven o'clock, her face still wore its cloud.

As she waited, she could not help noticing the bright smile and unfailing courtesy of a girl who sat at a desk directly in front of her, making appointments for customers as they came and went. There were impatient customers, unreasonable, complaining, demanding customers, but the sweetness in that young girl's voice and manner never faltered.

It was a rush season. Everybody in the department was working at high pressure; worn-looking girls with dismembered gowns and coats flung over their arms ran instead of walking to and from the workroom; and yet—this came to Minna with a sense of wonder—every one of them wore a pleasant expression as she hurried past. Every word spoken, even among themelves, was low voiced and gentle.

Just then Minna was called to her own appointment, and here too. a middle aged, faded-eyed woman welcomed her into the mirror-lined room with a smile.

"I wonder how it is," said Minna, when the fitting was half over, "that you all keep so pleasant? You must get tired and out of patience, and yet everybody smiles."

"You noticed that? It's from yesterday's lecture, I guess," the fitter answered, as she turned up the hem of the beautiful gown. "Once a week the head of the department gives us a half hour talk, and then's the time we get told of our faults. Yesterday 'twas all about looking pleasant and talking polite. Of course we know its against the rules to do anything else, but we forget sometimes."

"Do you mean to say there's a law requiring you to look and act pleasant no matter how you feel?"

"Sure! There'd be a different set around here if there wasn't."

"Well!" After a pause Minna added, under her breath, "I wish somebody'd make a law like that in my home—but no one would keep it."

The woman on her knees glanced up at the well groomed girl. She had a daughter herself, so she dared. "Why not make it yourself, and keep it—for one?" she suggested.

Minna Bartlett looked haughty. Then without warning she laughed.

"'Twould help some," she admitted—and her smile was almost as pleasant as that of any tired, overworked girl in the department.—Youth's Companion.

HOW JACK FROST WAS CHEATED OUT OF THE PARSLEY BED.

One Saturday morning two little girl friends who had been playing outside came into the house where the mother of one of the girls was busily engaged in the kitchen making a cake.

Jean said, "Oh Mama, what can we do?"

"Well, dearie," replied the mother, "do you know I was just thinking what a pity it would be if Jack Frost came along and destroyed my parsley bed, for it is so full of nice parsley. Now how would you and Olive like to sell the parsley for the missionary cause?"

Jean looked at Olive and said, "Would you like to, Olive?" and Olive answered "Oh, yes!" and both little girls clapped their hands and jumped up and down with glee and were only too glad to be doing something for the little children in the foreign land about whom they had so often heard.

Well, these two little girls and the mother started into the garden and picked a great quantity of nice fresh parsley, and came back to the kitchen where the parsley, with the help of willing hands midst childish prattle and happy hearts, was made into bunches. Then the little ones started out to make their sales among the neighbors with instructions to take not less than three cents a bunch, or as much over that as anyone was willing to give; also to state that it was for the missionary cause.

Three different times the little ones came back with beaming faces, excitedly exclaiming, "Mrs.—— gave me twenty-five cents for three bunches and Mrs. —— gave me ten cents for one bunch!" When the sales mere completed the little parsley girls had realized a profit of one dollar and thirty-eight cents.

Then mother said, "Didn't we cheat Jack Frost out of that parsley bed nicely?" The little ones said, "Yes, indeed," laughed joyously and ran out to their play happier for doing a little work for other's good.

A CLASS FOR CONSECUTIVE BIBLE STUDY.

The best way to read and study the Bible is to take it as it comes. The method used in the Sunday schools is very much better than no method, but it is not the best for a thorough acquisition of Bible knowledge.

It occurs to us that we may have among our readers a number who would join with others in reading the Bible through in an effort to learn more about it, if some way of communication were established.

If there are enough such to make it worth the space it would take the Herald will be glad to provide the means of communication by devoting space each week to this Bible School.

Let us hear at once from all such, and if there are enough, we will begin the work with the new year.

By reading eight minutes a day, we can read the Old Testament through in a year. It will take less than three minutes a day to read the New Testament through in a year. I propose that we devote a year to each of the Testaments.

We wish all who enter the class to do so with a serious purpose to learn the Bible. There will be no fees, and each student can ask one question each week on anything already passed over, but each one should agree to the following:

1. I will read each week the part of the Bible assigned, unless providentially prevented.

2. I will try to answer one question each week, if assigned to me.

We believe that all who enter upon this study and faithfully pursue it will be amply repaid for their time, and we hope to hear very soon from quite a number of our readers, saying that they will enter the class under the conditions named. We will publish the names of those enrolling, unless they request otherwise.

DR. DRINKHOUSE ON METHODIST UNION.

The future of this machine [the ecclesiastical system of the Methodist Episcopal Church] will continue to be marked with success, numerical and material; it is networking the globe; its missionary ventures are everywhere. And the greatest danger of the ecclesiasticism is in this direction. The overweening confidence of wealth, numbers and influence can be neutralized only by a modification of the machine. It is now working from within as well as from without. The framework of the original model is creaking. It is being seen that a "General Superintendency" is no longer practicable, and the districting of the college of bishops is called for by an imperious necessity, and with this accomplished the presiding eldership will be modified as an increasing excrescence, and a lay delegation will win its way so as to push it aside altogether. The Church is to be congratulated, and the modifying force in the working of a liberal system in the Methodist Protestant Church can afford to be denied recognition as such a force, and bide the time of its full vindication, not of its fathers only, but of the system itself they inaugurated. The genius of the hierarchic model, however, can never be changed in its entirety, and it is not needful for practical purposes of a working church that it should be, and liberal Methodism will ever remain so far diverse as to make successful combination impossible. So that what the Methodisms of broad America need—bating the Union in Canada, a mere province in space and numbers on a liberal anti-hierarchic basis—is not Union, meaning thereby absorption of the weaker by the stronger, but, as Bishop Fitzgerald of the Church South has so aptly put it, it needs the three F's, which he interpreted as Federation, Fraternity, and Forgiveness. For this his Church is ready, and it will never probably be ready for any thing else. For this the Methodist Protestant Church is ready, and it should never be ready for anything else. And dreamers who may suppose otherwise, if not warned by the failures of the past recorded in this History, and the damage wrought the Church by the tentation, will be warned, if ever officialism in it enters upon another illusive scheme of "Union," and should even succeed in arranging preliminaries, by the churches assuming their autonomy as never before, and declining to be ecclesiastically extinguished. It is an unwritten fact of the futile attempt of 1866 to unite with the Church South, that those who moved among the people in their congregational capacity could not fail to hear the undertone of protest, "If selling out is on the tapis, we propose to be at the sale." The only thing that dreamers of corporate Union with the Methodist Episcopal Church, North or South, can hope to accomplish in its last analysis will be the disintegration of the Methodist Protestant Church. It is a siren voice and should never be heeded.—History of Methodist Reform, Vol. II., pp. 546, 547.

"I think that while there is a Methodist Episcopal Church, there should also be a Methodist Protestant Church in this country."—Rev. Thomas McCormick.

PLANS FOR A REVIVAL MEETING IN GREENSBORO.

Preparatory to an evangelistic effort to be made in the spring, the ministerial association of this city have adopted the following resolutions:

1. That the month of January be devoted to special preparations and organization. 2. That each pastor have his official members and Sunday-school teachers make a list of every unconverted man, woman and child that they think their church should reach; with the address. That the pastors, from the names secured, shall make a complete alphabetical list and bring it to the Ministerial Association at our regular February meeting. 3. That on the 4th Sunday morning in January we have a complete exchange of pulpits, as far as possible, and that a committee be appointed from the association to make appointments for supply without public announcement as to who will preach at each church. 4. That in the afternoon of the above named Sunday at 3:30 o'clock, at the First Baptist Church, we have a special meeting for church officers and Sunday-school teachers, and others who desire to come, at which time a sermon be preached on "Soul Winning" by Rev. E. K. McLarty. 5. That the Ministerial Association at its meeting in January have a lively discussion on the "Exceeding Sinfulness of Sin." Rev. T. J. Ogburn to lead the discussion, and, if the association deem it wise, to discuss other fundamental themes at its regular meetings in February and March. 6. That each congregation hold at least one cottage prayer meeting a week during this period. 7. That each minister do what he can to get each family in his church to agree to hold family prayers and that the 5th Sunday in January be set apart as "Family Altar Day," and that this subject of revival in our churches be a matter of special prayer. 8. That each Monday morning at 11 a. m. the Ministerial Association meet for a half hour prayer service. 9. That each pastor emphasize congregational singing of evangelistic hymns. 10. That the Association appoint a committee to present a petition to the merchants, most earnestly requesting that they close their stores at 9 o'clock on Saturday nights, after January 1, so that all clerks may get a good night's rest and feel like giving themselves to active service on the Lord's Day, the pastors agreeing to urge their congregations to do their shopping earlier in the day. 11. That every pastor ask their congregations to refrain from posting or receiving mail on the Lord's Day. 12. That a committee be appointed to express our appreciation for the valuable help and kindness of the press in the past, and that we most earnestly solicit their co-operation during this campaign, and that this same committee advertise our meetings in every legitimate way. 13. That a committee be appointed to confer with the heads of our educational institutions, laying before them our plans and seeking through them the most hearty co-operation of all teachers associated with them. 14. That a committee be appointed to lay this matter before the colored preachers and ask that they unite with our evangelistic efforts. 15. That each pastor use tracts and personal letters during this campaign. 16. That a program of work be placed in the hands of each minister.

The following chairmen of committees were appointed: To make appointments for exchange, C. E. Hodgin; to visit merchants, E. K. McLarty; on advertisement, W. F. Staley; to visit educational institutions, Melton Clark; to secure co-operation of colored ministers, S. S. Myrick.

The ministers will consult with their congregations and arrange for services to be held by laymen during this month or the first of January.

BEST LETTER OF THE WEEK.

Our mail man brings us many interesting letters and papers. But the best letter of the past week was a very short one. It came from a man of deeds rather than of words. It contained only two or three lines, telling how to apply the $102.50 which came with the letter; viz. $100 to the College Endowment Building Fund, $1.50 to a subscription to the Methodist Protestant, and 1.00 to a subscription to the Methodist Protestant Herald. The author of this good letter was Bro. W. N. Brown of Mt. Zion and Pinnacle circuit. We wish our church had a thousand men like him in North Carolina. We thank him for his encouraging help in the enterprises of the Methodist Protestant Church. He is a Methodist Protestant through and through, loves his church and believes in it. May God reward him fittingly for his devotion.

—The N. C. Farmers' Union met here yesterday. Hundreds of delegates came. The sessions were held at the State Normal College. The object of the union is the development of agricultural resources and the improvement and uplift of life on the farm. One special aim is the establishment of county agricultural schools.

—W. P. Herndon, of Greensboro, and Miss Nell Edna Philips, formerly of Graham, were married at the home of Rev. A. G. Dixon in High Point on Monday last.

—Revs. G. F. Millaway, J. H. Bowman, and R. L. Melton were called to the federal court here last week as witnesses.

—Last Sunday night a negro named Will Smith burglarized a house here. Within 48 hours he had been arrested, tried, and sentenced to the penitentiary for 20 years. He plead guilty to burglary in second degree rather than take his chances at the electric chair.

—The death of Brother Stephen Forrest brings a great loss to our church. He was one of the pillars of the new church at Efland, which will feel his loss keenly. A former pastor said of him, "He was a good man." That is a g[reat] deal to say of one, and he said it wi[th] full meaning.

—Mr. Terry D. Sharpe went to Washington on Tuesday night on a new business for him—to meet a matrimonial engagement. He marries Miss Gertrude Colerider. He will live on E. Washington St., this city.

—Mr. Guy Hunter is to be married on the 20th. He goes to New Orleans for his bride. She is Miss Effie Cobb.

—The commission of our church and the two Methodist Episcopal churches held a three days' meeting in Baltimore, beginning Nov. 30. The meetings were not public, and it is difficult to judge how far from an agreement the commissions were in the end. They decided to appoint a joint committee of nine (three from each church) to try further to work out a basis of agreement. This committee is to meet in Chattanooga, Tenn., next spring The three members from our church are Drs. Lewis and Jennings and Bro. S. R. Harris.

S. T. Forest.

On Tuesday, December 6th, 1910, death entered our community and took from us Stephen T. Forrest, and his home, his church, and the people at large are mourning the loss of this good man. When one is taken who has lived and worked for the good of his whole community, unselfishly striving to help all the better interests of the people, we keenly feel the loss for there are so few of this type. But such a man was S. T. Forrest. He was interested in the educational work of his County and for several years served as a member of the board of education, doing good work for this cause. He was also interested in the material development of his community and did much to help improve it.

But it was as a churchman that we think of him most, for it was there he did the best work of his life. He united with the M. P. Church at Chestnut Ridge in his early life and remained a member there until the Efland Church was organized, when he transferred his membership to this Church. It was through his influence and with his means, more than any other one, that this church was built. Always liberal, the pastor never appealed in vain for his financial support in any church enterprise. He gave not only his means, but what is far greater, his life, his love, to the church. He had served as Sunday school Supt. and at the time of his death was trustee, and leader of the men's prayermeeting. The young men looked to him for counsel, the children loved him as a father.

The funeral was attended by a large concourse of people. We laid his body to rest in the Chestnut Ridge Cemetery after services at the church. Six young men of the prayer meeting served as pall bearers. It was with sad hearts we gathered 'round his grave; but we hope to see him again in that home which God has prepared for his people.

Death of Mrs. L. I. Hine.

"There is one more beacon along the shore.
That lies beyond the grave
Where Barque's are moored to sail no more.
Across life's troubled wave."

At her home in Old Town on the eve of the 10th of December, the death angel came and claimed all that was mortal of Mrs. L. I. Hine, and she departed to the realms of joy and peace and eternal rest, "beyond the River, the beautiful river where we shall gather by and by." She was paralyzed for a few days and the disease did its work swiftly and surely and now as we try to recount the many virtues of this saintly woman our pen falters and we know not how to begin. Having known her intimately for more than thirty years in all that time we saw in her character nothing but goodness, purity and righteousness and to know that we shall see her no more in this "vale of tears," that she will no more dispense her gentle charities among the poor and the lowly, that her voice can no more cheer the weary and brokenhearted makes us sad indeed and our tears flow unbidden. Mrs. Hine successfully ignored the claims of "Society" as a woman of wealth, and spent her life in doing good to others meekly and quietly day by day, watching for opportunities to bless and comfort those with whom she came in contact and seemed always ready to cheerfully do her Master's will. Her husband preceded her to the spirit land five years ago, and to him our Winston church is indebted for our comfortable parsonage which was a gift from him. Indeed, his liberality made it possible for our church to exist in its earliest years and he will always be kindly remembered by our Church and people. Mrs. Hine was in her 82nd year. She leaves two children: Mr. Luther Hine of Old Town and Mr. Gilbert Hine of Winston-Salem. They are both Christian gentlemen of the higest type and seem to have inherited the many virtues of their rare and excellent parents. Mrs. Hine's only daughter, Mrs. Ernest Dalton, died about 20 years ago in all the vigor and beauty of young womanhood and while Mrs. Hine tried to be submissive to the will of her Heavenly Father when the awful blow fell upon her yet she never fully seemed to fully recover from the stroke. Her chief joy seemed in talking of her child and how sure she was of meeting her in Heaven. Her funeral was conducted from the home of her son, Mr. Luther Hine, on the morning of the 12th of December. Rev. G. F. Millaway officiating assisted by Bishop Rondthaler of the Salem Moravian Church. Bro. Millaway preached a brief and beautiful sermon from the text, "Well done, good and faithful servant, etc. A large audience attended the last sad rites as they laid her to rest besile her husband in the Bethabara Cemetery near her home. Mrs. Hine had lived with her son some distance from Winston, but never moved her membership from our church here and contributed liberally to all its interests as long as she lived. And now, dear mother in Israel, as thou art with God and the angels we will press toward the mark and strive more earnestly for the crown that awaits the pure and the good over there.

"At the crystal river's brink
Some sweet day by and by,
We shall find each broken link,
Some sweet day by and by."

Resolutions in Memory of Mr. D. Frank Lamb.

Adopted by the Methodist Protestant Sunday School, Burlington, N. C.

Whereas, God in his infinite wisdom hath called from earth to the abode of the blest one of our beloved members, Bro. D. Frank Lamb, therefore, be it Resolved:

First: That while we mourn one lost to us, we meekly bow in submission to Him who does for His children only what is best.

Second: That while his bodily presence has gone from us, a rich heritage is left us in the sacred memory of his life, whose strength of character endeared him to all who knew him.

Third: That this Sunday School tenders to his dear ones their sincerest sympathy and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to his loved ones, a copy recorded in the minutes of the Sunday School, and a copy sent to the Methodist Protestant Herald, and the city papers for publication.

Nettie Sue Holland, the infant child of Brother and Sister Frank Holland, died at the age of 3 months, and 15 days, on Nov. 11. They are deeply grieved at their loss. The funeral services were conducted in the home on the following day by the writer; after which the remains were interred at Rocky Ridge Cemetery, near Concord, N. C. May the God of grace comfort the sorrowing parents!

The infant child of Brother and Sister S. H. Teeter, of Concord, passed away early on the morning of Nov. 16, at 4 days of age. The remains were taken to Rocky Ridge for interment, in the afternoon. May the oil of comfort be poured upon the hearts of the parents!

Mrs. Lou Anna Edwards, of Concord, N. C., entered the valley of death on Dec. 4, at the age of 49 years, 2 months and 13 days. Sister Edwards had been sick scarcely two weeks. Only two weeks before her death, Lolo her daughter, had died. Her death following so soon afterward makes it very sad. Sister Edwards had professed faith in Christ in her days of young womanhood, and joined the M. E. Church. When she came to Concord, she did not bring her church letter, but left her name on the register of the old home church. During the last hours of her suffering she was heard to utter the words: "Dear Jesus, take me now." The funeral services were conducted in the home in Dec. 5, by the writer, after which the interment was made at Rocky Ridge Cemetery. May our Heavenly Father comfort the husband, the children, and all the sorrowing relatives!

Mildred Verble, the child of Brother J. S. Verble and Sister Mary Verble of Kannapolis. N. C., was called by the angel of Death, on Dec. 5, at the age of one year, 10 mos. and 24 days. Deep is the sorrow of the parents, to give up their child, after a sickness which lasted about three months. Yet they rejoice that she suffers no more. The funeral services were held in the Presbyterian Church at Bala Mill on Dec. 6, where interment of the remains was made in the cemetery. They have the sympathy of their friends. May they have the comfort of our God!

OUR MISSION IN CHINA.

One year ago the Woman's Missionary Society increased its work by re-entering China to engage in missionary effort. Upon advise, the society sought counsel from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions and petitioned that board to select for the society a desirable location. Three stations were given to make choice from. Kalgan, a station of the North China Mission was selected by the society.

This station was first opened as a mission field in 1866, by Rev. J. T. Gulick. Four missionaries and their families have labored here during these years. Rev. W. P. Sprague entered upon the work in 1874 and has just vacated the field after a service of many years.

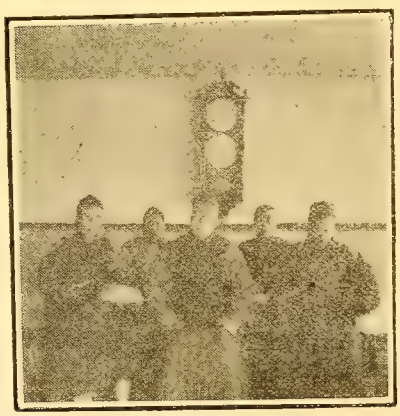
The city of Kalgan is the most Northern Mission of China, unless we except some missionary work which is being carried on among the Mongols.

In the old house-boat days it required a week or more to reach this city from Peking. Since the railroad has been extended into this Northern country it is an easy journey of eight hours. This railroad is on the main line into Mongolia and gives to this country a powerful stimulus. The great wall of China extends around the boundaries of Kalgan. It has always been regarded as a fortress from invasion into China. Kalgan has a population of eighty thousand men and twenty thousand women and gives great promise of becoming the commercial city and gateway into the Mongolian country.

Some may wonder why so many more men than women are found in this section. Kalgan is becoming the Mecca of China for men seeking new avenues for business enterprises. The grazing lands of the Mongols are being purchased by these emigrant Chinese people and they are rapidly cultivating them. The Mongols never plow any land. So this is virgin soil and is being worked to great advantage. These emigrants, if we may so call them, in leaving their temples and their graves are very susceptible to new influences which they here encounter. It is as much like our new west, as anything in China could be like anything in America. Kalgan is not the isolated city it once was. The telegraph, daily mail and railroads are now there.

This is the situation of the country and surroundings as we find it to day. The American Board has through its able missionaries labored here since 1866, and much good work has been accomplished. There has always been an inadequate force of people for the work to be done. Considerable property interest has been acquired in these years. The compound has a couple of acres of land, with two foreign brick houses. There is a long row of houses for helpers and servants, and the chapel is also in this row; but this is only a temporary arrangement. There is a native house of five rooms with board floor which a helper is now occupying. There is a boy's school building, but now occupied by the girl's school, and this arrangement will probably be permanent and the new building will be the boy's school. Adjacent to the compound is the hospital site, now used as a potato growing field. In the city proper there is a well equipped dispensary with a house or two for native helpers. A Sunday-school has been opened in this building. At two of the out-stations chapel buildings are owned. There is a weekday school connected with one of the chapels. In 1900 during the Boxer uprising, this compound with the buildings was destroyed, the missionaries escaping through the desert of Gobi in Siberia. Money received from the Chinese Indemnity fund has restored most of the buildings with the exception of the hospital and boy's school. So the present buildings are comparatively new. Kalgan so long in accessible by easy travel and the cold climate in winter has been considered a hard field to work. Missionaries and native Christians have often been discouraged by the insufficient force of workers. The American Board has never been in a position to equip this station with necessary workers or to expend the amount of money required and the interest has not advanced, as perhaps it might have, if conditions had been different. It is an inviting field and the outlook is promising for aggressive work. The W. F. M. S. chose this great field for its endeavor and asked from the American Board the privilege of equipping this station with educated and trained workers to tell to these people the simple story of the gospel of Christ.

Home of Mr. Heininger.



Kalgan Preachers and Teachers.

Rev. Charles S. Heininger has already been sent out. His life is an open book for the church. Strong, loyal, diligent, though he may be, he cannot battle alone. October 25th, Miss Lula B. McKinney, of Swayzee, Indiana, left this country to join Mr. Heininger in Tientsin, China, where they will be married and together they will work and wait for reinforcement.

Last year was spent by Mr. Heininger in study of the Chinese language at Tungchou college. Since entering upon the active duties of missionary at Kalgan, schools have re-opened and new hope has entered into the band of faithful Christian people for a leader is among them.

The Boys' School-house, Kalgan.

The union of two or more mission boards merging their interests into one good substantial school and chapel seems to auger well for the future. Several boards have already united forces throughout the Empire for the advancement of higher education, forming what is known as the North China Educational Union. The Congregational London Mission, and the Presbyterian Missions, are showing striking manifestations of this new spirit of union.

Will the church adopt this mission for its own and give to it our far-spreading gospel? Chang Yun Chi, president of the Commercial Press of Shanghai, advocates Christianity as a state religion for his country. Will we be helpers to hasten the work of Christianizing these people?

We are occupying this field and have use of these buildings on the same terms as the missionaries of the American Board at a merely nominal rent, only enough to keep up the repairs.

Surely we could not ask for anything more magnanimous.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

A MONUMENTAL WORK.

The latest and most comprehensive exposition of the entire Foreign Missionary enterprise is contained in the reports of the eight commissions and the discussions thereon in the great and memorable Conference held in Scotland last June. Missionary leaders, administrators, experts, missionaries, statesmen, officers, travelers, formed an unrivaled corps of workers who patiently toiled for two years in gathering, supplying, preparing the vast material from which the exhaustive reports were made.

The discussions were of a high order, as would be expected from the representative character of the assembly, and threw additional light upon the important phases of the tremendous task of the world's evangelization. No where else can such a fund of information be secured, information that is accurate, extensive and inspiring, as is contained in these nine volumes which sell for $5.00 the set at our Baltimore Book Concern, 316 N. Charles street.

A number of our pasters ordered sets through me, and I am sure that they are more than satisfied with their purchase.

May I suggest that a set would make a most appropriate gift to your pastor. I know one who is thus to be favored by his friends.

The Gladsome Season.

The coming of Christmas is heralded by the variety and beauty of the things specially arranged for the little folks.

The young people at school, and those from home are planning and anticipating the joy of home going and good times at hand.

The editor of the church paper, the preacher, the Sunday Sshool worker are all thinking of and working for the special issue, the sermon, the lesson. The whole world is beginning to think of Christmas, for the Christ now occupies the preeminent place in the world's thought and the agencies and forces he started are moulding men and developing nations, and bringing nearer the practial realization of the brotherhood of man.

The movement is onward to a higher type of manhood, a grander cilvilization, and the reign of peace.

That which differentiates the nations to-day is Christianity, for where it is dominant, and the Bible is in the homes of the people, and religious liberty is a reality, there we find the greatest knowledge, the highest standard of comfort, the best laws, the finest product of the brain and brawn of men, and much else which characterizes the most advanced peoples of the earth.

We should remember that the Christ made all this possible, and uppermost in our mind should be the thought of God's gift of his Son as a Saviour, and our duty to make Him known as such to all people. Not merely to celebrate the day in theformal service of the church and school and C. E. Society, nor give and receive tokens of esteem,and enjoy the good things on the table, but to give expression to our gratitude to God for his great goodness, and our sympathy for the heathen who know not the Christ and the joys of salvation by making a special Christmas offering, for Foreign Missions.

Brother pastor, why not utilize this favorable opportunity to raise your Assessment for Foreign Missions? The money is urgently needed. Make an earnest effort to get the whole amount. Brother Superintendent, ought we not to teach the young the true idea of Christmas? You can do that by having your school make a Christmas offering. Announce it next Sunday, work up an interest, strive for a large offering. We depend upon you. Relief must come or important interests will suffer. Fred C. Kline, Cor. Sec.-Treas. 316 N. Charles St., Baltimore, Md.

COMMUNION SEASON AT NODOA

There is excitement and commotion in the compound at Nodoa. Next Sabbath is communion or "big Sabbath" as the Christians call it. The church blankets must be aired and counted, bowls and chopsticks must be washed, and rice bought. The last is a hard proposition, for who knows just how many people are coming? We will consult A Ka-o-Ko, the gate watchman. He is an ex-opium smoker, from the district where a number of inquirers live. He is the head of his family, a family at one time of some importance, and he has left ancestral home and relatives to cast in his lot with Christians. He answers our inquiry by telling of this one and that one who are coming and they will bring others. "Yes, there will be a number here, but as to how many, who knows?"

Our plan is to invite all interested in the doctrine and willing to study, to come and spend three days preceding Communion Sabbath with us. They "eat us;" that is the Native Church furnishes rice and vegetables twice a day—very plain food. It is as far removed from their idea of a feast, as bread, butter nd tea would be from ours. Our wish is that food for the soul, not for the body, may be their aim in coming. Even so, they come. By twos and threes, ponyback and afoot, even in chairs, they come. Many have been here before, many are coming for the first time, trailing behind one of the colporteurs, for until their name is enrolled in our book some one must be responsible for them. The first call is for hot water baths, and let any one who thinks the Hakka are not a cleanly people stand outside the kitchens and bath-houses and hear the demands made on the cooks for hot water and wash-basins. It is amusing to listen to the comments. "Where is that big lamp that is just like a star?"

"Oh, no," replies another, "they make a light as bright as a star and hang it up in the sky."

"Where is the machine that makes kerosene?"

"Who ever heard of a pump? Let us go and try it; we never heard of that way of getting water out of a well." Each one cries "Let me try it," and each one gives the pump handle a jerk, and this is done so many times that the mechanic of the Station will have an hour or two of extra work after they are gone.

Now it is time for evening service, and the people troop into the chapel; some with babies on their backs, some dragging a little urchin—without him they could not come; most of them with hymn-books, and all with a keen desire to learn. The old Lim-ko woman, who was away on the other side of the compound among the flowers, had to be called several times. She innocently asked if Heaven would be "better than this," meaning more beautiful than our flowers and trees.

What a mixture of languages we have! When I am tired, it makes my head reel. The service is almost always conducted in three dialects. A talk by the foreigner in Hainanese is translated into Hakka, and again into Lim-ko. Often the good brethren have many things to say and it is late before the meeting is over. Then blankets are given out, sleeping places assigned and, as Mrs. Melrose says, "the church is put to bed." We do not in every case accomplish this satisfactorily. One morning I met one of our older sisters with a face as long as my arm, and to my cheerful greeting she replied gruffly: "That blanket you gave me last night was very thin. I did not like my bed-fellows and I am going home."

For study, our people are divided into classes both in respect to language and their knowledge of the gospel. Classes in Catechism, in New Testament, in Old Testament, preparing for baptism, learning the very simplest truths, are interspersed with meetings in chapel and little gatherings for prayer or singing. So it goes through the day, and evidently some of the instructors are very zealous, for we found, posted in one of the study rooms, this inscription: "If any one will not study the doctrine, neither shall he eat."

Saturday the crowd increases, for Christians who live a long distance away must come to stay over night, or they would not be in time for Sunday service. How many now, A Ka-o-Ko? One hundred and two ate supper," he answers. That is in addition to our one hundred and twenty school children, as always with us. Our compound fairly hums, and so do our heads. One wants a blanket, one a book, another hot water; one inquires how much it costs to put a child in school, and can children of Christians come for less than outsiders? Another wishes to discuss some points of Christian customs, for instance: "Should a Christian have anything to do with village processions and feasts?"

Now it is the "big Sabbath." The chapel is crowded, the narrow aisles are filled with benches and still they crowd in at the door. Service begins, the Christians joining lustily in familiar hymns, "Just as I am," and "He leadeth me." Five men come forward to be baptized —a Lim-ko farmer, a Mandarin soldier, a Hainanese business man, two Hakkas. Two of the five are from near by, the others from a long distance. Strangers to each other up to this time, they are now brothers forevermore. There is a solemnity, that is not always so pronounced, when these men take the vows upon themselves. Chinese in far-away Hainan? Yes; and your brothers and mine struggling, even as we struggle, towards the true light.

Another service in the evening. Afterward the catechumens disperse, and we settle down for another two months.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Concord.

We are busy getting ready for our Christmas entertainment which will be given on the night of Dec. 24. We are expecting a program of interest.

We were glad to have Bro. D. A. Braswell preach for us at Fairview Church on last Sunday; and to assist in raising some of the church debt at that place. Also were glad to have him worship with us at night at Concord.

We are hoping and praying for a year of success. A. Oscar Lindley.

Rehoboth, Albemarle Ct.

Dear Herald:

We are like many others, admiring your name, and hope you will inspire new life and zeal among our people, that the coming year may bring an awakening in all churches, thrilling the people with a determination to do and dare. As we failed to receive a full report of Conference, our paper being lost, we have wondered whether we will have any pastor, no one having given us any information, and we are puzzled to know why silence reigns supreme.

The 3rd Sunday in November we observed a special Thanksgiving service by the Sunday school. The children acquitted themselves very creditably, and the address by our faithful superintendent, Mr. W. J. Cahoon, was inspiring. There was an offering of potatoes, etc., and a small collection for the benefit of our Orphanage. The decorations of the farm product was very artistic, and we regretted the attendance was so small.

For over two years there has not been any Sunday school here, and last April a few of the anxious members saw the possibility of reviving the school, and Mr. W. J. Cahoon who has been a most active superintendent in years gone by, accepted the appointment and is more active than any man we know of.

The undermining opposition which rose from some prejudiced minds not members here, did much harm for a while, but we are praying for an old-time revival to sweep through this community and give us even more than of yore.

Our S. S. organized with twelve members and now numbers 23; and, strange to say, that with the exception of two girls, the children are all from members of the Disciple church. This is a strange, deplorable state of affairs, and a work worthy of special attention.

We are preparing for a special Christmas service and tree to keep the children interested. They are still happy over the gift of candy and handkerchiefs they received at the Thanksgiving service from the Supt. and Secy.

There are great possibilities here, and we so often hear expressions of love and interest with reference to the happy days at Rehobeth. Our people love to have their pastor among them, and his presence means more in such an isolated rural district that other places where there is more to promote sociality.

We ask your prayerful interest in behalf of the entire work.

With best wishes.

Callie W. Tarkinton.

Bethesda, Yadkin College Ct.

Since our last report the health of our community has been improving. Mr. Fred Leonard is getting along very well, we hope.

Our first quarterly conference met at Bethesda Saturday, Dec. 10th, all of the churches being represented except Yadkin College. The business of the conference was transacted in harmony. The pastor's salary was fixed at $700.00 and apportioned to each church.

Our pastor, being called off on Sunday to conduct the funeral of Mr. Cicero Kepley, held at Beulah Reform Church, the hour of preaching was changed from 11 o'clock until 2:30 P. M. As usual, our pastor gave us a very good sermon, speaking mainly to the newly elected officials of the beginning of the new year's work. We hope that this year will be one of the best spiritually and financially that has been.

May many blessings come to all.

Chas. M. Yokley, Rep.

Our new pastor, Rev. J. H. Bowman, preached his first sermon for us 2nd Sunday night to a large congregation and we are all delighted with him. His sermon was a good one.

The ladies are preparing a Christmas entertainment for the children, and we hope to have Bro. Bowman with us on that occasion and give us an address.

Best wishes for the M. P. Herald.

The first quarterly conference will be held Saturday before the 3rd Sunday in January, 1911. It is very important and we want all the officials present if possible..

C. E. M. Raper.

Bethel, Alamance Ct.

We were very much pleased to hear that our most esteemed pastor, Rev. W. M. Pike, is returned to us. We are looking forward prayerfully to the work and trust that much good may be done.

Our Sunday-school is still thriving and we are preparing for a Christmas tree.

The most enjoyable event of the season was held at the home of Mr. J. A. Foust last Wednesday night when our young Supt., Mr. J. D. Foust, brought home his bride. She was Miss Maud Hunter, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of Mr. Clarence Hunter, of Graham. Not being present, it is impossible to give particulars, but those present report a very pleasant time and just such a supper as Mrs. Foust knows how to prepare was enjoyed by all.

Among those who were present were Mr. and Mrs. O. N. Horniday, of Oakdale, Mr. W. A. Foust and family, Messrs. Peter Foust and John Holt and Miss Bettie Holt, of Bethel, Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Foust and son, of Green Hill Academy, Miss Lizabel Foust, of Guilford College, and Miss Hunter, sister of the bride, and Lalah McAdams of Graham.

We wish for Mr. and Mrs. Foust many pleasant, happy years. We are expecting Mr. Foust to give us even better service as Supt. than formerly, if that is possible, because he has a help-meet. We most heartily welcome Mrs. Foust to our neighborhood and Sunday-school.

Bethel Academy opened Nov. 21 with Miss Lalah Stallings, of Foushee, principal and Miss Aska Zachary, assistant. The school has about 60 students and is progressing nicely. The people are well pleased and the students are perfectly devoted to their teachers, and are doing good work. The school bids fair to be one among the best ever taught at Bethel.

We somewhat regret the change in name of our church paper. We love the dear Church Record, but hope 'tis all for the best. We are going to love our church paper anyway. Much success to it and its readers.

Friendship Church, Hay River Ct.

We are glad to welcome Bro. Raper back for our pastor again. He filled his regular appointment at Friendship last Sunday and preached a helpful and uplifting sermon which every one seemed to enjoy—His text was Acts 3: 6: "Then Peter said, silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee." May the Lord help each one of us as Christians to feel that we all have a work to do though, like Peter, we may not have silver or gold, yet we can give such as we have by kind acts, kind words, and encouraging others to do good. Never let an opportunity pass to do good. We shall need encouragment as we go through life. We need to enourage our pastor: when he preaches us a sermon that helps us, tell him so; that helps him; when you feel like saying amen, say it. We believe all churches have some weak members who need encouragment, many times one kind word might help them change their course. Always say what we have to say, to them and never talk to others about them unless we can say something good. As this is the beginning of a new Conference year, may the Lord help each one of us to feel as Christ did: That we must be about our Father's business, and, as our pastor seems to have new life, may the Lord help us as a church to take on new life and try to do just what God would have us do.

We have had quite a good S. S.during the year and hope to have a good attendance an Xmas day. Will have an address by Bro. E. O. Pritchett.

Brother, sister, pray more, work more for the salvation of souls and upbuilding of God's kingdom and the Lord will certainly give us many blessings.

Burlington.

Last Sunday there were 220 present at Sunday School, and the collection was $3.02. The S. S. decided to have its Christmas Exercise on Monday evening, Dec. 26. The election of officers for the ensuing six months will be held next Sunday. We hope that those who are best qualified for the various offices may be elected.

The Ladies' Aid Society will have a bazaar next Thursday in the Keck building on Main St. They will have many useful articles for sale and will serve refreshments of various kinds. We wish them much success.

A Rally Conference.

The 1st quarterly Conference for Flat Rock circuit is to be held in Flat Rock church on Friday, January the 6th. Rev. T. J. Ogburn will be with us and will preach at 11 o'clock. The Conference will follow. We want to make this Conference a rally Conference. It is hoped and urged that every official will be present and as many others as possibly can. Remember the date, Jan. 6th, 1911. The meeting to be held "rain or shine." Don't fail to be present at 11 o'clock sharp to get your part of a sermon we all need.

BE READY.

Jesus thus commands us: "Be ye there-And in that way they continued until girded about, and your lights burning. The foolish virgins had no oil in their vessels with their lamps. They were not ready.

Gird your loins about with truth; true principles, true acts. Your good conduct will be a light around you that will protect you. For evil fears the light.

Be ready, for Jesus will come suddenly. At midnight the cry may be raised, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh."

If you are ready you can work better, more comfortably and restfully. Being ready shows respect for the Lord who commands you to watch. When the "Captain of the Lord's Host" makes the round of the camp of his soldiers let him find you awake.

It was a grief to Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane, when he found his desciples sleeping, whom he had commanded to watch. Be ready.

DUTY.

Some Christians do not like the word "duty," because it has a hard and cold sound. D. L. Moody used to object to the use of this term in reference to religious life. He did not like to hear people talk about the duty of prayer or reading the Bible or worship. He insisted that we should do these and all other things that ought to be done from the noble impulse of love. Love is a warmer, sweeter word than duty.

But duty and love are inseparable. Duty is a debt, and doing duty is paying one's debts. Love is a debt, the one all comprehending duty. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself. On these two hang all the law and the prophets." "Love is the fulfilling of the law."

We are all indebted to God. He is the Author of all our mercies. "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?" and Jesus answers, "Render unto God the things that are God's" Render unto Him thanksgiving and praise and honor and worship. All these are due and more. We owe Him ourselves. We are His. We shall never fulfill this precept until we have rendered and surrendered ourselves unto Him.

My gracious Lord, I own Thy right
To every service I can pay.
And call it my supreme delight
To hear Thy dictates and obey.

We are indebted to our country. For protection, for civil liberty, for educational advantages, for opportunity to make an honest living, where none dares to molest or make us afraid, and for all the tremendous sacrifices these inestimable treasures have cost, we are indebted to our country. No one can escape from the loyal and patriotic service of his country in war and peace without running away from plain duty.

We are indebted to the Church. What would become of our homes if the churches were removed? What sort of a country would this be without the churches? Whether church members or not, we are indebted to the Church, and the debt is so great we can never fully pay it. We owe the Church loyal support. By our presence in the house of God in time of worship, by our sympathy and by our money we must support the Church as a matter of duty. Few people consider the support of the Church a duty. When they give money into the treasury of the Church they do not regard it as the payment of a debt, but a sort of gratuity. They feel at perfect liberty to give or not give, to go or not go, to talk the Church up or down, according to their mood, without incurring any guilt. But they are wrong.

We are indebted to our parents. "Honor thy father and thy mother." We are indebted to our neighbors. Whether they have done anything for us or not, we are greatly indebted to them. There is a debt of love as well as justice. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor." "We love him because he first loved us." This is said of God. But it is not said of our neighbor "We love him because he first loved us." We are not commanded to love him and help him because he has done so much for us. He may have done nothing for us. He may have done much against us. He may hate us and persecute us. He may be our enemy. Still we are indebted to him. "Love your enemies," said Jesus. Jesus loved those who did nothing for Him but persecute Him and put Him to death.

There is nothing in life which is not under the law of duty. We cannot set off a small section of life and say, "My duties are all here, and for the rest, there is no obligation." In business life, in social life, in political life, in all of life we must acknowledge our duty, find it and perform it.

We may be perplexed to know what is our duty at times. But God will not leave us to walk in darkness. Not that we may expect a distinct message from heaven for each particular step which will save us the trouble of searching the Scriptures and making use of our own judgment. But one who commits the keeping of his soul and life fully to God, and diligently searches the Scriptures to find the right way, will not be suffered to walk in darkness. "Thou shalt hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it." Let any man who earnestly desires to know his duty and do it, turn aside from men for a season and be alone with God, and his doubts will be scattered and the way made plain before his face.

Walk in the light and thou shalt own
Thy darkness passed away,
Because that light hath on Thee shone
In which is perfect day.

—N. Y. Advocate.

RESPECT THE MOTHER.

Mark the young man who is coarse and disrespectful to his mother. No roseate pathway can be hers who shall sustain to him the relations of wife. Not the happiest will be the lot of those who shall come to be his children. Not to be envied is the neighborhood even in which he must be reckoned as a citizen. It does not matter what the mental stature of that mother is, how old, how bent, how decrepit, the man to whom she is mother owes to her gentleness, kindness, tenderness and consideration. Did she fall back and did the children, by means of superior advantages, pass her in her race? But think of the toil and trial, her devotion and denial, her mind and her years that she gave that the children might derive the benefit. Think of her sacrifice; no wonder if she fell behind, with her heart in her home, in the buds that were hers. There is no rank, no station, no condition, that may exempt a manly man from a kind regard for his mother.—The Weekly Bouquet.

LEARNING TO STUDY THE BIBLE.

Many a reader of the Bible confesses with some discouragement that, to him, the Book has not the interest and the helpfulness that others say they find in it. What can be done for such a one? A New Jersey reader is deeply concerned about herself, in this difficulty. She writes:

"There is so much said these days about Bible study. I have been told 'The Spirit uses the Word as his special instrument as a means of grace.' The Bible is God's Word. He must have a message for me individually. Again and again have I sought for that message, only to find the Bible a sealed book, the key to which I am unable to find. ——'s Outline Studies were advised and the course taken, but they did not answer the purpose.

Can you, in your Notes on Open Letters, help me to a way of study? I want especially to learn and hear and know God's voice speaking to me, and the message he brings, so that I may grow more like him whom to know is love, that my will shall be his will, and my service more gladly rendered."

To learn how to study the Bible is one of the most costly things that any one can attempt. But it is within the reach of every one who will attempt it in entire readiness to pay the whole cost: and every one can do this who will.

The first price we must pay is nothing less than ourselves: the complete surrender of self and all that we have unto God's will. Many a Christian, who has honestly repented of sin and accepted Christ as Savior, nevertheless has not surrendered the entire life, body, mind, soul and spirit, every interest, desire, purpose, and aspiration, unto God in Christ, making Christ the Master of the whole present life as well as Savior for the life to come. But until this is done we cannot even know God's will for us in its completeness, nor can the Holy Spirit give us the full and satisfying message of God's Word.

Obedience to every known detail of God's will for us is another essential. Not sinless perfection is meant by this; but the honest, complete, and habitual purpose to do God's will in every thing so far as we know at present. A single conscious and habitual departure from God's will, in omission or commission, can seal up the springs of our spiritual life, block the Holy Spirit, and make our Bible study almost meaningless.

Prayer as an invariable preliminary to and accompaniment of our Bible study cannot safely be disregarded. The Bible is God's Word, and its real message is wholly beyond the mere intellect of man. He who supposes that he can understand it without the direct and superhuman aid and action of the Holy Spirit is effectively insuring himself against receiving the full message that God would give him from its pages. Let us recognize this; and let us recognize that prayer for the Holy Spirit's interpretation to us of what we are about to read in the Bible, whenever we turn to it, is not merely a helpful accompaniment of Bible study, but an absolute essential to the fulness of its blessings.

The principle of complete obedience to God's will as a life-habit comes directly and vitally into play as part of our Bible study. We must obey what we find in the Bible. This practice alone has made an utterly new thing of Bible study to some: to read in the Bible until coming to some sentence or suggestion that has a practical application to one's life; then to close the Book, ask God to enable us to obey him in that thing, and go and do it. The new messages of the Bible to us multiply as we obey those that we find there.

Habit and system are also vital to the Bible study that blesses the life. No normal day is complete without its time specially set apart for Bible study for personal nourishment. This cannot be done in five minutes; and it cannot be done with much blessing at a fag end of the day, or when our strength has been pretty well used up by other things. In other words, the "Morning Watch" plan, giving at least half an hour at the beginning of the day, preferably before breakfast, to Bible study and prayer, has proved by experience to be one of the most richly blessed of practises in the lives of thousands. The best that God can offer us—himself indirect communion through prayer and his Word—is surely entitled to the best part of our day and the best of our strength and attention. With most of us, that best is in the early morning.

Bible study on this basis is costly, is it not? But is there anything here that is beyond the reach of any one, or that one can safely call unnecessery? If we disregard any of these principles, and our Bible study is barren, why should we be surprised? Oh, let us realize what an infinitely priceless Book this is, what infinite pain, and cost, and power have gone into its making, both from God and from man; and then let us cease to wonder that its study should be costly and difficult, rather rejoicing in every demand that it makes upon us, and learning for ouselves how slight, after all, is the highest price we may pay in contrast with the inexhaustible riches that the Father will pour into our lives from the life-giving pages of his Word.—S. S. Times.

THE OUTSIDER.

Some are outside of the Church, outside of the Kingdom of God, out of Christ. The King of Glory is not only a good king, but perfect in His administration—wise, just, kind and merciful; nevertheless some of His people have rebelled against His authority, repudiated His claims, and set up a little government of their own and proclaimed themselves kings and lords.

We do not say that all those who are outsiders of the Church are out of Christ; nor can we say that everyone who is in the Church is in Christ. We must not judge. God is Judge, and everyone may judge himself. Let each one see to it that his judgment of himself shall not conflict with the judgment of God; for His judgment is just. Many declare that they are without. They know they do wrong, and do not try to do right. They are not ashamed of the evil they do. Others live on the border. They do not like the far country. Its atmosphere is not pleasing to them. Nor do they exactly like the kingdom. They try to keep out of both. Jesus said to a certain scribe, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of heavn."

Paul tells us to "walk in wisdom toward those that are without." This not the only reason why the Christians should walk in wisdom, but it is one powerful reason. He must never lose sight of them that are without. They are watching him, and they have claims on him. Much depends on the attitude of the Church and of the individual Christian toward the outsider.

For one thing, Christian men and women may silence the scoffs of the outsider by walking in wisdom. Some of them are scoffers. They say many foolish things against the Church. They say they have no use for religion, because it does not make men better, because it is not a reality, but a fancy, or a cloak. They say there are no good people, but Christians merely masquerade as saints.

Paul says again, "By welldoing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." The best answer to the skeptic and the scoffer is a holy life. There is no answer to that argument. Bishop Simpson once put to silence a profane scoffer by asking him about his mother. He admitted that she was a Christian, a consistent, godly, unselfish woman. He had no more vile things to say after that. Many a scoffer may be silenced by a reference to the life of his mother. Everyone knows that there are good men and women. Their scoffs choke them when their attention is called to this fact.

Christian men and women may win the outsider by walking in wisdom. We are told of a skeptic who lived for a season in the same house with Fenelon; and when he went away he declared that he could stay no longer, for the daily life of that holy man would compel him to become a Christian in spite of himself. Remember there is a religious nature in every breast. The skeptic, the scoffer, the wickedest man in the city has something in his breast which responds to the touch of godliness. When he sees a real Christian something in him says, "I might have been such a man if I had taken advantage of my opportunities. I m ashamed of myself. I was born for something better. I am capable of something higher." Wicked men may hide this experience, but they feel it. There is something within that throbs for expression when a ray of holy light falls on them.

It is a great thing to live such a life that outsiders will secretly admire it and long to imitate it. They are compelled to say inwardly: "That is a beautiful life. That is a life worth living. I wish I understood the secret of that brave, strong, useful, happy, noble life. I would like to live like that."

"Walk in wisdom." There is more in walking than in talking. An upright life is a more powerful force than an eloquent sermon or the finest music. Conduct is more convincing than logic. The Bible has much to say about the Christian's walk. He should "walk in the light," "walk in the truth," "walk in love," "walk uprightly," "walk as He walked," "walk with God."

He should never lose sight of the relation a Christian should sustain to the spiritual world. Some tell us that if we would win the outsider we must lay aside everything that would suggest the other world. The outsider does not want to hear about the other world. Let the Christian come down to the level of the outsider and meet him on his own ground, take an interest in him, in his business, in his pleasures, in everything that belongs to him. Walk as a man of the world and banish the atmosphere of the other world.

Here is delicate and infinitely important situation. We must be on our guard, for one may easily err by going to extremes either way. It is right, it is well, to take an interest in the outsider, to come in touch with him, to sympathize with him in all his affairs. But this is not the touch that will save him. This is not the spirit that will help him. He will never be touched in his inner life by worldly conversations or a worldly spirit. Only the man who walks as a Christian, the man who bears about with him the odors of Eden, the man whose face and spirit show plainly that he has been in the mount with God, will help the outsider. This is the light that he needs. Those who walk as pilgrims and strangers, going home, will awaken the right kind of interest in the heart of the ungodly. If we are to do good to our neighbors in this wicked world we must make it clear that we are acquainted with God and another world. The thing they are thristing after is not of this world.

One who walks with God, whose hold on God cannot be broken by the allurements of the world, will be charged with a spiritual force which outsiders will feel when they come into His presence. "Walk in wisdom toward them that are without."—N. Y. Christian Advocate.

THE GIFTS I ASK.

These are gifts I ask
Of thee, Spirit serene:
Strength for the daily task,
Courage to face the road,
Good cheer to help me bear the traveler's load,
And, for the hours of rest that come between
An inward joy in all things heard and seen.

These are the sins I fain
Would have thee take away:
Malice and cold disdain,
Hot anger, sullen hate,
Scorn of the lowly, envy of the great,
And discontent that casts a shadowy gray
On all the brightness of the common day.

These are the things I prize
And hold of dearest worth:
Light of the sapphire skies,
Peace of the silent hills,
Shelter of forests, comfort of the grass,
Music of birds, murmur of little rills,
Shadow of clouds that swiftly pass,
And, after showers,
The smell of flowers
And of the good brown earth—
And, best of all, along the way friendship and mirth.

THE LOVE OF CHRIST.

"Thou shalt be a witness for him unto all men" (Acts 22:15).

The love of Christ is the real motive for all true missionary endeavor. It so fills the soul with its joy and peace that we cannot but tell to others the story of this marvelous and matchless love. We become willing to endure any trial and to incur any risk in order that we may be the bearers of this message to those who sit in darkness. It is this love alone which interprets the sacrifices which men and women thus gladly make. It has made the dungeon, otherwise loathsome, resplendent and glorious. It has made the wheel and rack softer than couches of down. It has made the fagot and flame a triumphal chariot to bear noble souls to glory and to God. O, yield your hearts today to this mighty motive! In life amid its trials, in death amid its coldness and darkness, and in heaven amid its triumphal songs and peerless glories, Christians can still exultingly say, "The love of Christ constraineth us."—Robert Stuart MacArthur, in Watchman.

REMEMBER GOD IN YOUR WILL.

Mr. James Cooper Stedman who died in Fayetteville last week left $500.00 to the Thompson Orphanage at Charlotte and $500.00 to the Methodist Orphanage at Raleigh. It should be the rule rather than the exception for men to remember God in their wills. The man who leaves those dependent upon us but a privilege then to remember those beyond our roof who need the help that we can supply. Of all the friends there is one Friend who sticketh closer than a brother and who is a present help in every time of need It is to Him we owe gratitude for the measure of material blessing which has come to us and while we cannot give directly to Him of our substance "He has told us that "inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me."

In making our last will and testament we should not forget this Friend that remembered His poor. The bestowal of gifts to educational institutions for endowment, scholarships or material equipment; to missions, to the Bible cause, to all kinds of Church and philanthropic work and to our Childrens Home will be giving to Him and we hope our people of large means and of small means in making their wills may remember in some measure the poor whom God has placed among us. We recall more than one man, rich in this world's goods, because God had permitted prosperity to come to them, leave all their estate to profligate children who were through the indulgence of their parents unfitted to husband and care for it. And yet not a penny did they bequeath to an orphan or any worthy charity.

If we really love Jesus we should not disinherit Him when we make our wills. Think on these things brethren and when you make ready to dispose of your estate don't forget that He really has a claim on it of not less than ten per cent. The orphans need bread, the poor pagans the br ad of life and you can help to carry gladness and salvation to these after you are dead by remembering God's poor in your will.—Editor Blair in N. C. Christian Advocate.

PERSONAL POSSIBILITIES.

It is an encouraging fact that the Christian who would be the means of causing others to become followers of Christ, is divinely assured that his efforts are never useless, even though he may not see any tangible results. There are great possibilities even in one Christian life. One may have only ordinary talent, and yet if it be consecrated to the service of the Lord, it is sure to be productive of a great deal more good than that one can conceive of. Rev. W. H. Geirstrveit, the former editor of "The Baptist Union," says: "Years after the writer had been active in the Christian life, he took steps to learn who the preacher was who had spoken the message which led him to a decision for Jesus Christ. The minister was visiting his pastor at the time. When the information was secured, a letter was written to the minister, telling him of that influence years before, all unsuspected by him." That news must have been very refreshing to that minister. His labor had been more fruitful than he had imagined. Mr. Geisrtrveit also says: "Some years ago a young bank clerk, who had decided for Christ, after some hesitation arose in a meeting of young people and simply announced that he wished to sy that he had decided to become a Christian. Sitting by the writer, who was the pastor of that church, was a young lady, who turned and asked him if he would make an appointment to talk about this subject. The next Tuesday was fixed. When the pastor arrived he was informed that the decision had been made, and the young man's frank, manly statements had led to it." In simply doing his duty to himself, that young man had unconsciously so influenced that young woman that she became a Christian. When one openly confesses Christ, he is likely to make an impression upon others quite beyond anything that he had expected. And silent influences go out from a true Christian life which have great possibilities in them.

Still Fighting.

That man is most likely to be in the forefront of life who is fighting the most sins. Not the man who thinks he has conquered the most, but the man who knows he has most to fight, must have the heartiest approval of the Captain of our Salvation. For the closer we get to Christ the more sins we shall be conscious of and shall strive against. Then even our failures cannot defeat us. It is not single failures before sin that bar a man from Chris't strength and presence, but only the failures to keep on fighting. "God will not look you over for medals, degree, and diplomas, but for scars." May the scars of our forgiven sins and of our forgotten defeats be only reminders to us of the battle that is still to be fought! So long as the fighting is continued, the victory of its ending is assured.—S. S. Times.

Prayer Our Greatest Service.

No form of service that any human being can render in God's Kingdom on earth is equal, in practical value, to the service of prayer. Many do not realize this; therefore much that their prayers might do remains undone, as they mistakenly put other forms of helpfulness into first place. A missionary to Persia, when leaving this country some years ago, was given a farewell meeting at a stopping-place on his way to his steamer. He had made no appeal for money, but at the close, as persons grasped his hand, one well-meaning young man said to him, "We'll try to send you something more substanital than prayers." Quickly came the reply, in deep earnestness: "My friend, you can't do that. We shall be glad of anything you may send; but more than all else we need your daily prayer." The reason why prayer is the greatest contribution we can even make is that it releases God's energies. As James H.McConkey has pointed out, its secret is in the six words, "If ye ask, I will do." Beause God can do more than man can do, the prayer of man that is used of God is greater than anything else that man can do.—S. S. Times.

O, HOW CHANGEABLE!

The moon changes four times monthly. The winds change oftener. All nature changes from bud to leaf, then to blossom, and in the course of time to a fully developed plant, or to a dwarf. And as time rolls on, it begins to fade and die. Though by the law of nature, as the seasons come and go, nature assumes her original form and beauty, ever reminding man how feeble, how inconsistent, how short-sighted, how dependent he is upon a power supernatural, to carry on the work as designed by the hand of Omnipotence.

The changes that occur as to natural things were predestined from the beginning. But it was not so with man: man has the ability to change; but it was not decreed that he should change from bad to worse. But it is required of him if to be blessed in this life and to be admitted into a mansion in Glory, to come out of his crooked ways, and to get in the way that leads to a more blissful life. America a few centuries ago was groping along in spiritual darkness like many remote places and men are now, until by the grace and wisdom of God a few of his noble sons came to the front, facing the storm of persecution and denunciaaion and blazed the way so plain that many of the despised and rejected were led into the true and right way to endless bliss. fore ready." You should have your loine they were called to their reward. Alas! there has sprung up from some source, seemingly from the night dreams caused by a gorged stomach on the fat of the land (not by a vision or visions as some saw in olden times) or by building air castles, seeing on some imaginary pinnacle a high flaming title to imaginary honor on an alluring, well filled purse, or a sprout of graft charming them on. Evidently there is something that has the appearance of impurity connected with this anticipated change.

If not so, our forefathers were sadly mistaken in the way they pointed out for us. If they were correct, why should the late dreamers now ignore, reject, discard and despise their teachings? And taunt their offspring as beings ignorant of the truth? And that their fathers and grandfathers were all wrong. And that theirs was an untimely birth, and they were rocked in a corrupt cradle, fed on impure food. Now those that have been so gloriously and spiritually enlightened in their dreams are prepared to teach us in the right way, not in the way our ancestors trod, but in the way they have been instructed in their dreams. They tell us we have been wearing the wrong name: a new name we intend to give you. Your name is so obnoxious to the elite of the land; we cannot tolerate that old name given you by the departed saints that named us. Your forefathers were wrong in leading you to believe in such a name. O Consistency, how thou art fallen! How can any true minister of the Gospel stand up before an audience composed of the sons and daughters of those old saints that have been gathered home to Heaven and tell them their fathers were false teachers? That now since I have been enlightened in my dreams, that I now am prepared to lead you right: that I now see wherein I was wrong, now discard your old name, assume the new name a few of us want you to accept.

Some of us privates say, Away with those dreams! Make no more attempts to sow the seed of discord and discontent, for the fruit is now too corrupt from want of proper cultivation.

From what source comes the demand for so great changes? From a certain class or the masses? A few years ago the president was required to travel on a salary of about $500. Some then thought best to station him, but no! a small minority objected: now one or more have favored stationing him on about a three-fold salary to what the president was required to travel on.

Now if we change name and go off with those vain-glorious dreamers, by what name shall we be called? Who is to dictate the name, the dreamers or the masses?

I would say when that committee start or before they start they should be tagged and that tag placed in a conspicuous place in large letters, in plain English—DESERTERS. Again.

A VISIT TO MISSION LANDS OF THE NEAR EAST.

By Olive Ireland Hodges.

Last summer it was my privilege, in company with about fifty other persons who were at the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, to continue my study of mission problems by visiting the Mission Lands of the Near East. The company of very interesting and helpful people made the trip worth while just for the helpful associations of three months of travel together, but it would also have been a paying investment of time and money even if there had been no such helpful company.

Greece can hardly be called a mission land, but our five days in Athens were full of interest to me.

Most of us have been so accustomed to think of Athens only as the home of ancient art and culture or as the place where Paul preached that wonderful sermon on the "Unknown God," that we have entirely forgotten that there is still life in Athens and we have not ever thought to ask about the religion of the people of Athens to-day. At least that describes the state of mind in which I entered Athens last July. Five days later as I left that city, however, it was not of the beauties of her ancient architecture as still seen on the Acropolis, nor of the wonders, also ancient, to be seen in the museums, that I thought most. Rather, it was of a little band of Protestant Christians, meeting from week to week, in a little house, under discouragements that would daunt many who count themselves brave.

On the Sunday we spent in Athens we had the privilege of a meeting on Mars Hill in which Paul's oration in that place was read to us in Modern Greek by the pastor of the Protestant Church of Athens, while with us stood the man who may be called the Father of the Greek Protestant Church, Dr. Kalopathakis. He and his church have been persecuted and hindered in almost every possible way by the Greek Orthodox Church, but they have gone bravely on contending for the spirit of devotion instead of mere form. The numebr of Greek Protestants is still very small and the church is poor altho' it is self-supporting. There have been no foreign missionaries in Greece for many years. The restrictions placed upon them make it seem wiser to let the Greek Christians work out their own problems.

At the time we were in Athens the church there was somewhat discouraged because the young pastor of the church was just leaving for America and there seemed to be no one to take his place. The Protestants, however, feel that altho the Protestant Church is likely to remain small its influence on the Orthodox Greek Church is to count for much in the deepening of the search for truth.

While in Constantinople we had an interview with the Patriarch of the Orthodox Greek Church. He received us very cordially and expres ed the hope that we might come to understand his church better because they and we acknowledge the same Lord and Master, Jesus Christ.

After leaving Greece we visited Turkey, Syria, and Egypt. Midsummer is not the time usually chosen by tourists for a visit to these countries and it certainly is not the best time to visit the mission work except for any who may still have doubts as to the necessity of a summer rest for missionaries. With the mercury registering somewhere near 100 Fahrenheit we had no doubts as to what we should do in regard to a summer vacation, if we lived in that country.

However, owing to the kindness of missionaries who gladly gave up a part of their summer vacation to help us see the work, we were able to see much of the work and to meet many missionaries. In Egypt some of the schools were opened earlier than usual on our account.

We found missionaries in the Near East facing some of the same problems that confront us in the Far East. Conspicuous among these was the problem of how to make one dollar go as far as two and how to have one missionary do the work of three without breaking down and so leaving the work of four undone.

How to reach the Moslem is the one problem, however, that overshadows all others in the Near East. The greater part of the work so far, at least the greater part of the work yielding fruit that can be seen and measured has been among the Oriental Christians of the Greek, Armenian and Coptic churches and this is a work that has resulted in much good not only in the forming of the Protestant church, but in putting new life into the old churches. Nevertheless, all this time the missionary has been praying for an entrance through the thick wall of Mohammedanism. And because he believes in a Lord who never fails he believes that the day is dawning in which even the Mohammedan will own the sway of our Lord Jesus Christ.

One of the striking things about the work in these countries of the Near East is that it has been so divided up that there is practically only one denomination of Protestants in each country. In Turkey it is Congregational. In Syria, it is Presbyterian, and in Egypt it is United Presbyterian.

It was an inspiration to see these men and women, some of whom only a few years ago lived through scenes of horror they too might be called to give up life itself for our Lord. As we saw the axe marks on the doors and the bullet holes in windows and walls at Adana and then looked into the peaceful, happy faces of the men and women who heard and saw the horrors of those days, the wonderful keeping power of our God was made more real to many of us and we felt like saying in the words of the hymn,

"O Lord, to us may grace be given To follow in their train."

WHAT A NEW TESTAMENT DID.

A True Story.

Some few years ago, a Christian lady, having decided that she ought to try and put into practice her faith in the efficacy of God's Word to bring souls into the true light—that she ought to work as well as pray for Jewish acquaintances—bought some marked New Testaments to circulate among some of the Jewish ladies in her town.

Several of these little books had gone out with kind personal notes inside them, and one day the last of the first series was ready. The lady started on her errand, but the Lord interposed, and turned aside her footsteps. Apparently, it was just a friend's need of a walk along the sea coast that took her in another direction. In reality, the Master of her life was sending her whither He would.

The walk lengthened beyond her strength; so bidding her friend "good-bye," she sat down in a shelter on the sea-front to rest awhile. Only one other person sat there with her, and that one was sitting white and still, with closed eyes. A few moments passed in awed silence then the tired lady timidly inquired: "Are you ill? Can I do anything for you?"

The eyes opened; they were dark and despairing; the lips moved, and a voice, hollow and sad, said: "Yes, I am ill, I am dying, but no one can help me with that."

Swift as thought, came the gentle answer, "Christ only; but what a comfort that He can!"

Suddenly new life seemed to vibrate through the frail form. Anger, that almost paralyzed her hearer, rang in the scornful tones of the stranger; the dark eyes blazed with brilliancy. "Do not mention that name to me! The impostor! The enemy of our race! The accursed one!"

With each nerve throbbing from anxiety to help, the Christian woman paused, uncertain how to ansyer. Close to her was one near to another world; she dare not lose the opportunity; nevertheless, this bittter animosity seemed to freeze the words upon her tougne.

Falteringly, she began: "Have you ever read the New Testament?"

"Never!" came the charp response in the same scathing accents.

"Is that quite fair? To us who know the Book and love it, your conduct seems like condemning a person unheard. You are dying, you say, the New Testament tells of a beautiful life beyond this. Oh, do read it," holding it out to her.

A strange expression flitted over the sick woman's face. "What do you know about dying?" she said. "You are in good health and strength. Stand where I do, then you will know what 'no hope' means."

Again the tragic notes thrilled the listener's heart. "I do not yet know what death is," she said tenderly; "but I know something of life. I have had some heavy trials to live through—trials which I could not have borne without my Savior's help. I could not live without Him, so I could not dare face death without Him. But as He is sufficient for life, I am sure He will be for death. Oh,do read about Him!" And again she held out the small parcel.

A weird smile lighted up the sad, thin face. "Well, nothing can hurt me now. At any rate, you mean well." And the Jewess took the packet, slipping it into a bag by her side.

Just then another lady hurried up. Noticing only the invalid, she placed her arm around her, and taking up the bag, guided her across the road into a house on the other side. The inspired volume had started on its mission.

A year went by, and again the Christian lady was on the sea-front. As she walked along, some one eyed her curiously, but with an unfriendly gaze which made her feel uncomfortable though she knew not why. Turning to retrace her steps, they met again, and this time the other paused, asking abruptly: "Are you Miss——?"

"Yes."

"Then I have a message to give you. Do you remember giving a New Testament to a sick lady in shelter here a year ago?"

"Yes."

"Well, she is dead. As she was dying, I promised her if I ever met you I would tell you that she died in peace, trusting in your Jesus Christ. I was a fool to promise her, but I did it, and I have kept my word; but I curse you for giving the book to her; you have destroyed her soul."

She was turning to go, when the Christian lady stopped her. "The Testament—where is that?"

"I have it, I promised her to keep it; but no one shall ever see it; it shall do no more harm."

Quickly she walked away, leaving no chance of an answer; and her hearer went home, so shaddowed by the terrible looks and words of hatred, that for days she could hardly give thanks for the precious soul that had been redeemed and was in glory.

Many months sped on their way, marked only by the silent prayer for that Jewish sister still in darkness. Then, one morning, a letter arrived in a strange handwriting with a strange postmark. It was brief and unsigned. It said: 'Your Jewish sister thanks and bless you. I, too, have read that New Testament, and found the true Messiah. Pray that I may be faithful; all here are against me, especially my husband. He has taken the book from me; pray for him also. Yours in the love of Christ."

More monthes sped away; then another missive came. "When this reaches you I shall be with my precious sister before the throne. I am dying, as she did, of consumption, but I want you to know that I have been kept true, and that I have my dear copy of the New Testament again. Last week my husband gave it to me . He has said no word, but he is all kindness and love. I asked him if he had read it; he only said: 'Ask no question;' so I am praying on in hope. Continue your prayers for him.

Day by day that request was complied with, though the petitioner knew neither the name nor the abode of the one for whom she prayed. But the Hearer of prayer knew, and sent one more answer. Two texts of Scripture written on a card came in a foreign envelope. One of them was: "My word shall not return unto Me void," a text which speaks convincingly of the hidden power which lives in the inspired Word of Divine Truth.

The future history of the Book whose work has been described is known to Israel's Redeemer alone. This little story of its past service is published to cheer the hearts of those who are lovingly "sowing the seed beside all waters."—London Christian.

  And the briars that catch and fret,
Why not take all to the Helper
  Who has never failed us yet?
Tell him about the heartache,
  Tell him the longings, too;
Tell him the baffled purpose,
  When we scarce knew what to do.
Then leaving all our burden
  With the One divinely strong,
Forget that we bore the burden,
  And carry away the song.

NOT LONELY NOW.

Two young Chinese women, members of the same household, were taken to a mission hospital and treated for the opium habit. During their stay they learned to repeat and sing several hymns. After their return home the mother of the young women remarked to a missionary who was visiting her, "It is not lonely at our house now, for my daughters have those Christian hymns to sing."

CHANGING RELIGIONS IN KOREA.

Heretofore, practically all we have heard of religious progress in the "Hermit Kingdom" has come to us from missionaries. Their glowing reports of the triumphal march of Christianity in that country are now fully corroborated by our American Consul-General, George H. Scidmore, who has just returned from Seoul, the capital, after thirty-four years' consular service, interrupted by only two brief furloughs. He describes the work of the missionaries as magnificant and as being the most striking feature in Korea's present condition. An effort is being made to keep politics out of the churches. He regards Korea as the most promising missionary field in the world. Buddhism, the old faith, is moribund and almost dead. Christianity and education go hand in hand and the people are eager for both. Six great missionary organizations are at work there and the Y. M. C. A. is doing its share in bringing about the general transformation. The people are literally hungering and thirsting for the Gospel, with education and Western civilization, and the native and Japanese authorities favor it. Many prominent Koreans, including the chief justice, have openly accepted Christianity and have become active members of the church.—The Christian Herald.

"Till He Come."

A little while for patient vigil keeping,
  To face the stern, to wrestle with the strong,
A little while to sow the seed with weeping,
  Then bind the sheaves and sing the harvest song.
A little while to keep the oil from failing,
  A little while faith's flickering lamp to trim,
And then, the Bridegroom's coming footsteps hailing
  We'll haste to meet Him with the bridal hymn.

THE STORY OF CAT GREEN EYES.

By Florence Oliver.

Margery knew it was almost time for the Sandman but she pretended the sand did not prickle her eyelids.

"Please, please tell one more," coaxed she snuggling up to Auntie. "Th' one 'bout Cat Green Eyes. Please, Auntie."

So while Margery blinked at the beautiful coals in the grate Auntie told this story.

One cold, cloudy morning Cat Green Eyes sat on the wall in front of an empty house. The Johnsons had lived in the house, but the week before big wagons had come and gone all day and when night came the Johnsons had gone away in the last wagon.

Little Girl had wanted to take Cat Green Eyes, too. She even smuggled him into the wagon under her coat, but some one had seen him and had said very crossly, "I'm not going to be bothered with that cat any longer. Put him down. Quick, now."

The Little Girl had cried and Cat Green Eyes had cried, too. He had run after the wagon for a while but he could not keep up. So he had come back to the house and there he had lived ever since.

He caught mice in the old barn and squirrels in the chestnut trees, so he was not often hungry. It was very quiet and lonesome about the house, though, and oh, how he did miss Little Girl.

"I would go and find her," he said to himself that morning, "but the others would drive me away. No one wants me. Even Mrs. Willis, who looks so pleasant and kind threw a broom at me because I sat on her porch. I shall get to be a tramp cat and everyone will despise me. No, I won't be a tramp cat. I'll find a home, so I will."

While Cat Green Eyes was thinking this, a sleigh stopped in the road. The man in the sleigh seemed to be waiting for some one. He was a good-natured looking man with a rosy face and very kind eyes.

Cat Green Eyes was so lonely and he liked the man's looks so much that he walked down to the road.

"Well, kitty," said the man, "keeping house, are you?"

"Meiow," answered Cat Green Eyes. He went close to the sleigh and reached up as far as he could.

"Lonesome?" said the man. He stooped down and smoothed Cat Green Eyes' head.

My, but it felt good! Cat Green Eyes kept as still as a mouse and purred so fast his purrs all ran together.

When the man stopped, Cat Green Eyes, watching him all the time, got up on the step on the sleigh.

"Well, I declare," said the man, "I believe I know how you feel."

"Meiow," answered Cat Green Eyes again.

He put out one paw and stepped into the sleigh. Then little by little, hardly daring to breathe, he came over to the man's feet. They looked at each other a long time, the man and Cat Green Eyes.

Finally the man laughed. That settled it. Cat Green Eyes gave one bound into his lap.

Just ahen a woman came up the road. The man, who had been waiting for her, turned around.

"Look!" exclaimed he. "Martha, this is the cat Johnsons left. It's adopted me. Isn't it a nice one?"

"Of course you think so," laughed the woman, as she stepped into the sleigh.

Cat Green Eyes shook then. He was so afraid she would drive him away. But he was a brave little cat, so he touched her hand with one paw.

"Please, please," he begged, in cat talk, "do let me go home with you; please do, I'm so lonesome."

The woman looked at Cat Green Eyes. Then suddenly she took him in her arms. "You poor kitten," she said, "do you want to be our cat?"

You may believe that Cat Green Eyes felt more comfortable then. The first thing he knew the horse had started and he was riding away with the man and woman. He sat between them on the seat and purred like two little gray cats.

"That's a—very nice—story," whispered sleepy Margery. "I'm so glad he 'dopted you, Auntie."

Then she blinked over at the other side of the fire, where sat happy Cat Green Eyes.—McCall's Magazine.

A Trap That Catches Rats.—Rats had become so numerous and so destructive in our office that what to do with them or for them or against them was a serious problem. They did not hesitate to gnaw the binding off of our very best books for the sake of the paste they could get. Should we feed them so liberally that they would let our books alone? That might be an expensive plan. We decided to try a trap. But what kind of one? We had set traps before, and the rats only seemed to laugh at them. We took Mr. Gregory, of the Odell Hardware Co., into our confidence, and he said, "Here is a trap that will catch 'em." It was a wire trap, with an enticing opening on top, and a drop-door that opened itself when the rat stepped on it, and let the rat into all its secrets, and then accommodatingly closed itself after him. Other rats might follow, until all seats were taken. Well, we took Mr. Gregory's advice. The first night in our office, two young and simple rats walked in and never walked out again. At other times, two were caught when the trap was well baited. But the trap's great achievement came last Monday. Without any bait at all, five rats walked in, including one old one. The other four either died in a short time of vexation perhaps or were put to death by old fellow for enticing him into such a place.

Obituary.

Sister Crissie Hunnacutt, wife of Bro. J. A. Hunnacutt, was born June 8, 1847, and departed this life December 9, 1910, at her home at Proximity near Greensboro, N. C.

Sister Hunnacutt's furnal was preached by the undersigned, at her request, at Shiloh Church, Yadkin College Circuit at eleven o'clock the second Sab, in Dec. 1910. She was a faithful member of Shiloh M. P. church for many years, and it was our privilege to know her well, being her Pastor for three years at Shiloh, and one year at St Paul. We can truthfully say she was a kind and faithful wife, a loving mother, a good neighbour, and a faithful member of the church.

She leaves a husband and 7 children to mourn their loss, but doubtless their loss is her eternal gain.

The large crowed that assembled to pay their last tribute of respect to the deceased proved that she had many friends and relatives. We can truly sympathise with the bereaved husband as can only those who have experienced a like bereavement May God sustain him by his grace. And may this bereavement be blessed to the good of all her children. May each one resolve that by God's grace, they will meet their dear mother in that upper and better world where parting will be no more. Doubtless mother will be waiting and watching for you.

ELON COLLEGE NOTES.

On Sunday, Dec. 11, Dr. T. J. Ogburn, pastor M. P. Church of Greensboro, N. C., and for 12 years Foreign Missions Sec. M. P. Church in the U. S. delivered a most interesting and scholarly discourse from Zachariah 12:20. The theme being the Commonness of Sacred Things. The sermon was a plea for the bringing of religion from the skies to everyday life and against the tendency to separate things secular and things sacred. Dr. Ogburn maintained that all things are sacred or secular according to the spirit in which we approach and use them. The sermon was listened to with rapt attention and received with hearty commendation. Dr. Ogburn returned on the evening train to Greensboro, where he preached at his regular charge in the evening.

President Moffit has just issued two pamphlets in connection with his effort to raise $50,000 for the college, more than $16,000 of which has already been subscribed and paid in. These pamphlets are entitled Elon College—An Appeal to the Brotherhood, and Elon College—Special pamphlets sets forth the admirable work which Elon has done during 21 years of its history and how it has worked its influence into the very roof and warp of the denomination's life in all its activities, and shows why the special fund must be raised that the college may be enabled to pursue the normal development of its ideals.

The second pamphlet outlines the plan which the President is pursuing to raise the remaining $34,000.00 of this special fund; and also an additional chapter or the purposes of the fund and the results that may be expected to accrue from it, when it has been raised. These pamphlets will be mailed to all the friends of the college north, south, east and west in the bounds of the Church and will no doubt contribute much in the way of healthy enthusiasm for the college and for the fund.

THE Literary Digest for November 26 contains an article headed, the "Sad Lot of Japanese Working Girls." It is a comment on an article prepared by Dr. Kuwada, a member of the Japanese house of Peers, and printed in the Shin Koron (New Public Opinion), a magazine published in Tokyo. Dr. Kuwada is interested in the labor question, and has spent several years in Europe studying labor conditions. He is especially concerned in the condition of Japanese girls employed in factories and work shops, and is trying to ameliorate their condition. Dr. Kuwada is quoted as saying among other things:

"In some factories it is no secret that the time-keepers are instructed to resort to trickery, so that their employees are made to work overtime without receiving any extra pay. In many factories the girls are not even allowed time for meals, but are required to eat while working. Almost all cotton-spinning factories keep their looms in operation day and night. Night work, in which both male and female operatives are engaged together, is found most demoralizing. The methods of punishment are equally inhumane. The lash is employed without stint; sometimes girls are imprisoned in dark rooms, or required to work with reduced rations; in many cases their wages are so reduced by 'fines' that they leave the factory penniless at the end of their contract terms."

A Unique Association.

Splendid work is in process in China, of which the outside world and, for the most part, even the Church, as no suspicion. The students of the Baptist Middle College, at Swatow, have rented a furnished room in a village of 10,000, three miles away. In that big and important village there is not a single Christian. Here the students are conducting evangelistic services and selling Christian literature to travelers and to the crowds on festival days. They also conduct a school on two evenings each week, and in various places a new propect is opening up in China through the enterprise and sympathy displayed in unwonted quarters. The manager of the Yangtse Engineering Works, employing 800 men, proposes to put up an industrial association building at the works, to be financed by the company and the men. Frequent religious meetings and lectures are held in the loft of the shops and Bible classes twice a week among the apprentices.—Homiletic Review.

Still be a giver!
Out of the little founts
Out of the river's gifts
Gulfs soon will be Pouring their waters out,
Making a sea.
Out of a sea again,
Heaven draws its showers,
And to the fount imparts
All its new powers.
Thus in a cycle borne
Gifts roll around,
And in the blessing given
Blessing is found.

VOLUME XVII. GREENSBORO, N. C., THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1910. NUMBER 6.

OUR HENDERSON CORRESPONDENT TOUCHES AN IMPORTANT SUBJECT.

Bro. S. R. Harris attended the meeting in Balto. of the committees from the M. E. Church, M. E. Church, South and M. P. Church. Last Wednesday evening he told us about it. He was impressed by the dignity, ability and piety of the bishops attending. The phrase that was sweeter to his father and my father and Dr. Drinkhouse than any other: "A State without a king, a Church without a bishop" seems to have lost its sweetness to him.

I think of the fact that at the time of our separation from the M. E. Church, Royalty had great power and so did the Episcopacy. Many crimes were punishable by death. Church and State governments were far more oppressive than now. Does any one believe that the priesthood of any church would attempt to exercise now any such power as it did in 1828? There are twenty men of education now to 1 in that day. If such things as were then done should be done now, it would destroy the Episcopacy at once. The times change and we must change with them. But the world will never cease to look up to and admire the great and the powerful; and it will be ever ready to give them greater opportunities for usefulness. Bro. Ogburn, Dr. Tagg and Dr. Lewis are just as much de facto bishops as are Bishops Cranford, Wilson and Kilgo. Would not their influence and power for good be even greater and our admiration for them and their deeds be still higher if we called them bishop? I am just baiting you a little, Bro. Editor, but don't reply to me, please, by quoting the opinion of some old fellow of a bygone age who helped in the fight leading to the separation and never could cool off. Let's try it in the light of modern intelligence. Our leaven has leavened the whole lump. Isn't the lump better than the leaven?

T. T. Hicks.

REPLY TO BRO. HICKS.

Bro. Hicks argues well—for Methodist Protestantism. There might have been some excuse for episcopacy in the days of Wesley and Asbury, with their boy preachers many of them unenlightened. But today with a twenty-fold more enlightened ministry of mature men it is far different. And if in our Church men of superior wisdom and devotion to the church can be "de facto bishop," our system is a system that gives free play to natural episcopacy, in which every man can exert his own proper and legitimate influence, and is far superior to a system that provides for an arbitrary episcopacy in which men not de facto bishops may be exalted to places of power they cannot rightly fill.

What you say of Bro. Harris reminds me of a story. Before the Civil War, an ardent young abolitionist of New England came down South to visit an uncle, a no-noble man, but a slaveholder. The young man was royally entertained, and he went back home and said to his father almost the first thing: "Slave-holders are not such bad people." A few days later he proposed that his father go down South and buy a slave plantation!

There are good and great men in bishops' seats, but they are not good and great because they are bishops, but they are bishops because they were believed to be good and great. They were good and great before they became bishops, and would be good and great in a church without a bishop. The proposition for our church to go back into the episcopacy is nothing less than monstrous. The problem of this age is not how can we with self-respect get back under the episcopacy, but it is how can the masses under the episcopacy get out from under it. It is a false system imposed upon the Church in an unenlightened age. Time and again the most enlightened men under it have protested against it and there have been several important secessions from it. Shall we seek a system that is not satisfactory to those under it? The existence of good men in the M. E. Church does not prove the goodness of their system, but it helps to explain why such a system is allowed to continue. Even Sodom would have been preserved had there been ten good men in it.

I have no apology to offer for quoting the fathers of 1828. They were wise through an experience this generation has not had. They knew first hand the evil that some of our brethren would lead us into. Human nature has not changed since 1828, though the world has made some progress. If Bro. Hicks were right in his intimation that our cause has triumphed, should we surrender to the enemy as soon as we have conquered, and lose what we have been contending for nearly a century? Is lay representation a fact to-day? How many laymen are members of the Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church? And was lay-representation the only thing our fathers sought? Did not our fathers, while they were trying to lift up the laity to their proper rank, also repudiate the uplifted orders of the ministry, first discarding the order of bishops, and later unifying the two orders of deacon and elder?

If we can't help our unfortunate brethren of the Methodist Episcopal churches out of their troubles, let us not be so foolish as to let them draw us into the very condition from which they are trying to escape.

Bro. Hicks thinks the fathers of 1828 disqualified to advise in this enlightened age! He seriously proposes to abandon a system that they worked out through years of earnest labor and severe trial infavor of—what? Why, a system much older and many times rejected by thoughtful men. Whence did this system come? Wesley and Asbury got it from the Church of England. The Church of England got it from the Church of Rome. The Church of Rome got it from the Roman emperors. The Roman emperors got it from the ancient heathen world. How did it get into the ancient heathen world? That question might be hard to answer, but in the temptation of Jesus, all the kingdoms of the world were flashed before his mind in a moment of time, and the Prince of Evil claimed authority over them and offered them to the oncoming world's conqueror. But He rejected them, saying, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve.

Does Bro. Hicks object to my quoting a few words from this same Jesus who lived so long ago? In one of his talks to his disciples he said to them: "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you."

How, in view of these words, any good

THE SON OF GOD.

By Rev. J. J. Summerbell, D. D.

What a sweet meaning there is in those four words!

They always make us think of Jesus. And what floods of affection and happiness fill the heart at Christmas time, at the mention of the Son of God!

Heaven, earth and hell are interested in Jesus. Let us study why. But first, notice the interest; later, notice its cause.

Angels shouted when the Son of God was born at Bethlehem. Angels strengthened the Son of God after he was tempted on "an exceeding high mountain." Angels comforted the Son of God, when he was sorrowing in Gethsemane. In the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, angels watched the very spot where they laid the body of the Son of God; and an angel rolled away the stone from the door on the resurrection morning, to give him free exit. Angels told the men of Galilee that the Son of God would come again. So angels are interested in him. Indeed, God had commanded them to worship him.

For God had interested, and was, interested in him so much that at Jordon he said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased".

Men also were interested in him. Caiaphas condemned him as worthy of death, because he claimed to be the Son of God. They derided him on the cross, saying, "If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross" Thus they opposed him as the Son of God.

But Peter before that had confessed him to be the "Son of the living God'. Martha had cried, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, he that should come into the world". Paul afterward wrote that he was declared to be the Son of God, by the resurrection from the dead.

Even demons were interested in him, clamoring, "We know thee, who thou art; the Holy One of God".

Jesus, the Son of God, and the Son of man!

The faithfulness,, wisdon, strength truth and love of God rested in him; he inherited them: for God was his Father.

The weakness, sympathy, prayerfulness and obedience of men were a part of him; he inherited them: for Mary was his mother.

Oh! what an enterprise, what a daring enterprise, heaven engaged in, when it sent the Son of God to the earth!

Oh! the danger of it!

What, if the Son of God had sinned!

Suppose the devil had got Jesus to go into alliance with him, even to the extent of bowing to him for "all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them"! Suppose Jesus at some time had worked a miracle for his own comfort! Suppose, when Pilate questioned him, that he had denied that he was a king! Suppose he had evaded the issue when Caiaphas questioned him! Suppose he had fought the Romans, when they crowned him with thorns! Suppose he had cursed the soldiers when they nailed him to the cross!

Oh! what would the angels have thought, who, when he was born, had cried, "Glory to God in the highest —there is born this day a Savior, who isChrist, the Lord".

What would heaven have done, if the Son of God had sinned? Instead of crying, when he returned on high, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lifted up ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in", what would the angels have done? They could not have turned their backs on him. They could not have punished him, without the direction of his Father. They could not have put him in prison up there: for there is no such place in heaven. And how could they have dishonored God by disgracing his Son? Is there some back door to heaven, through which they might have admitted him?

And yet, in order that he might be "tempted in all points like as we are," a body had been "prepared for" the Son of God when he came into the world; at the time when God said, "Let all the angels of God worship him," God had demanded that the angels worship his Son, though he had also become the Son of man, with temptation before him.. Oh! what confidence God had in his Son: thus to require angels to honor him, at the time of the beginning of the great character-crisis of eternity! (I have sometimes wondered at that command of God at that time. Was it intended to be an encouraging smile of heaven to the mighty Savior,. entering on the most difficult labor and most tremendous conflict conceivable, when he was subjected and reduced to the meager resources and scanty strength of a Son of man?)

If Jesus failed, the universe might have been wrecked.

But Jesus did not disappoint his Father. He justified the infinite confidence. The Son of God was perfect, though "tempted in all points like as we are."

Mohammed was repeatedly proved a selfish sinner. Confucius died in his bed, surrounded by the luxuries of aristocracy, whining that he had lived in vain, and lamenting that his life had been a failure. Buddha turned to a philosophy of righteousness, after he had exhausted the delights of human courts.

But Jesus believed in his Father and in himself, all the way along, and always was, and always did, just right. And at last he "accomplished his decease at Jerusalem," though on a cross, and cried with a loud voice, "It is finished. Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

Jesus was perfect, for he was the Son of God.

HIS STAR.

"We have seen his star in the east, and we are come to worship him." Matt. 2: 2.

If a new, a strange star were to be seen in the eastern sky, it would not only attract star-gazers from the great observatories of the world, but great multitudes would look at it with a wonderful interest. Its blazing light and unusual appearance would attract thousands of men, women and children. The astronomers from all the observatories would turn their telescopes towards it, and look with intense interest at the stranger among the starry realms. Not only would the multitude at large look with profound eagerness, but the wise men would be busy, deeply and anxiously concerned about it. The papers, the reviews and the ways of communication with the world would flame and flash with brilliant descriptions and messages and vivid illustrations. while many would be talking about the new appearance of the eastern sky.

Look as much as you can at the stars blazing like candles in the darkness of the night all up through the dark regions of illimitable space, until the rising sun extinguishes their feeble light, then admire his ascending greatness and brightness, and gaze at his setting splendor until the light is turned on again and every star gleams, through the deep dark space, like jets of silver light. Repeat this view a thousand times, if you can, and yet you will watch with the same interested look you had when you first saw the light. Stand by a lake at evening when the waves sleep on the face of the deep water—behold the water like a mirror reflects the star-lit heavens, and still you will love to look at it with increasing wonder and delight every time. The moon with her pale, familiar face you have noticed many times, unknown times, over and over with regular monthly returns and nightly visits, yet her coming is watched with as much admiration as if it were the first time.

You may tire and grow weary, sometime, looking at the beautiful and sublime things on this globe, but when you raise your delighted vision starward, heavenward and on up still higher toward God, you are so transported with the view you never tire, but linger long in joyous contemplation of His supreme majesty and loving kindness. This leads you to believe while standing on the eternal promises of His Word that that unseen power and invisible hand will comfort and support you; that He will guide you into all truth and give you freely the joy of His salvation.

I could not tell you the color of the sun by trying to look at his brightness. The sun seems to say to me, "Do not strain and hurt your eyes by looking at me, for you cannot see me as I am, but look at the rainbow which I paint on the sky—see the grass and flowers which I made so beautiful with variegated colors, look at the water which I draw from the ocean and send it over the world in the form of rain to quench your thirst and to refresh you in so many ways."

Neither can any one tell you much about God who was manifest in the flesh when His star was seen in the east. And without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness. God was "manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." But His attributes show Him in His divinity and power. Search them in His word, for they will be very helpful for you in working out your own salvation. So many specimens of His works are shown throughout the whole creation of the worlds, that every intelligent mind sees them all about, below and above, and ought not to fail to recognize the reflected image of the great Workman and master Builder of this great array of distances from each other and revolve in the order of time with measured velocity, and without any tangle or collision in their constellated greatness and glory; each one going out through space and coming in on time. Well might one who gazed at the stars in their nightly splendor thrum on a well-strung harp while watching upon the Judean plains, and sing with so much delight these beautiful, impressive and most expressive words, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge." This has been the beautiful, lovely song which rolled down the ages since, the strains of which have been caught by millions of happy voices, moving in the great caravan of people, catching the echo of this heavenly melody as it floated and surged down the corridors of time.

If this and other worlds are so beautifully situated in the universe of God with such unlimited attractions and blessings, how much more so will be the heaven, the state where that innumerable company of saints shall meet to live and praise the Lord forever? That will be a healthy country where no siskness nor death will come and where everlasting spring remains.

It is not surprising that the wise men said, "We have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him." These wise men had been reading, thinking much, studying and looking for the great event. A mysterious star appeared in the east until it attracted their admiring attention, and "The star which they saw in the east, went before them till it came and stood where the young child was." It was a divine light sent to show them where the infant Jesus would first make His appearance in the world. In this way He entered the world in human form, having been thus ordained and sent to prepare the way for its salvation, intending that the means provided should be perpetuated through the ages down to the last moment of time.

The wise men had seen His star, and called it His star in contradistinction from all the other stars which coursed their way in the east. His star; the star of Jesus as it gleamed with a lovely brightness above the others. The Jews, in whose country Jesus was born, took no interest in the great event. Another thing may be carefully noticed: that the ignorant, the curious, and some other classes were not attracted—they are not mentioned in the text, but the wise men, scholars, philosophers, astronomers, and perhaps some of the ancient poets were there. Judging too from the costly perfume and gifts which were presented, they were wealthy or in comfortable positions. The wise men were looking for His advent, for doubtless they had read the Scriptures of the old Testament which referred to the coming of the star. In Numbers 25 and verse 17 these wrods are employed and used with effect: "I shall see him, but not now, I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a Scepter shall rise out of Israel." It may have been they read the words over and over with wonderful earnestness, because it was most suggestive of the Savior's coming. His star was what a wise expectant world was anxious to behold. What beautiful names are given to Him in the Bible. Every name by which He is called seems bright with His praise, and appears to breathe with celestial splendor. None so charming—none so musical, none so heavenly as the manes given to Jesus who is above every other name. See by what beautiful names Isaiah calls Him in his sublime, prophetic vision: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, The Mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace."

And all the stars which blazed down through the ethereal realms not one of them attracted so much attention as His star in the east. The light of heaven, the light of divinity, and of God in a most inviting way flamed all about them, until it went and stood over where the young child was. This star is mentioned four times in this same chapter, showing conclusively that it was the central and greatest star in the heavenly galaxy. Then turning over to the sixteenth chapter of the last book in the Bible, these lovely, comforting and inspiring words greet us: "I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star. Can words be more expressive or language more impressive? He calls himself "the bright and morning star." Bright and beaming with the reflected glory or heaven, so welcome was it that many did not fail to honor, admire and worship Him.

Last year when Mars came several millions of miles nearer the earth making its nearer and nightly appearanc for over two months, so many were pleased to look at the far distant visitor. It and other celestial visitors have caused so much interest, how much more blessed was the coming of Jesus, "the bright and morning star?" The morning star—the day star is brighter than myriads of stars which twinkle in the mysterious realms of unknown worlds. When its welcome light is seen in the morning twilight we know that the sun will soon light up the world. So when the wise men saw His star in the east they believed that light was about to shine upon the world made dark by sin and transgression. They were so happy that, "When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy." And it is not surprising to hear of their action recorded in the following verse: When they were come into the house they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and opened their treasuries, they presented unto him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh."

The wise men worshipped the infant Jesus. That was a lovely scene, to behold these wise men worshipping the young child. Look at the attitude of their devotion—they fell down. How lowly and humble, and yet how earnest and sincere they came into that sacred presence! Worship, what is it? It is religious homage—a term of honor, reverence. They went to honor and reverence that immortal child. Can we not learn to be more devotional while waiting upon the Lord? It sometimes occurs that individuals meet to worship, and then worship other things besides the true and living One. Their minds turn away from Him who ought to be the object of their devotion, and are placed upon the other things. The singing may be good from a cultivated view, and yet there may not be any real devout, heartfelt worship in it. It may be too formal without the spirit of sincere worship. What is greatly needed in worship is the spirit and the understanding of the spirit. When under the influence of the spirit, it helps to give life, pitch, tone, volume and power, and sends the music to thrill every soul by its charming melody.

The prayers offered in worship may be adorned with subtle words, at the same time they may be without the unction and sanction of the spirit. Such faithless prayers have been presented to our Father many times. They have passed too much selfishness—too much learned polish and not enough of the divine knowledge and the sweet spirit of Jesus to make them effectual at the throne of mercy and pardon. They were not charged with enough of the essential power to send them up to God, and the expected blessings did not come because you did not ask for them in the right way. So many of us have made mistakes in this way. When you feel that something is wrong, when you know that your devotion is a burden, that is so heavy upon your soul that you cannot carry it alone turn over and think in a very earnest way what the apostle said: I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also.

The preacher may fail sometimes in his devotion, and it is possible that some earnest, honest ones have in their efforts to produce the right kind of preaching. The sermon may be well conceived, its plan good and strong from a literary point of view—its style earnest and winsome, and its delivery beautiful, and yet the word may fail to have a clear, free and full access to the hearts of the people. He and they may not be in the spirit which the opportunity demands and the service so greatly needs. It may not be the kind of preaching which God wants nor that which the people need. Many times have preachers and people gone from their service dissatisfied with themselves and their service because it was not what they desired. The same congrgation has many spiritual children to be fed and nurtured with the sincere milk of the word. The under shepherd receiving the blessings from the heavenly Shepherd ought to be able to rightly divide them to the flock giving to each one a portion of the hidden manna and the bread of life. Well may many of His willing servants come before the people and in His presence with the fear and trembling as they try to bring that living water to refresh them that hunger and thirst after righteousness. Since the Lord is the object of worship, look unto Him with reverence, love and devotion and praise until true worship is enjoyed, and experimental religion is gladly realized. Above everything, we should not fail to worship God in spirit and in truth, and in the beauty of holiness. And if the spirit bears witness with our spirits, it is an evidence of our acceptance with Him. On the other side, if there is no spirit, no life—no blessings will be obtained. The full joy of His salvation is ready for each to have, and for all to proclaim.

As many times as the birthday of Jesus has been celebrated and as much as it has been enjoyed on so many occasions, may this be the best and happiest of them all; for "we have see his star in the east and are come to worship him." This bright and morning star will shine on until millions shall be attracted by its brightness to behold the Lord in triumphant victory and live forever in the undimmed splendors of eternal day.

THE STORY OF THE FLAG.

On June 14, 1777, according to the records, the American Congress odopted a resolution which read as follows.

"Resolved, That the flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

There is no evidence to show who introduced this resolution or whether any discussions was evoked. The "resolution was adopted," and so it must have had a father, but his name is lost to history. While the resolution comes down in history as "adopted" by Congress on that day, it was not officially promulgated by the Secretary until September 3, 1777.

The flag had two stripes added to it in 1794 by a resolution of Congress, when Vermont and Kentucky had been admitted to the union and asked representation on the flag. Two additional stars were also placed in the field of blue. The bill was the first of the Third Congress to be signed by President Washington, January 13, 1794.

For twenty-three years this fifteen striped and fifteen starred flag was our national standard; under it three wars were fought—with France, in 1798-1800; with Tripoli, in Africa, 1801-1805, and with Great Britain, 1812 to 1815.

It was the flag of fifteen stripes and stars which floated over Fort McHenry and inspired Francis Scott Key to write "The Star Spangled Banner." In less than a year after the adoption of the fifteen stripes and stars Tennessee was asking admission to representation on the flag and Ohio knocked for the same honor in 1803,, Louisiana in 1812 and Indiana in 1816. Illinois also began to look for admission into the sisterhood, and that meant twenty stripes, an unwieldy thing, looking the same as ever, only if proportionately long it would be too heavy to fly from any but the strongest flagstaff.

Capt. Samuel Chester Reid, a sailing master in the United States Navy and warden of the port of New York, in 1818 suggested to Representative Peter Wendover of New York, who was much interested in the flag—thirteen stripes, alternate red and white, with a field of blue bearing a star for each State as admitted.

Representative Wendover introduced the bill in Congress, it passed both houses and was signed by President James Madison Apr. 4, 1818. This bill provided that the star for a new State shoudl be added on the Fourth of July succeeding the admission of the State into the Union.

That is the last action that has ever been taken by Congress on the flag.

The first suggestion, so far as authentic history goes, that the birthday anniversary of the flag should be observed was made early in June, 1861, by George Morris of Hartford, Conn. He made the suggestion to Charles Dudley Warner, editor of the Hartford Courant which had been left in his care by its owner, Gen. Hawley, who dropped the editoral pen and went to the front. Hartford observed the day by hanging out flags and having a patriotic program, patriotic music and prayer for the soldiers in the field and for the continuance of the Union.

Mr. Morris went futher. He asked Loomis, then a member of Congress from Connecticut, to introduce a bill to make June 14 a legal holiday. The bill was taken up for action June 13, 1861, and Congress proceeded to make merry with it. After making all kinds of fun of the resolution it was laid on the table by a vote of 67 to 33. And that was the fate of the first flag bill in Congress. Many have been introduced since, but none has passed both houses.

Judge Loomis and Mr. Morris both lived to see Flag Day honored by every Northern State, with millions upon millions of children taking part in programmes, each number of which has a direct bearing upon the birthday of the flag.

As the United States grew and the Government expanded many new departments were added, and with them many special flags have come into existence. Least often seen and yet most interesting of the twenty-five or thirty of these special flags is that of the President of the United States. He has a wealth of them, in fact no less than three flags, one of bunting and one of silk. They are exactly alike with this exception, but the one of silk is called the President's colors.

The President of the United States had no personal flag until 1882. If he went aboard a ship his presence was denoted by the national flag hoisted at the main trunk and his presence in a garrison or post was denoted by the raising of the big garrison flag. These were not entirely distinctive as denoting the presence of the President, for these flags were hoisted on gala occasions when the President was not around. The lack of a distinguishing flag for him was felt by the navy also and the Secretary of the Navy by general orders August 19, 1882, established flag for the President of the United States. The general orders described the flag as of blue bunting with the coat of arms of the United States in the center. The flag was to be hoisted at the main of the vessel when the President was aboard and be carried at the bow of the launch in which he came aboard.

In the army there was no distinguishing flag for the President of the United States until just before the outbreak of the Spanish-American War. Col. Theodore Bingham, who was then superintendent of public buildings and grounds, called the attention of President McKinley to this lack of a distinguishing flag for him and stated that he thought the Commander-in-Chief of the United States Army and Navy ought to have a distinguishing flag. President McKinley did not like the suggestion, but the Secretary of War did, and a flag was made. It was designed by Frederick D. Owen, and is a beautiful thing to look at. The official description of the flag is as follows:

"The President's flag is of scarlet bunting, thirteen feet fly and eight hoist. In each corner is a five pointed star of five inch radius to the tips. In the center of the scarlet field is a large fifth star, also of five points, two feet nine inches in radius to the tips. Inside of his star is a parallel star, separated from it by a band of white three inches wide. The inner star forms the blue field upon which is the coat of arms of the United States. On the scarlet field around the large star are forty-six small white stars, one for each State equally scattered in the reentering angles, and all included within the circumference of an imaginary circle three feet and a quarter in radius. In the upper point over the angle is a constellation of thirteen stars, representing the original thirteen States of the American confederation.

The colors prescribed by the Navy Department are of blue bunting, with the great seal of the United States displayed in proper colors.

The Secretary of the Navy has a blue flag with a foul anchor and four five pointed stars in white. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy has a white flag, with the stars and anchor in blue.

The Secreary of War has a red flag, with the great seal of the United States displayed in proper colors. The Assistant Secretary of War has a white flag, with the seal displayed. All four have silken "colors."

When the officers are officially persent on a ship, at a military camp or post, or on a visit of ceremony, they have the right to have their flag displayed. But over and above all, at all times, floats the national flag. To float any kind of pennant or steamer, except one, above the Stars and Stripes is considered an insult to the flag and the nation it represents. The one exception is the church pennant. When divine services are being held aboard ship or in camp or post, the church pennant, a long spoked white flag, bearing a blue cross, flies above the flag—Washington Star.

Many pledges made payable at the last Conference were not paid. An urgent appeal is now presented to all such delinquents to forward to their pastors as soon as possible. Many pledges were made payable next year. If any of these can be conveniently paid prior to that date it will be keenly appreciated as we are anxious to begin the work of building next spring. We lack a little more than $500 on the proposed $3,000 but hope to secure this balance next summer from charges not yet visited.

The Seminary authorities highly appreciate the generous response to their appeals for this cause and no money was ever raised easier or with more hearty good will. In return for the much that N. C. Conference has done for the Seminary, the Seminary will be eager to do much for N. C. Conference in the way of preparing men to fill her pulpits.

THE CHRISTMAS JOY.

We are far and far from the shepherds' plain,
And far from the Bethlehem town;
We may never gaze at the arching skies
Where the heavenly choirs came down.
We may never look on the silver star
That marks where the manger stood,
Whose rude sides cradled the Holy One
In His beautiful babyhood.

We may never watch for the rising star
That guided the Magi's feet;
But, whenever the Christmas-tide draws near,
Its joy in our hearts is sweet;
And we ponder the wonderful story o'er,
And we carrol the birth-night song.
For the Christmas joy is a vital thing;
It is tender and pure and strong.

And we somehow think that Judaea's land
Has a sacred charm this night;
That heaven swings near to the shepherds' plain,
And the skies grow strangely bright:
There are faint, sweet echoes of choral song
That the listening ones may hear;
But the Christmas joy is a world-wide thing,
And its glory reaches here!

THE CHRISTIAN'S CHRISTMAS.

Christian people of every tongue, name, and persuasion should be the happiest of all earth's people at Christmas time. This is the Christian's time. His Christ, his Captain, Leader, his dearest Friend, his constant Companion, his elder Brother made this day and occasion possible, and for Him the day is named and the occasion observed. He celebrates now the birth of his Christ. The anniversary of his Friend and Savior has come. But for that event there would be no Christmas. He has the right, therefore, to consider and claim the day as his very own in a sense and manner that no other than a Christmas has.

Evil men, and wicked have no right to the day and to its joyous festivities. For their deeds destroy the day, the very spirit that the day observes and celebrate, and their lives would but annul and make to none effect the life and labors and love of Him for whom the day is named. It was the ways of wicked men, the deeds of evil doers who wrought with might and main to put the Christ out of the way, to crucify Him and to make the world ignore or forget Him, so that there should he no day kept in His name, and no celebration observed in His honor. Christmas exists to day, with all of its joy and peace and pleasure, not because of what sinful men have done to tstablish it , but in spite of all they could do to destroy it. Christmas is a child of Christianity.

And wicked men are still doing what they can to destroy this day; they take the liberty of Christian love for license and for indulgence and dissipation.

If their example were followed all the joy, happiness, peace, pleasure of the day would soon be done away. The day has a spiritual significance. Christ was God's free gift to man. No man had a claim or right to expect such a gift. God who tells that "it is more blessed to give than to receive", made the first and greatest Christmas gift. We have learned all our Christmas giving from that one act. We seek in this to follow after God, imitate the example He has set. This gift of God's was first of all for man's spiritual uplift, freedom, fulness, liberation. If we would follow to the limit the example given of God we would this day do somewhat for the spiritual betterment of men. He will be the happiest soul this Christmas who helps to free some other soul from bondage, and put it on a higher plane of living and of activity. The deepest significance of Christmas is spiritual—the world's eternal welfare and man's soul salvation.

THE WOMAN WE WANT.

The Woman we want: (1) The busy wife and mother—if one more than another—she is the force we need. In her hands is the world, in its plastic stage. An all but creative power is hers. The world's thinking, she may control, if she will ,and this force we must claim for this cause we have espoused. We may, if we will.

(2 The woman of today. The busy wife and mother is the woman of all time. Past, present, future, she will always exist; but to-day there is another—her sister, broadbrowed and alert, the great wide world feeling her power. Her influence fashions laws. A generous altruist she, but not yet entered upon the arena of highest altruism. A beautiful builder she, but her structure lacking the true cornerstone, not yet can it be called "fair as the morn, clear as the sun and terrible as an army with banners." But ah! what a builder she will be when she realizes that "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid."

(3) The woman idle. To win her, who with her own frail fingers throttles time, she in whom life's plummet has, as yet, found no depths; who with a busy restlessness flits here and there, hunting the happiness that ever eludes:

This is our task—this multiform creature the other woman we must win. The home-mother, the busy, thoughtful woman of affairs, the woman frivolous, the woman of empty, joyless life; the woman of wealth and she whose life is narrow because of its limitations and monotonies—these they are whom we want and whom we must win for the sake of the expansion and beauty that will come to them thereby and because with them we will go marching on, a large aggressive force of almost limitless powers, conquering and to conquer.

Is the task difficult? What if it be? It but the more demands finest effort. And how shall it be accomplished? Think you it out. The personal touch, the missionary book, magazine, leaflet, one, all or none—coupled with the omnipotence of prayer. Somehow you will win her—busy though she be or broad browed and alert; or the fair murderer of time with her limitless modifications. The task may be accomplished and must be, or consistency demands a revision of our creed. The heights upon which we now stand in a measure place us in the world's eye with a zenith sun shining full upon us. We may not win that other woman at this hour, today, for she is not here today. But we may inquire among ourselves as to why we have not won her heretofore. We shall, doubtless, before we separate, hear of some worthy service done by some faithful enrolling and conscripting officers among us. If so, be assured "they first gave their own selves to the Lord" and after that "abounded into the riches of liberality.—Missionary Messenger.

One evening at nightfall, a few months ago, says the Book of Missions, a missionary on the Congo River in a steam launch, seeking a place to moor the boat for the night, was startled by a lusty chorus of men's voices singing in the native language: "All hail the power of Jessus' name!" The missionary had found his place to stop; for there among the reeds were some big canoes full of young Africans on a fishing excursion, and there were Christians among them with Bibles and hymn books. And this in the heart of the Dark Continent! As the missionary joined in the words,"and crown him Lord of all," he felt somewhat as old Simeon did in the temple, satisfied because he had seen the salvation of the Lord.—Christian Work and Evangelist.

We are glad to have our pastor, Rev. H. L. Powell, with us another year. He preached for us today at 11 a. m. from the text, "Be thou faithful until death." He certainly preached a fine sermon. We will have a Christmas tree for the Sunday school on Saturday before Christmas at 2 p. m. We have had a good Sunday school during the past year, but we hope to have a better one during 1911. The fourth Sunday in each month we have a prayer and experience meeting. Christmas Sunday we will have a Bible reading service. Many have promised to read at least one verse from the Bible, and others will make short talks; we expect a profitable meeting. We hope everybody who can will come.

Orange Chapel, Saxapahaw Ct.

Our new pastor, Bro. Holmes, filled his regular appointment the 3rd Sunday, and preached us a good sermon.

The weather being unfavorable, there were not many out to hear him.

If we don't get a move on us, I am thinking there will be more to hear the benediction than the text. I would not be surprised if we find we have an "on time" preacher. Hope so, anyway.

Our best wishes go with our ex-pastor, Bro. Bowman. He did faithful work for us, and we learned to like him very much. Hope he will not forget us.

Our S. S. has gone into winter quarters, and it seems that a good part of the congregation went with it. Guess the reporter had just as well follow suit, as there is no Xmas tree, nor even a rumor of a wedding for Xmas.

Yours with best wishes,

Mrs. M. B. Crawford,, Rep.

Considering the weather, Sunday was a good day for us. There were 63 at Sunday school and estimated 125 to hear Bro. D. A. Braswell preach, this being his first sermon for the Conference year. He was heartily received which makes the work so much more harmonious.

He also preached at night a soul-stirring sermon. We consider our charge one of God's chosen because when we have a good pastor we need not hunger for want of food. The gate is open to this pastor and already there are several waiting to be received into the church.

Officers were elected for the incoming year, and our prayer is that we may live on a higher plane of Christian living for the new year.—Supt.

We arrived here Dec. 9th. Bro. E. M. Long met us at the depot and carried us to his home, where we spent a pleasant night. We visited several of the members, while we were waiting for our furniture to come. We received cordial invitations and hearty welcome from all, which we appreciate very much indeed. Not any of them feel like strangers to us. And I must say they are all very kind and generous people. We moved into our new home on Tuesday following. They have a very nice and pretty Parsonage. We are delighted with our new home. On Saturday about 40 of the good brothers and sisters gathered at the Parsonage, each one bringing a basket filled with good things, ready prepared. An elegant dinner was served, which was enjoyed by all. They also gave us a nice pounding. The articles are so numerous, I will not try to mention them. It consisted many good things. We especially enjoyed fresh meat and sausage that was given us by the good people and they continue to remember us daily with such things as we need.

Our first quarterly meeting was held at Pleasant Hill in the after noon Saturday, Dec. 17.

The business was transacted in the spirit of love with good attendance. I filled my first appointment at eleven o'clock at Pleasant Hill. Also at Tabernacle in the after noon of the same day. We met a faithful few in spite of the rain and mud. May the Lord bless us this year with the outpouring of his Holy Spirit.

Yours in Christ,

T. A. Williams.

Mt. Pleasant, Liberty Ct.

Our new pastor, Rev. W. D. Fogleman, has filled the two regular appointments for Dec. Congregations have been good.

The pastor has taken hold of the work in earnest and the church is moving to cooperate with him in all his efforts for the advancement of the Master's Kingdom.

Our Sunday school is doing fairly well as to interest and attendance. The Sunday school collections are above the average for the year.

The first quarterly conference for Liberty Ct. was held at Mt. Pleasant, Dec. 17. The regular business was transacted.

The conditions are favorable and we have the opportunity to make 1911 the best year financially and do a larger work in Christ's service.

Last Sunday was very unlikely, yet there were several out. All seemed interested. I went to Bro. Mat Bevil's for dinner and his faithful wife had us a good country dinner waiting for us. She enjoys having her friends come and always meets her pastor with a hearty welcome, and where is your wife and daughter? In this home lives Mr. E. A. Spencer who married their daughter. They had a bright, pretty, lovely daughter when we were there just one year ago, but last October, the 24th day, death claimed little Flora and on Oct. 25th, we buried her at Fair Grove. The first to come, and the first to go—how sad! and none know how hard to part with a child but such as have the trial. This was a lovely child. She had won her way into the hearts of Grandpa, Grandma and O! how papa and mama did love her. But she has gone to be with the angels. Our Father does all things well. Seems to me I hear little Flora saying, come on to our beautiful home. Let us meet her there. What say you?

In the last two weeks we have been kindly remembered by Bro. and Sister A. L. Moore, (sausage and spare ribs) and by Bro. and Sister Ezra Hopkins, (butter, apples and sausage), Bro. McIntire, (apples and potatoes), Bro. and Sister John Pickett (a fine turkey and sweet potatoes). Wife and I last Tuesday rode about twenty miles and I baptized Bro. and Sister Prichett's least child in their home. They have several girls. This is the only boy. I baptized their twins when they were babies. This was a pleasant service to me and such is always.

Editor asked what is a "continuing offense?" It is one that continues. E. g., if one obstruct a highway and allows the obstruction to remain, the law treats it,or may treat it as a new offense for every day it remains. So, if one permit a nuisance such as a cesspool or other noxious place on his premises, it is a continuing offense for every day it remains. If the law lawfully probibit railroads to charge more than 2¼ cts per mile, and they charge more, that is a continous offense if continued.

We again have Christmas in our bones. Children are wondering and asking about SantaClaus. We are to have a church party the 23rd. Each head of a family is to have a seasonable recitation by one of his children. Brother H. T. Powell is to explain Santa Claus to the children. There will be other interesting exercises—but no candy or toys. Every one is to carry a Christmas gift for our new Orphanage.

We have a new plan for Sunday school Supt. for next year. We will have five Superintendents—one for each 1st Sunday, 1 for each 2nd Sunday, 1 for each 3rd Sunday, 1 for each 4th and 1 for each 5th Sunday. We hope to divide the labors and mutually the benefits.

I have just read a passage from a book on "The Negro," by Mr. Weatherford, which is worth reflection: "The negro servant has the keeping of the white child in its early years, the cooking and serving of food in the home and in the hotels, the laundering, the handling of stock, and various other positions of trust; and in so far as the lives of these people are weak, sickly, immoral and physically unclean, in just so far, the life of the southern white man is either poisoned or in danger of poisoning, both physically and morally." From this he argues that we must save the negroes in order to save ourselves.

Mebane, Mebane Ct.

It has been so long and so many things have happened since our last report that we will not attempt to mention all the happenings, for some of them would be too old to be interesting.

However, our new pastor has arrived and filled all of his appointments at Mebane. We all like him very much.

We hated to give up our former pastor, Rev. G. W. Holmes, but I hope we may like our new pastor, Rev. C. J. Edwards, as well.

Our Sunday school is moving on finely. Officers for the coming year were elected last Sunday as follows: Mr. J. L. Amick, Supt.; Mr. A. C. Allen, asst. supt.; Mr. L. F. Wilkerson, sect. and treas.; Mr. J. S. Smith, asst.; Maude Jobe, librarian; Miss Pauline Nicholson, asst. We are going to have a Christmas tree Dec. 24th, for the children. How nice it is to see the bright faces of the little girls and boys in the Sunday school.

Our pastor has been talking of organizing a "Baraca Class" here sometime soon

Readers, pray for us that this may be the best year for us yet.

Wishing the editor and all the Herald readers, a merry Christmas and a happy New Year. Maude Jobe, Rep.

THE POSTAL CARD.

W. F. Kennett, Editor.

The editor of The Postal Card has been encouraged to continue its publication by expressions of appreciation received during the Annual Conference and by mail. It is customary for an editor to express thanks for substantial evidences sent to the office and this week we acknowledge with thanks boxes and packages from Mrs. W. N. Pegram, Mrs. N. T. Pegram, Mrs. Esther Williams, Mrs. W. P. Lemons and Mrs. R. W. Jones, all of which indicated that this is "hog killing time."

We also thank Mrs. J. B. Ogburn for a generous supply of the very nicest beef; Mrs. J. R. Dwiggins for chicken and turnips and Mrs. B. W. Johnson for eggs. To Bro. R. W. Jones we are indebted for the article out of which the "National pie" is made.

To all the readers of The Postal Card, and especially to our brethren in the pastorate and the noble women who share their joys and sacrifices, we wish a very happy Xmas and a prosperous New Year.

We reached Democrat on the 9th and were kindly cared for by Dr. McClean and his good wife till the 14th, when we received our household goods and moved into the parsonage. About fifty of the Democrat people came in that night pounding us and we greatly appreciate their thought of us and while they have have helped us materially I hope to be able to help them spiritually. I have filled three appointments and expect to be at Pensacola the 25th, Christmas day. Will hold my first quarterly meeting at Mountain Valley on Saturday before the first Sunday.

Last Sunday we had 194 at Sunday school, and our collection was $12.38. This was the time for the semi-annual election of officers, and the following were elected:

Supt., J. G. Rogers; Asst. Supt., G. L. Amick; Secretary. W. E. Crutchfield; asst. Sec., Miss Dallie McPherson; Organist, Miss Susie Stafford; Asst. organist, Miss Madge Thompson; Librarian, Miss Agnes Heritage; Asst. Librarian, Miss Evie Lamb; Supt, Home Dept., J. H. Boon; Asst. Supt. Home Dept., J. L. Thornburg; Sec. Home Dept., T. T. Stafford; Supt. Cradle Roll, Mrs. J. G. Rogers. Bro. Rogers has been our Supt. for a number of years, and under his administration our school has grown to be the largest it has ever been, and his reelection for the first six months of the new year means continued success and growth for the school. He will, we believe, have the hearty cooperation of every officer who has been elected. That our people know Bro. Rogers is the "man for the place" was attested by the fact that he received more than nine times as many votes as all the other nominees. He asked the school, at the beginning of this year, for an attendance of not less than 12,000. We will fall short of that number very much, but we hope that we may reach that number, or even higher, during 1911.

Our Christmas treat, chimney, and exercise will be on next Monday evening, Dec. 26. Everybody is cordially invited to be present. The exercises promise to be unusually interesting this year.

The bazaar held by the Ladies' Aid Society last Thursday was a decided success Everything was sold, and about $50.00 was cleared, which will be used for the benefit of the church in some way. The thanks of the ladies are due Bro. J. D. Payne, of Florida who gave a box of grape-fruit, and to all, who in any way contributed to the success of the bazaar.

Think I will be able to report some "wedding bells" next time.

Rockingham.

Little Lacy Braswell's gone. Rev. H. W. and Carrie Braswell after leaving Greensboro are stopping over at Rockingham a few weeks with sister B. A. Collins (the mother-in-law) and on the night of the 13th the death angel claimed their son. Lacy was a quiet, obedient child and was 7 years, 1 month and 23 days old. He was sick only about two days, and was taken almost suddenly with supposed to be appendicitis at 6 o'clock Tuesday evening and his little hands were folded in death about two hours later.

I take the little lambs, said he, and fold them to my breast; in my own own arms they shall be kept, and be forever blest. Two little hands are folded now, and crossed upon his breast. One little form is silent now, and laid away to rest.

His little body was carried to Rockingham cemetery and buried. Funeral service conducted by the writer.

Forrest.

Elizabeth A. Forrest was born Dec. 9, 1834. Died Dec. 8, 1910. She was the daughter of Rev. Daniel W. Thompson, and a sister of E. C. Thompson who is the only surviving member of the family. She was married to John P. Forrest Dec. 9, 1853. She leaves four sons and three daughters to mourn the loss of a mother. Mrs. Forrest had been an invalid for several years, being a great sufferer. Her suffering only drew her nearer the Master and made her long for that home where sorrow and suffering are unknown. She told her children she was ready to go, and believe she today is with the Lord. She had been a member of the Church sixty years, first of the Chestnut Ridge M. P. Church and after her marriage uniting with the Presbyterian Church with her husband. Her body was buried near the old home beside her husband and two children who had gone before.

Western Maryland Briefs.

On Dec. 1st Dr. Lewis announced that in view of the fact that there were five cases of Scarlet Fever in Western Md. College the health officer had advised that the college be closed until Jan. 1st. This is the first time in its history that Western Md. College has been closed on account of sickness among the students.. Those who remained here with fever are doing nicely and will go home in a few days.

Misses Fishel, Ogburn, Pickett and Welch and Messrs. W. B. and D. V. Surratt, Harrison, Fishel and Hunter went to N. C. to spend the holidays. Mr. Ernest Mickey remained here and has been employed by one of the large department stores. Mr Mickey has made a splendid impression both upon the management and the clerks of the store.

Mr. C. W. Bates will hold revival services on his charge during the holidays.

Mr. B. S. Troxler left this morning for N. C. Mr. L. W. Gerringer will visit friends in Littlestown, Pa. during the holidays. Mr. W. A. Ledford will visit friends in Hampstead, Md. The writer expects to spend the first week of the holidays here, then go to Baltimore to assist Rev. A. J. Torrey in revival services.

Seminary holidays begin Wed., 21st.

CHRISTIAN UNION.
By Rev. D. E. Millard, D. D.

The subject of Christian Union, or Unity has been a fruitful topic of discussion in the religious world for a long period of time. But, until within a comparatively few years, no practical results, tending to the unifying of the Christian world, have followed from these discussions.

Prejudice, selfishness and false-pride, perhaps, are in large measure chargeable with this failure of results. These, however, are fast losing their hold on the minds of Christian people everywhere. A new era has dawned. Christians of every name are working together throughout the civilized world, as never before—making faith in, and loyalty to Christ, the only condition or test of fellowship. As Bishop Fallows once said, at a Convention of Christian Endeavorers: "The great trend of the age is toward Unity. Races are seeking affinities. Nations are consolidating. Churches of the same faith are coming together." But, he adds, "we must make a fundamental distinction between Christian Unity and Church Unity. Church Unity is the oneness of membership in a visible church. Christian Unity is the oneness of believers in Christ. There may be Christian Unity where there is no Church Unity. And there may be Church Unity where no true Christian Unity prevails. Christian Unity is not therefore uniformity. Either in the human statement of doctrines, or in modes of worship. It does not imply an outward organization to which all Christians must belong."

Now, while I am not disposed to question the truth of the bishop's statement as given in the last sentence quoted, I am persuaded that the tendency of Christian Unity is toward Church Unity; and in the tendencies of the age, I see the approach of the day when there shall be but one fold and one Shepherd. In proof of this witness the results of such organizations as the Evangelical Alliance, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Peoples Society of Christian Endeavor. The Layman's Missionary Movement and other similar organizations for co-operative Christian work.

Bishop Fallows referring to the Society of Christian Endeavor says: "It is one of the most important agencies in producing Church Unity that Christendom has ever known. With its watchwords—"loyalty to the individual church" "loyalty to Jesus Christ" it is bringing together and binding together, as nothing else has done, the diverse branches into which the church has been divided."

And yet, on these watchwords for a basis the "Christians" have stood for more than a century past and here we stand today. Here let us stand, working in earnest and with charity, inspired by the conviction, that whatever may become of separate and distinct organizations, the Church of Christ will yet be one. When that day arrives our work as a separate religious body, will be accomplished—our mission will be fulfilled. Then the church, now scattered all over the face of the earth, united shall join in one grand chorus of Thanksgiving to which the angels shall respond, "One Lord, one Faith, one Baptism—One God and Father of us all, who is above us all, and in us all; to whom be glory dominion and majesty and blessing forever."

THE TRUE STORY OF A SHORT LIFE.

(For the past fifteen years Miss Lizzie L. Johnson, a Methodist girl of Casey, Ill., whose heart glowed with zeal for the kingdom but whose body was prisoner of pain, has been one of the most regular contributors to the mission funds of the Church. To her pastor, Rev. C. W. Jacob, we are indebted for the following sketch of her life and character.— Editor Christian Advocate.)

At ten minutes to the stoke of midnight, on September 14, the spirit of Lizzie L. Johnson was released from the body and went up to God, who gave it. She was born May 22, 1869, and was forty years and a few months old.

Her death was the culmination of an illness that dated from the time she was thirteen years of age, making twenty-seven years of constant suffering.

She began her missionary work nearly fifteen years ago on a borrowed capital of sixty dollars. Considerable time elapsed before enough money was raised to replace the loan and pay the salary of her first worker in the mission field. Later the work grew rapidly, extending over much of the world. In her record of work her own words are found as follows: "I have sent bookmarks to every State in the Union, also to Mexico, Canada, Scotland, England, Italy, Sweden, Austria, Maderia, India, Turkey, Africa, South America, New Zealand, Australia, Hawaii, China, and Japan. I have worked very hard as I lie on my bed of pain, and am thankful to God for the opportunity of doing so. The work overtaxes my strength, yet I am anxious to toil on and do all I can to enable these native pastors and Bible women to continue their work of soul-saving." She had been for some time supporting twenty native workers and educating four students, the latter in college in Japan. Who can excel this?

Her life was phenomenal in a marked degree. Her affliction was one of no ordinary type, baffling the skill both of local physicians and specialists. Her work challenged the wonder and admiration of people in both hemispheres. She raised $20,000 within fifteen years, all of which she consecrated to the whitening of the world. Once her voice was suddenly lost, and was not restored for several months. She could make her wants known only by writing. On flew her pen, and still on went her chosen work. While her head had not been off her pillow for nineteen years and her frail body was constantly stabbed with pain, she virtually crossed over seas and climbed mountains and went over many lands of the Orient as she wrought for the salvation of souls.

Her religious experience was even more wonderful still. In her own writing is the record of a wonderful event in her life. She said:

In May, 1891, Jesus and his angels came into my room. It was night, and my heart cried for relief from the severe suffering. Suddenly a great light, which grew brighter and brighter, filled the room, then a form appeared. I was dazed and awe-stricken until a sweet voice said: "Lizzie, look! The Master is come and calleth for thee." And Jesus and an angelic host innumerable in number—a throng reaching from earth to heaven—were before me. The angels were beautiful to behold, the Savior fairer than ten thousand and altogether lovely. A halo of light, not dazzling but brighter than noonday, surrounded his head. The hand extended in loving gesture was so tender, so beautiful, yet so strong that the ocean might lie within its hollow. Of the eyes, so full of compassion and unbounded love, I can give no description; I can only say there is no beauty we desire that we shall not see in him. I shall be satisfied when I shall wake in his likeness. "Yet a little and I will come again, the Master said.' The angels took their flight, Jesus went with them, the vision ended.

When the Master came again, as she heard him say in the vision, she did not go groping through the valley of the shadow, for no shadow was there. The King in his beauty was there to shed the light of glory and triumph.—Christian Advocate, New York.

HOW HE ROSE.

The superintendent of a city missionary society in an Eastern city found in his office very early one morning a lad of eleven years, who brought back a bundle of second-hand clothing that had been sent to his home the day before.

"Mother thanks you for this," he said, "and for the help you have given us since father died; but it won't be necessary to send us anything more. I've got a job, and I'm going to take care of mother."

It was large talk for a small boy, and the weekly wage on which he began his independent career was not enough to provide for any extravagances. The mother, too, had to share in the labor and sacrifice at the outset. But the boy made his word good. It was the last time the family received aid from the missionary society.

On the other hand, it was not long until the little mission chapel which the family attended began to send a small contribution to the society that assisted inits support. It was the young lad, still a boy in his teens, repaying the former assistance. During this time he often made his luncheon on crackers, and his clothing was both meager and worn; but all the time he was leading a life of temperance, patience and quiet devotion to duty that impressed his companions, and caused him to be more and more trusted by his employer.

It is no wonder that the young man rose in his career till he came to own a large business; such a sequel is not uncommon enough to be surprising. But the fact worth recording is that through it all he maintained a loyalty to his moral and religious principles and a sympathy with those who have to struggle which he lives.

Not a few men now occupy homes of their own through his quiet, timely offer to an employee to build him a house and accept the rent as repayment. Not a few men in temporary distress have had their life insurance premiums paid by him till they were on their feet again. In two colleges there is always some student whom he is supporting. To the church of which he is a member he gives liberally, not only of money, but of what costs him more—time and constant thought.

Without acquiring large wealth, as wealth is estimated in these days, he has been a constant giver to a multitude of good causes, and is director of the city missionary society to which, in his boyhood, he returned the gift which his heroic resolution made superfluous.—Youth's Companion.

Dominancy of the Christ

A prominent clergyman once visited the celebrated temple of Taj Mahal and saw in the center of the structure a peice of marble 16 feet across and 8 or 10 feet high. Upon this block stood a Mohammedan guard who raised his voice and cried his belief in one God and Mohammed as his prophet. The words echoed and re-echoed thru the sacred fane and seemed unable to stop. The guard was anxious that the world should know that the temple was now in the hands of a foreign religion from the one which caused its erection. The visitor was determined that the truth should have is recognition and persuaded the reluctant guard to allaw him to take his place, and mounting the chiseled platform and raising his voice he shouted, "Jesus highest over all," while the words swept to the arch, to dome and outside to the lofty peaks of the Himalayas—fitting type of the conspicuousness of the gospel throughout the earth and a prophecy of the ultimate dominancy of the Victor of sepulcher.—Homiletic Review.

Discouraged? Why?

Your heart is weary and heavy cares have come your way,
You wonder why with all your praying, yours is the same hard lot today.
You would have lifted the burden quickly,
You would have cast aside the heavy load,
You would have made a pleasant pathway,
You would have chosen an easy road.
But God Looks down from His heights in glory,
And answers your prayer in another way.
This is His word, of comfort and counsel,
Given to ease your load today:
Think it not strange that the fiery trial,
Tries you as though some strange pathway were thine,
Gold must be tried, and gems must be polished,
Ere precious jewels in glory can shine."

Not Able? Why?

You started bravely, and many a rugged path you trod,
You wonder why with all your struggling you do not seem to be nearer God,
You would have cleared the distance quickly,
You would have gone with one grand sweep,
You would have turned from the fiery pathway,
You would have rested your blistered feet;
But God stoops down from His heights in glory,
And answers your prayer in a better way,
This is His word of comfort and counsel,
Given to lift your load today:
"Think it not strange that the fiery trial,
Tries you as though some strange pathway were thine,
Gold must be tried and gems must be polished
Ere precious jewels in glory can shine."

Conqueror? Why?

Through Him who loved you, you learned at last to know His way,
And when the fiery trial lingered, you learned to trust as well as pray,
You learned to look through the trial to Jesus,
You learned to steadily look unto Him,
You learned to praise when the fire was hottest,
And count it all joy, when your joy was dim.
And God bends down from His heights in glory;
And answers your prayer in His tender way,
This is His word of comfort and counsel,
Given to strengthen your soul today:
"Think it not strange that the fiery trial
Tries you as though some strange pathway were thine,
Gold must be tried and gems must be polished
Ere precious jewels in glory can shine."

THE PRINCELY SPIRIT IN GIVING.

Some one has said, "If you can give but ten cents, give it like a prince." This spirit was shown some years ago when Dr. Scudder, one of the early missionaries to India, was in this country collecting money for his work. He received ten cents from a little boy with this note: "Dear Doctor Scudder, here are ten cents. When you want any more money call on me."

If we say this to our Great Leader, won't the shadows soon lift from the dark corners of the earth?—Selected.

Give, though thy gifts be small,

One of the great events in missionary circles that marks the present year is the celebration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the founding of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in Boston, Oct. 11-14. The event brought together not only Congregationalists from all over America and many other lands, but representatives from about fifty other missionary organizations were present to show their interest and fellowship. One of the most interesting events connected with the celebration was the trip to Andover and Bradford, participated in by about fifteen hundred persons. It was at Andover Seminary that the missionary students originated the idea of foreign mission work and at Bradford the American Board was organized. On Thursday afternoon of the celebration the Woman's Board held a meeting for women in Tremont Temple which was filled with women. Nearly sixty lady missionaries were present and had seats upon the platform.

The treasurer of the American Board, Mr. F. H. Wiggin, reported the amount of money contributed during the year closing in August, $989,408; and Secretary Barton reported pledges to the amount of $1.100,000 for the two million dollar endowment fund that the Board is trying to raise for higher education. Eleven young men and women who are about to sail for their respective stations on foreign fields were presented to the audience on Friday.

"Today, some Christians quail before the magnitude of a program for all mankind, and dismiss foreign missions as an impossible task. What shall we say, then, concerning the vision of a world program that pervades the New Testament, written by members of the most exclusive and conservetive race of all mankind? Alike in the words of Jesus and in the aspiration and deeds of his disciples, we find the stupendous assumption that the good tidings are to be borne to all the world."—C. Rexford Raymond.

A CHINESE TESTIMONY.

A Chinese Christian gave the following testimony in a prayer meeting, so a missionary reports:

"We Chinese have been disobedient children and have not dared to use the things created by a loving Father for his children's use. We have known there were silver and gold, iron, tin and coal hidden away in the ground, but we have feared to open mines lest we pierce the dragon's back with our holes in the ground. Now, as we are beginning to return to our Father, we realize that all things are ours and that we may use them freely."

Luxuries.

Two hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of articles classed as luxuries were imported into the United States during the fiscal year 1910, that total exceeding by more than $25,000,000 the figures of 1907, the former high-record year, and being actually more than double those of 1900,according to statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

The figures show the importation in 1910 of $48,000 000 worth of dimonds and other precious stones,$46,00,000 worth of laces and embroidery, $37,000,000, in tobacco and cigars, and $23,000,000 in wines ted diamonds and precious stones was $42, 500,000, and in 1900, $14,250,000. Laces and embroideries showed a slight falling off last year, there having been imported in 1907 $49, 500.000 worth, as against $23,000,000 in1900.

Wines, spirits, and malt liquors imported last year aggregated $23,500,000 against $22,000,000 in 1907, and $12,750,000, 1900. Automobiles and parts thereof imported last year aggregated in value $3,800,000 as compared with $4,800,000 in 1907. Art works imported in 1910 were valued at $21,000.000, as against $6,000,000 in 1907, and $2,500,000 in 1900, the large increase having been due to the removal of the tariff duty on art works twenty years old or over.

Such figures show plainly the prosperous conditions of the people, but they also show that many of the rich have by no means learned what is the best and noblest use of wealth.

CHRISTMAS MORN—1910.

By Uncle Millard.

We hail thee, Christmas morning,
Blest day of joy to all!
And at thy cheerful dawning,
Sweet memories recall.

Memories of a Savior,
Who, born in Bethlehem,
Is named our "Elder Brother," "Redeemer, "Lord" and "Friend."

Back to the lowly manger,
Where He, the Christ was born,
To greet the Heav'n-sent stranger,
Our thoughts on wings are borne.

We seem to hear the voices
Of angels, as they sing
"Hosanna in the highest,
Hosanna to our King!"

Of "Peace," too, they are singing,
And of "Good will to men;"
May we, with its true meaning
Take up the glad refrain.

And joining in the Anthem,
May we, as with one voice,
In harmony ascending,
Make Heaven itself rejoice!

ROBIN RED BREAST.

Oh, pretty little bird, why don't you talk to me?
If you only could how happy I would be.
Now don't fly away. I'll not do you any harm,
But will treat you kindly—so don't be alarmed.

Flowers blooming in our yard are a pretty sight,
Come and taste their sweetness from your dizzy height;
My heart, in your absence, is going pit-a-pat,
And I'm saying all the while, sweet bird, Come back—Come back!

A VERY KIND GOOSE.

Geese are always thought to be very stupid creatures, but perhaps they are so because they never had the chance of going to school!

Just think how very stupid boys and girls would be if you were never taught how to do your lessons!

There are some geese which have been taught to do things, however, and they do these things in a very clever way, so that makes me think that if every goose had the chance of going to school, no one would ever call them stupid any more.

Just to show you how clever a goose can be is it is taught in the right way, I will tell you a story.

This particular goose lived in France, and every Sunday, when an old blind woman wanted to go to church, the goose took hold of her dress in his beak, and pulled her gently along the road to the door of the church. Then, when the old woman was inside, Mr. Goose spent the time in strolling about the churchyard.

But when the church service was over he was always waiting at the door until the blind woman came to be taken back to her home.

Once a gentleman said to the old woman's daughter: "Aren't you afraid to let your mother come alone?"

"Oh, no, sir," said the daughter; "we are not afraid, as the goose was with her."—Selected.

DOG YEAR IN JAPAN.

By Ernest W. Clement.

The dog year in Japan recurs every twelve years. The dog is common in Japanese stories and folk-lore and figures as a beneficial and protective animal and sometimes is considered sacred. White dogs were considered messengers of Buddha.

One of the most common "toys" in Japan is a papier-mache dog, which is considered the perpetual protector of little children, and when hanging above their heads, makes them stop crying. And the words "Inu-no-ko," ("puppy") are believed to make the Japanese baby quiet when it cries in its dreams. Moreover, the tracing of the Chinese ideograph for dog upon a child's forehead is done to drive away the demons of disease. There was also a body of guards in the Palace to drive away evil spirits by barking like dogs.

Many proverbs celebrate the dog, such as, "When a dog barks, a hundred follow," expresses a pretty general truth all over the world. "If you become a dog, at least be the dog of a great house," may be compared with "Do nothing by halves."

The word, "Inu," (dog) is not uncommon in proper names. In the Province of Bizen is an island called "Inushima," to which dogs are said to have been exiled. "Inuboye" (Dog's Bark) is the name of the cape which is often the first land visible on approaching Japan from Hawaii and from which notice of the sighting of a steamer is sent to Yokohama.

The dog seems to be the symbol of faithfulness and loyalty, and "Dog Year" is generally considered a lucky year.

Her Imperial Majesty the Empress of Japan wrote a poem, "Even the little dog will quietly sleep, leaving the Imperial gate to man's watchcare." This is only another way of saying, that all is quiet and peaceful in Japan.

Ms. Yusada, Japanese superintendent of literature, has taken advantage of "dog year" to send out to daily newspapers, dog stories and articles teaching kindness and mercy to animals.—Condensed.

O'er Bethlehem's Hills.

O'er Bethlehem's hills there streamed a light
That glorified the still midnight.
O'er Bethlehem's hills rang out a song
Re-echoed by an angel throng.
That wondrous light, it still doth shine
In many a heart, and now in mine.
That glorious song, it still doth ring,
And make my heart rejoicing sing.

READING THE BIBLE.

The Editor proposes Bible reading for the incoming year systematically in concert, as it will be. Many of us should obligate to this system of studying the scriptures. Reading the Bible in a religious manner belongs to the best of worship. It is a good thing to obligate for well doing and such obligations as proposed tend very much to help on in the religious life. Many members of the church have never read the Bible through and some, as it seems, hardly read it at all. A very old man, who is not a member of the church has read the Bible regularly once a year through for over 60 years. It is right for a man called a "sinner" to read the Bible. The "people of God" do comparatively little religious Bible reading. The proposed subject should be presented to the public congregations by preachers and other teachers. This article proposes for the obligation of this "reporter" to try to read the Bible through in concert during the year 1911. W. F. G.

REV. W. L. HARRIS DEAD.

A note from Bro. Stubbins, of Henderson, dated Dec. 21, states that Rev. W. L. Harris died there about 8 o'clock in the morning and would be buried at 3 P. M. the following day. Brother Harris's death has not been unexpected for some time, as he had fallen a victim to the great "white plague"—tuberculosis. Bro. Harris was among the older of our ministers, and was widely known and well liked, being genial and courteous, and was a kind and sympathetic pastor. He leaves a wife and daughter and one sister, Mrs. Harrell.

—Rev. S. W. Taylor will live in Littleton.

man can accept a bishopric involving dominion over those that should be regarded as brethren, I do not see. But I remember that there were good men who owned African slaves, and so the phenomenon is not wholly unique.

If our M. E. brethren will repudiate and renounce the false and unChristian elements in their system, we can gladly unite with them. While they hold on to these elements, devotion to truth demands that we continue not only in separation, but that we also continue to protest against the evil they perpetuate.

When it was predicted that the lion and the lamb should lie down together, it was not meant that the lamb should lie down inside the lion.

Strength of the Reformers.—It is easily apparent to one reading the history of the period that the men who advocated the reform which resulted in the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church were intellectually the greatest men in the Methodist Episcopal Church at the time. Dr. Drinkhouse calls attention to the fact that many of them lived to an advanced age: "The reader cannot fail to have observed, as a coincidence, the extreme age of so many of the early Reformers. As an instance, there met in the Baltimore Book Room, in October, 1879, at the same time and not by concert, Rev. Thomas McCormick, then enghty-eight, Rev. W. C. Lipscomb, eighty-eight, and Abner Webb, an original member of St. John's Church, aged ninety-six and seven months:"

Moving.—One of our ministers who usually stays a good while at a place but who moves occasionally has just moved and he writes that "moving means something." All who have tried know, and I have tried it fifteen or more times and feel that I know. The man who has lived in one house all his life does not begin to appreciate all that is involved in tearing up and moving off to a new neighborhood and trying to settle down to living in a new house. Men are creatures of habit, and it goes hard with them to have their habits of life invaded and be forced to learn new ways. But man is more than a denizen of of the earth, and it is necessary to subordinate the lower to the higher. Ministers must move that the higher interests of men may be served, but yet it should be known that pulling up a man and planting him in new soil where he must take root again means something to the man transplanted.

OUR BIBLE SCHOOL.

Five persons have responded to our proposition for consecutive Bible study in a course running through two years, one year to each of the Testaments. Our aim will be:

1. To learn what the Bible says.
2. To learn what the Bible means.

We will not concern ourselves with questions of date and authorship except in so far as these bear on the meaning of the text.

We hope those who enter the course will find it intellectually interesting and spiritually profitable. The following have enrolled so far:

1. Mrs. W. M. Pegram.
2. Mrs. B. F. Norman.
3. Miss Xannie Stowe.
4. W. F. Grabbs.
5. Mrs. W. E. Swain.

We want at least five more names. See the proposition in Herald of last week, first page.

CONSECRATED PURPOSE.

When one is mastered by a purpose to do what he can for the Lord's cause he is certain to be enabled by the Lord to accomplish a work which will continue to be a greater blessing than that one had conceived of. What is needed by many members of churches is a consecrated purpose to do more for Christ's kingdom than they are now doing. There are poor people who might, if they would, give much more for the good work than they are presently giving. Here is an old story, yet it is just as forceful now as it ever was, if one will heed it. It had its origin in England, and, though somewhat long, I will quote it: "Mary Wallis was a domestic servant, and one night, as she walked home, the thought came to her, 'what if God could strengthen my hands, so that I could build Him a little chapel?' She was so possessed with the idea that she knelt down and vowed to devote her earnings to this object, keeping only enough for bare necessities. Her wages—it was a century ago—were $40 a year, but she was not discouraged. She got possession of a slaughter-house, and made it fit for use by the villagers on Sundays. At last she had saved $500, and then she started to build a chapel. She needed $100 more, and was in sore straits, when two strangers, who had heard of her noble self-sacrifice, gave her that sum to complete the chapel. It was opened by Rowland Hill, and was divinely blessed for many a year. Only a servant!" Yes, and she was a true servant of God. She did not make her poverty an excuse for not devoting to the Lord what she did possess. She had a purpose to give according to her ability. She purposed to deny herself for the sake of her Lord. She appreciated the fact that Christ had denied himself of very much for the sake of saving such ones as she was. She was not so selfish as to let her Saviour do all he could for her, and be unwilling to do anything for him. O, there are thousands in the churches who want Christ to save them, while they are unwilling to give anything or do anything for the salvation of others! How unworthy of salvation they are! Are we?

NEGLECTING THE WORD.

A thought sometimes prevails that reading the Bible belongs to women, children, and people of sentiment and much emotion. Wonder what a "high" person thus thinking would do with the counsel and the example of the cultured and scholarly and vigorous minded Emperor of Germany who said recently:

"I read often and with pleasure in the Bible, which lies on my night table and in which I have underscored the most precious thoughts. I cannot understand how so many men neglect the Word of God. In all my thinking and action I always put before myself, What would the Bible say to that? In hours of trouble and anxiety I turn to it for comfort. * * * I cannot think of a life innerly alienated from God. We must pass through Gethsemane hours, hours in which our pride is humbled. This is hard for us, as we would willingly be our own masters."

NO PAPER NEXT WEEK.

In accordance with a goodly custom of the Southland, we suspend publication next week. We wish all our readers a delightful Christmas week in the highest and holiest sense, and a glad and hopeful entrance upon a happy New Year.

ROUSEMENT.

By Prof. W. A. Harper.

I would say enthusiasm, but we have had enough of that; or resolutions, but I fear we have had enough of them also. Rousement is what we need—which means enthusiasm put into action—resolutions become fact.

There can be no doubt that enthusiasm that wanes and resolutions that sleep the long sleep do monstrous harm in our church assemblies. It is a dangerous thing to stir the emotions and then not conserve the consequent enthusiasm by definite, well-planned work. Better not introduce a resolution or make a stirring speech, unless you have the assurance of carrying out your resolution and the skill to direct the emotions that will be aroused. Some preachers ought never to close a preaching service without the invitation to accept Christ—because they stir the emotions, which, unless they are acted upon by the individual, render him callous to future appeals.

But to our theme—the need of rousement.. There is special appropriateness in this theme at this season. We have the custom of forming resolutions at the beginning of the new year. We have done this for a long time, and no doubt the custom will never wholly perish from the earth. Many of these resolutions are never carried out. Why? We were not in earnest. Our emotions were stirred, but we did not properly direct them. We lacked rousement.

Our church, too, needs rousement.. We met in general assembly last April in Suffolk. We resolved then and there to make the great Laymen's Missionary Movement effective in our Southern Convention. We appointed a leader for each Conference. Eight months are gone—and what have we done?

The banner of the Young People's Convention has as its motto: "Teacher-Training and Organized Classes in every Sunday school; a Christian Endeavor Society in each Church." How many measure up to this standard? 'Tis needless to further particularize. We know we have resolutions enough—we know the bodies which passed these resolutions were enthusiastic enough—let us hope not too enthusiastic—and yet we have not attained. Shall we?

That depends. If we combine with our enthusiasm some hard work in our locality; if we mix our resolutions with practical application; if we get "roused," employ "rousement," we shall succeed; otherwise we shall fail.

Brethren, I plead with you, at this new resolution-forming season not for less enthusiasm, not even for fewer resolutions (tho something might be said on that theme), but for rousement in our work, for the planning of our work and for the working of our plans. Let us all resolve never to introduce another resolution unless there goes with the practical method of achieving its recommendations. Let us bend every energy to realize the resolutions which are now upon us with enthusiasm, yes, but also with the unflagging perseverance that comes from soul rousement. We need it

C. E TOPIC FOR DEC 25—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Be Born in Us Today, Eph. 3: 14-21.
(Christmas Meeting).

The Scripture:. By all means have the Scripture recited from memory. Let a brief comment follow.

The Leader: The leader would do well to speak of Christmas not so much as an event, but as a spirit. Let him show that the Christmas spirit, the spirit of sacrifice, helpfulness, love, is what the world is poor in ,that this spirit should permeate the entire year and not be limited to one day or to one week of rejoicing. Not what we receive, but what we give, is the real test and standard of Christmas.

A Novel Christmas Idea: We have Sunday-school Christmas trees for our little folks at home. Why not have an Endeavor Christmas tree for some one else—the Orphanage say? Have every member bring something, put it in a barrel, or several barrels if neseccary and ship to the Orphanage. Don't you feel that you would enjoy that? I know the orphans would. Try it.

Written Work:.An essay of three minutes on the "Origin of Christmas." An address of 3 minutes on "The Real Meaning of Christmas."

Questions for Voluntary Answer in the Meeting:

Why should we be glad at Christmas?

How can we be glad then?

What must be born in us to make us Christ's?

How does this birth take place?

What is our part in it?

Can we help others to this new birth? How?

How do we know Christ dwells in us?

How do others know it?

What is the proper way to keep Christmas?

How may we have every day a Christmas day?

Scripture gems for voluntarily giving in the meeting, with a Sentence Comment.

Ye shall know—what?	John 14: 20.
Perfect in one,	John 17: 23.
In Him was life,	John 1: 4.
Life in Himself,of what kind?,	Jno. 5: 26.
More Abundant Life,	John 10: 10.
If Christ be in you—what?	Rom. 8: 10.
Unto eternal life,	Rom. 5: 21.
Shall also quicken you,	Rom. 8: 11.
Should not serve sin,	Rom. 6: 6.
Crucified with Christ,	Gal. 2: 20.
A New Creature,	Eph. 2: 15.
Having abolished Sin in the flesh,	Eph. 2: 15.
Put on the New Man,	Eph. 4: 24.

The music: Be sure to have special Christmas music and let it breathe the real spirit of the season.

For Next Week: Let the leader for the first meeting of the New Year ask each one to consider carefully what he regards as a new step the Society ought to take for the next year and to report it to the chairman of the Lookout Committee not later than Friday. Let that committee have a meeting on Saturday and adopt a New Year Resolution for the Society to be presented and formally adopted at the Sunday's Prayer-meeting.

C. E. TOPIC FOR JAN. 1—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Untrodden Ways, Josh. 3: 1-17.
(A New Year's Consecration Service).

The Scripture: Have the Scripture read dramatically, the leader reading the narrative parts with a special member to read the part spoken by the officers, another the words of Joshua, and another the words of the Lord. Such a rendition ought to give charm and zest to the meeting. Have a short comment by the pastor.

The Roll-Call: Give every single member some special work to perform, handing the names, in the order you desire them called, to the Secretary. This will insure a well-planned meeting and give variety to the roll-call. Make a special effort to have every member present. The Roll-Call will come after the reading of the Scripture as suggested above.

The Leader: When the leader's name is called, (and he will likely put himself first on the list), he should speak of the fact that we are never done in our spiritual work, Christ's command is "Follow me." In his great commission, his words were "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Let him speak of the joy and satisfaction, and peace of mind this constant companionship of his brings us, and especially if its helpfulness at the beginning of the New Year.

Written Work: An essay of three minutes on, The making of New Resolutions; another on "Christian Endeavor Consecration meetings."

Questions for provoking Thought:

What is the good of making resolutions?

Is frequent self-examination desirable?

On what condition only will our good resolutions pan out?

What is the most valuable resolution for a sinner to make?

For a Christian?

There the workman sees his labor
Taking form—
Every mason in the quarry, every builder on the shore,
Every chopper in the palm grove, every raftsman at the oar,
Hewing wood or drawing water, splitting stone or cleaving sod,
All the dusky ranks of labor in the regiment of God.
March together towards his triumph; do the tasks his hands prepare;
Honest toil is holy service, faithful work is praise and prayer.

REPAYING KINDNESS.

About twenty-five years ago there lived a man near me who was very poor, yet he and his family of wife and three children seemed to be perfectly happy and contented. Their poverty did not keep them from being happy and cheerful. You would not on meeting this man on the street or highway learn or see that he was taking life so happily. You would have to have business with him to learn that he possessed that which some one has said is worth more than kingdoms—contentment.

You would not think that a man without any worldly possessions more than a few household goods and living in a log cabin would be very contented. I did not learn the secret of this man's happiness and contentment until he was preparing to move away into another county. "Never allow any one to do more for you than you do for them." These words were spoken by one of the children while he was getting two chickens to take to a boy who had given him one. I got interested. "Is that the way you always do?" "Yes," said he. "Pa says that it is better than the Golden Rule."

I began to think about the life of this man in the two years that I had known him. On reflection I saw that he had lived up to his ideal of life of doing more for others than they had done for him. He had done this by speaking kindly of you, by acts of kindness in time of sickness or need and by deeds and service of money value. In his straitened circumstances he had not done anything to attract the attention of men but the idea of the duty of man to place the world in debt to him impressed itself upon me and I shall never forget it.

There was something good about this man and the pity is that his circumstances in life were such that his fellowmen were not bettered more by his having lived. However, we have learned a great lesson that all of us can put in practice, that is by putting your fellowmen and the world in debt to you by your acts and deeds and by doing more in every way for your immediate associates than they do for you. Try this and be contented and happy.—S. G. Satterwhite, in Henderson Gold Leaf.

BRO. HICKS COMES AGAIN.

Dear Editor:—I note your views on the union of Methodists. Church union is not so important as it seems to you. All church government is of three kinds, Episcopacy, Ruling Elders, and Congregational. I believe three fourths of all Christians are under the Episcopal form. The Catholic church is the most numerous and prosperous of all. Are its communicants suffering? Would it be so strong, powerful, influential without its Episcopacy? Are all the great churches that have bishops clinging to and operating on "false and un-Christian elements?" Is it not true that not one in six of the church members throughout the world cares anything at all about the form of government of the church?

Do the many thousands upon thousands of the intelligent members of the M. E. Church, Episcopal Church, Catholic Church suffer oppression, mistreatment and wrong? If so why do they not rouse the other members to resistance and throw off the yoke of oppression? In its practical workings does the M. E. Church in one case in five hundred send a charge a minister it does not want or administer its temporal affairs oppressively or offensively to its intelligent laity?

Our church government is neither Episcopal nor Congregational. The clergy is perhaps a majority in all our councils, and yet they, according to our system, have and exercise as much authority as all our members. Each minister has as much power and authority as forty laymen; but they are not taking away our liberties. The double occupation of territory, the expense of it, the scarcity of ministers, the identity of beliefs and doctrines, and the advancing intelligence of the age, all seem to me to encourage union; tho' I admit that it is difficult to arrange. But the points you stress, Bro. Editor, don't bother me at all.

The question of church government is not to be likened to the dominion of the princes of the gentiles referred to by the Savior in your quotation. I might quote, too, if I needed, to, "Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth," etc; and St. Paul's formula for bishop making. The fact that kings once beheaded people at will without trial, and bishops construed their powers oppressively are matters of history, but are no reasons why I fear they ever will again.

A few people in every organization lead and all the others follow. It is true that union of several organizations reduces the number of leaders in them, but that makes union none the less desirable. It seems impossible, however, to arouse any interest in the subject in either of the churches; and I should not have written this but that I thought I might be expected to do so or would be considered to have "backed down."

T. T. H.

Some of Bro. Hick's questions are amazing. Does he seriously ask whether the subjects of the Pope of Rome suffer? We thought it well known by everybody that they suffer, everybody but themselves. They suffer a lack of development, a lack of freedom, and a consequent loss of the highest spiritual manhood. The subjects of other central church governments suffer in the same way in lesser degree. May we, Yankee-like, answer your questions by asking others:

Of the three ecclesiastical forms, episcopal, presbyterial, and congregational, is not the presbyterial a mean between the other two? Is not the true position usually found between two extremes?

Since the consciences or feelings or natures of men in the Christian church have demanded these three forms of government, since all have existed for centuries in response to this demand, does it not seem reasonable to suppose that among all the millions of Methodist Christians there will be some in every generation whose consciences or feelings or natures will demand the presbyterial form of organization in preference to either of the other two? Does it not therefore seem like an outrage to attempt to abolish the presbyterial form in the Methodist world?

Was the office of bishop in Paul's time at all comparable to the office bearing the same name in the episcopal churches of to-day?

We don't want you to "back down," Bro. Hicks, but we want you to turn round, come back to the true position, and stand there till the sky falls. We all like you, but we can't follow you in the way you are headed now. Pardon me, but you seem to be in danger of that dreadful thing they call "latitudinarianism." We read in the New Testament of a man who while religious conflict, resulting in physical violence, raged fiercely about him, "cared for none of those things." It is possible for one to be so broad that he easily disregards distinctions that others regard important and even vital. You may think that I am suffering from the opposite evil of narrowness or sectarianism. If so, let us both take the same medicine—the teachings of the New Testament.

—The anniversary of the Laymen's Missionary Convention of last year will be celebrated in Greensboro on Thursday and Friday of next week. There will be speeches by prominent men from abroad, among them Bro. S. R. Harris, of Henderson. Bro. J. Norman Wills is chairman of the committee on program.

—We heartily thank Mrs. Geo. W. Coble for choosing the Herald (a whole year of it) for a Christmas gift for two of her friends.

FROM ONE OF OUR MINISTERS.

Dear Bro. McCulloch:

I want to say to you that I was pleased with your reply to Bro. Hicks. I have laid it away for future reference. What is the matter with Bro. Hicks? Does a thing appeal to him simply because it is big, that is bulky? If so, why not join the Roman Catholics? I see nothing desirable in the M. E. Church that we do not already possess except numbers. On the other hand we possess all that they possess that is worth while and a great deal more, dropping numbers. Really it is a question with me whether the union of all Protestantism, of which the union of all Methodists seems to be a forerunner, is as desirable as some of our great men seem to think. I would quicker think that the divine hand was in the breaking up of the Church into its many different branches than that the divine hand is in the present movement to bring about the organic union of all the different branches. If I am not mistaken I have an Old Book and a New Book which tells about the time when the whole world spake one language, how that they began to build a tower whose top should reach to Heaven, and how the Lord looked upon them and saw that nothing would be restrained from them which they imagined to do, and went down and confounded their language. This Old Book that I have and no other book that I have ever seen tells anything about an attempt made by God since those days to unify the languages. I wonder if the eternal purpose of God is not being worked out as well through the division of the languages as it would be through the unification of the languages? I also wonder if he is not being as fully glorified and his eternal purpose as rapidly worked out through a divided church as if the church were united? We do know that when the church was united it became an organization of corruption. History tells us about its oppression, its lack of spirituality, its false doctrine of indulgences, the ignorance in which it kept the masses, even its idolatry. How much reason do we have to believe now that if the whole church were again united it would not drift into corruption? I know it may be said that with the present enlightenment such is impossible, but it is easy to make an assertion. What would an organization the size of the whole church united care for the criticism of a few individuals on the outside? Today where do you find the greatest degree of love, holiness, meekness, humility, righteousness, spirituality and vital godliness? In the Roman Catholic church we have the greatest number, but what about the things which I have just mentioned? I am satisfied that as the churches grade down in numbers it will be found that they also grade up in the very things which make a church the salt of the earth, the light, life and salvation of the world. This certainly does not favor organic union which we are asked to pray and work for. The churches do watch each other, and in this vigilance there is a wholesomeness that the church cannot well get along without. Who can calculate the good that has come to the church through its divisions? At any rate we know that a divided church has done more to destroy sin and lift up the world in the past four hundred years than a united church did in the fifteen undred years preceding this period. What would Grant's army have been contending against Lee if all its strength had been condensed into one individual? Only a few shots from the Southern side would have demolished the whole army. Its great strength and final victory lay in its great divisions and subdivisions, and the one hundred and twenty thousand units composing all these, all acting in unison, but greatly in different directions, and in perfect obedience to the command of the one common head. The strength of great steel bridges lies not in a single bar, rod or bolt, but in the number of bars, bolts and rods properly supporting each other. If the North had united all its different armies into one great unwieldy body it would have been much more difficult for it to have overcome the South. Possibly it never could. Even so the great strength and final victory of the church will not be found in the merging of all its branches into one great unwieldy body, but in its great divisions, in their subdivisions, in the millions of units composing these, all acting in unison, but greatly in different directions, and in perfect obedience to the command of the one common head-Jesus Christ. I know it may be said all the armies of the North were united under the Federal Government. It may be said the different bars, bolts and rods in a great steel bridge are united in and form one bridge, and that in this fact lies the strength. This I grant. But it does not follow from this that we should have either a Pope or a Bishop, or any one individual, call him whatever you please, or any number of individuals acting as head of all the denominations, or that all the denominations should be merged into what is called organic union: for are not all the denominations united under the one Government of Christ? And do they not all constitute the Church of Christ? Are they not all striving to accomplish the same glorious purpose, though they may be moving along different lines? Cannot a hundred men walk together, cannot they work together, cannot they love each other except their bodies become organically one? Cannot all the different denominations walk together, work together, love each other except they become organically one? Cannot the Methodist Episcopal church and the Methodist Protestant church walk together and work together and love each other except they become organically one? They certainly cannot become organically one till they can walk together and work together and love each other, and when this has come the union will not be needed.

There is not to be found on the face of this earth a Christian denomination which does not render allegiance to Jesus. They all obey what they understand to be his will, and the small denomination is just as competent to judge of the will of Christ as the larger, yes, it is as able to judge as all the denominations combined: for the Holy Spirit can just as easily enlighten the minds of a few as of millions. If Christ has given to the Catholics a Pope, if he has given to the Methodist Episcopals a Bishop, he has no less given to the Methodist Protestants Mutual Rights. Indeed, these different names and forms of government are only the different names and peculiar forms of discipline of the divisions of the one Grand Army of Jesus, all moving on the enemy, all fighting for the same glorious end. In this arrangement I am sure there is a great advantage, for when one division of the army is defeated another can be sent in to take its place and thus the gap be filled. More than once have I seen one denomination fail in a community and another step in and succeed.

I am firmly of the belief that all the union we need we already have or it is rapidly being brought about. Are we not united in hating sin? Are we not united in love to Christ? Are we not united in spreading the Gospel to all the world? Do we not love each other? It may be said that the Catholics hate the Protestants and that certain Protestant denominations hate certain other Protestant denominations, but organic union will not bring about love and fellowship between these. Here love and fellowship must precede organic union and when these have already come organic union is not needed. I for one believe that the eternal purpose of God is being worked out more rapidly through a divided church than it can be through a united church. This is true if testimony of history is worth anything. I have just read in the Methodist Protestant an article under the heading "Shall we pray for the union of Methodism?" in which the writer says: "Our fathers in 1828 contended for a representative Methodism and the contention forced a separation. But long since those principles have been adopted by every branch of Methodism throughout the world, and the Methodist Episcopal church, in its last General Conference assembled, sent us a written acknowledgement of their error and apologizing for the same. Can they do more?'' If I am not laboring under a great error this is partly the truth but not the whole truth. Does not our church stand for more than a representative Methodism? Does it not also stand for the preacher's Right of Appeal? Suppose all the different branches of Methodism have adopted a representative form of government, shall the ministers, after having fought the battle and won the victory for the laymen, surrender and go back into the M. E. church, having won nothing for themselves? Would not the minister again be in the hands of the Bishop? Would he not have to meekly submit to the Bishop's will? Would he not again be helpless in the hands of his master? I am willing to help fight but I also want a hand in the spoil. But have they really adopted a representative form of government? Does not the pastor nominate the persons from whom the church must elect? If so does this not amount in the end to an appointment by the pastor? Is the number of lay voters equal to the number of ministerial voters? Are the laymen represented in the law-making bodies of the M. E. church?

Unless the church nominates and elects its own representatives, and unless these are equal in number to the ministerial voters, and unless these go to the legislative bodies of the M. E. church, how can it be said that what our fathers contended for has been granted? How the leaders of the M. E. church can assert a thing like this when they have nothing but the shadow is more than I can understand. But may be they have granted it. I have not their discipline present and consequently do not know. But I am laboring under the impression that they have nothing but the shadow of lay-representation and not even the shadow of the preacher's Right of Appeal.

If the Methodist Protestant church was conceived and born in the desire for Mutual Rights and the preacher's Right of Appeal would it not be glorious(?) for the descendants of those old heroes, after having maintained the struggle for nearly eighty years, and when the thing for which they have been contending is about to be realized by their oppressed brethren, to surrender and go back into the M. E. church? On meeting the old heroes they might say we fought bravely, we kept up the struggle for a long time, and we finally took the shadow for the substance.

But this is not why I am opposed to the union. I care not for a feather. It cannot be doubted that the people who constitute the Methodist Protestant church today have accomplished more for the Master's Kingdom than they could possibly have accomplished had they been in the M. E. church. This is why I am opposed to the union. It is because I believe the Methodist Protestant church can better serve the Master's Kingdom standing alone and holding up its great principles before the ecclesiastical world than merged into an organic union with the M. E. church or any other church. It is a great church. It is a grand church. It is a pure church. It is a church of equality. It is a church of freedom. It is a church having but one Master and all its members are brothers and sisters. It is a church having the Spirit of Christ. It is a glorious church. It is all this not because of its money, not because of its numbers, not because of its place in the social world, not because of its place in the intellectual world, but because of the principles for which it stands, allegiance to none but Jesus Christ and the universal brotherhood of mankind. I do not say that these things are peculiar to the Methodist Protestant church, but I do believe that they possess a degree of truth when applied to it that they do not possess when applied to any other church. It is entirely too great to be lost sight of or to be swallowed up by something larger in bulk but much smaller in the things which make for real greatness. It was great enough for its founders and it is much greater than the greatest man in it today. It is as broad as the rights of mankind and it is as high as heaven for Christ is its head. Does this afford sufficient elbow room for our greatest and most ambitious men? Yes, if the ambition be an ambition to serve. But if it is an ambition to rule there is by no means room enough. If the M. E. church is ready to grant everything for which our fathers contended then let us go, but if not, let us fight on, let us press the battle to the end, let our terms of surrender be unconditional. In the past we have succeeded. In the present we are succeeding. In the future we shall succeed by the grace of God coupled together with the universial love of mankind for freedom and equality. The world is not only destined to be free politically, it is also destined to be free ecclesiastically. This great Republic stands proclaiming Liberty to the political world, so the Methodist Protestant church, born in a land of Freedom, stands proclaiming Liberty to the ecclesiastical world. Until oppression in the ecclesiastical world shall be destroyed, until in this field full freedom and equality shall be granted let us not think or union.

J. A. Burgess.

P. S. This is not written in reply to Bro. Hicks. The editor did that nicely. I have written this just to express myself. I have been feeling like expressing myself ever since the union talk has been up. I think I can rest well from now on. Really I haven't any fear of the union. I do not think those who are laboring for it will ever be able to deliver the goods.

TO THE PASTORS OF THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Dear Brother Pastor:—

I shall not trouble you to read a long communication, only a word, but one of vast importance. All the denominations this fall and winter have passed ringing resolutions against the near-beer saloon and the jug trade, and have called upon the legislature to prohibit the one and petition Congress to prohibit the other, have endorsed the Anti-Saloon League and its literature and urged their people to give it moral and financial support.

Today is the day of action, and in my judgment, if the church will now act in keeping with these resolutions, the legislature will be induced to do her part. Let me emphasize three things that you can do and by doing will greatly aid the cause of temperance reform. Give a special service to the cause of temperance in the next thirty days. At this service (1) preach on some phase of the temperance work, (2) call upon your congregation to vote by a standing vote if they favor the overthrow of the near-beer saloon and the jug trade and (3) take a collection for the League.

The Conventions and Conferences, for their churches, have not only endorsed the work of our State Organization, but have called upon their people to give it this financial support. We ought to have fifteen hundred dollars in the next forty-five days to properly carry forward this fight against these evils. In the getting of this money, I believe the pastor holds the key to the situation and I trust, Brother Pastor, that you will use it by giving your congregation (or congregations) an opportunity to contribute to this important work. When you have had this special service, send us a check for the amount collected, and in a letter give us the results of your meeting. These letters, showing how the people enthusiastically voted for the overthrow of these evils, will be a great help to us before the committees at Raleigh and in our personal work among the representatives. I shall depend on you. Also write your representative and tell him what your people want.

This communication is of prime importance, therefore I do not believe you will let it go to your waste-basket. I believe you realize the urgency of this call and will carry out the above plan. It would be nothing less than a calamity for our pastors to fail us at this point and would certainly do hurt to the cause of Christ in every particular. For the sake of the old drunkard who is still being debauched by these evils, for the sake of the young men, who are being lead astray, for the sake of the many mothers, whose hearts are being crushed and for Christ's sake, I pray you to help us win in this fight.

Yours for victory,
R. L. Davis, Superintendent
N. C. Anti-Saloon League.

The following verses are the words of a song our mother many long years ago sang to us children as a lullaby. Let those who read them if your hearts are burdened with many cares and sorrows, look up and rejoice, for that same Jesus sits at the right hand of the Father in Heaven today and is waiting to hear your faintest prayer for pardon and peace and deliverance from all your fears.

Gethsemane.

"As nature was sinking in stillness to rest,
The last beams of day-light shone dim in the West,
O'er fields by pale moonlight in lonely retreat,
In, deep meditation I wandered my feet.
In passing a garden I lingered to hear
A voice faint and plaintive from one that was near.
The voice of the sufferer affected my heart
While pleading in anguish the poor sinner's part.
Approaching him nearer I asked him his name,
He answered, 'tis Jesus, from Heaven I came.
I am thy Redeemer, for thee I must die,
The cup is most bitter but cannot pass by.
O'er whelmed with my sins I fell at his feet.
I plead for his pardon so full and complete.
Thy sins which are many I freely forgive,
He answered; go tell it that others may live.
And then in a moment he banished my fears
As down o'er his bosom flowed sweat, blood and tears
He still remained kneeling upon the cold ground
And I felt that his anguish of soul was profound.
Yet how sweet was that moment He bade me rejoice!
His words, O how pleasant, how cheering his voice
I flew from the garden to spread it abroad,
I shouted salvation and glory to God.
I am now on my journey to mansions above.
My soul's full of glory of light, peace and love.
When I think of the sufferer, the prayers and the tears
Of that loving Stranger that banished my fears
The day of bright glory is rolling around
When Gabriel the archangel the trumpet shall sound.
My soul then in rapture and glory shall rise
To gaze on that Stranger with unclouded eyes.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

That Safe and Profitable Investment.

Did you read the "Important Notice" published two weeks ago? Look up the church paper and read it. It invites you to invest in an enterprise which guarantees dividends unequaled in number and value. No matter if you are rich or poor you ought to read that "Important Notice," and then invest according to your ability, for you are assured of a dividend when you make your first investment. Just find the paper and peruse that article.

I am glad to report that already friends have begun to respond to that invitation, and are taking shares. The Cambridge Church, Ohio Conference, has taken two of the $100.00 shares, and a lady in the Maryland Conference has taken one of the $50.00 shares, these to be paid in the month of January, 1911.

The call is for 100 individuals to give $100.00 each, 100 individuals to give $50.00 each, 200 individuals to give $25.00 each, 300 individuals to give $10.00 each, 400 individuals to give $5.00 each. Payment to be made in the month of January, 1911. Here is your opportunity to invest in the great enterprise promoted by the Lord Jesus Christ in which the world's evangelization is involved. Our church must do its full share, and your Board is seriously embarrassed by the lack of funds with which to do the things upon which the growth, if not the maintenance of the Japan work depends. The receipts thus far are totally inadequate to meet the demands upon the Board, and the extraordinary requirements as land and buildings, etc in Japan cannot be provided without special offering for which we are calling.

The Christmas Offering from the Sunday-schools.

More schools are sending in a Christmas offering this year, and individuals are responding to the special appeals sent out. Many more are expected, because they are urgently needed, and it is believed our people will not let our enterprise in Japan be seriously crippled for the lack of funds.

I am greatly encouraged by the kind remittances. Here are samples. A lady in Indiana sent $15.00, and added "Wish I could send more." A Maryland pastor "It was a free will offering, and we are glad to send it on for the great cause. Lady in Ohio. "I know the joy of giving." Michigan lady "We wish it had been more ($5.00) but we have only 10 members in our school." Ohio lady, "It was little use to ask for just a collection. I gave each of the young people a nickel with which to earn something." New Jersey Superintendent, "In answer to your earnest appeal and heart's desire to see the world saved, we enclose $17.00 the offering from our school together with our prayers that God will bless your labors and answer your prayers." Maryland lady sent $5.00 and wrote "It is indeed the widow's mite. I wish with all my heart it was more, but I have done what I could." Lady in Texas wrote, "I take pleasure in sending you $5.00. Will celebrate my 'King's birthday' by this little offering for his benighted children." Maryland layman, "Few of the calls upon me are entitled to more serious consideration, I recognize, than this one. Again expressing my regrets that just now I cannot be more liberal." A Kansas pastor, "We are sending you $12.50. You can give our honored and able superintendent the praise for this good thing." An Ohio layman, "When your appeal was received I felt it would be impossible for me to do anything, but I came across your letter the other day, and it has clung to me so persistently that I cannot get it off my mind until I make the enclosed small offering. I wish I could do more." Reader, have you given to Jesus that which he asks of you as his disciple?

SPEKIN' O' WISHES FOR A HAPPY NEW YEAR,

Here are some I found. They are so good, that I concluded to adopt them as my own and apply them to you.

I wish you a sound body—the ecstasy of full lungs, dreamless sleep, and a zestful appetite. This is the happiness of the artist.

I wish you an open mind—the delight of being hospitable to all truth, keen for the inner meaning of things. This is the happiness of the learner.

I wish you a kind heart—the luxury of being helpful, tender toward frailty and fault in others, reckoning your gains by your gifts, more ready to suffer than to inflict pain. This is the happiness of the friend.

Most of all, I wish you contentment—the calm rapture of being able to accept life's crosses without bitterness and its crowns without vanity, greeting each new day with a cheer, believing in the Father's house at the end of the road, and His rewarding smile. This is the happiness of the Christian.

—The main building of Trinity College, Durham, was burned yesterday. No loss of life.

—Greensboro has had a series of tragedies: last Saturday morning, Mr. Andrew Weatherly fell in front of a moving train and was killed and horribly mangled. On Sunday morning, Mr. Joe Morehead, president of the Guilford Battle Ground Co., died. On Sunday night, Judge S. B. Adams cut his throat in an attempt at suicide. On Monday evening, fire broke out on S. Elm St. and destroyed about $75,000 in property.

—Rev. R. M. Andrews resigned as publisher of the Minutes on account of the inconvenience of having the work done at a distance.

Bought in Reidsville.

A church lot, centrally located, 55x 160 ft., on Lindsy St. This lot is on one of the main streets, and 200 ft. from N. and S. Main St., only about 300 yards from the center of the business part of town. The lot cost $600.00. I can more than get our money out of it. You see we have good depth and plenty wide for our present plan. The deed is to the trustees of the M. P. church forever, never to revert, if ever disposed of it through sale by the trustees of the M. P's. "In fee simple, ours." Now we have the lot and $1000.00 subscribed and a little more. We want to build a $3000.00 house. We are now collecting and trying to swell our subscription to at least $1700.00 by March the 25th. We want to begin the building in April. Yesterday while on the train Mr. J. H. Griffin asked me if I was taking subscriptions. I told him yes, and he gave me 50 cents and sister G. A. Ingram said I want a little in your church in Reidsville and gave me 50 cents. Now we have had a hard time to get a lot and it well located, but we have it now. I want to publicly thank the board of Church Extension for turning aside from their business a little while, and for their encouragement; and to Bro. T. J. Ogburn who came in behalf of the board and helped us to decide on the lot. I am glad, too, I can say the lot selected is satisfactory all around. Now I feel like I have many friends in North Carolina, who if they knew the situation would give us from 50 cents up and I appeal to you. This is the Lord's house and we have 37 members here without a home near by and I believe we will have 45 in two weeks more.

I will acknowledge your amount through the M. P. Herald, down to .05. We are thinking of having four memorial windows; Bro. Alson Gray, Bro. Wills, Bro. Lineberry and Bro. Bunch. If you want to go on one of these, please say so. How many Sunday-school children in N. C. will give 5 cts. for the Sunday school room? I have met all my appointments on Haw River Ct. except Sandy Cross (it snowed). I will be at Mispah the second Sunday evening at 3 p. m., and Sandy Cross the 5th Sunday at 11 a. m., I hope.

OUR BIBLE SCHOOL.

The class of ten has been made up. The following are the new names:

6. Mrs. Geo. L. Curry.
7. Mrs. R. R. Ross.
8. Mr. W. A. Speer.
9. Miss Mary J. Gordon.
10. Clyde Auman.

Bro. Speer says an entire class of his will unite also, and he will send their names next week. If there are others, let us have their names.

Our aim is to find out (1) what the Bible says, and (2) what the Bible means.

To find out what it says, we must faithfully read it. To find out what it means, we must carefully study it and discuss its meaning. And we must be honest in this. We must be ready to let old interpretations pass, if they have been shown to be false, and we must not be too ready to accept new opinions. The truth is what we want—that truth which God deemed so important that he chose a special mode of approach to our minds with it.

Lesson for Next Week.

Genesis, chapters one to ten, inclusive.

The beginning of the world and the early history of the human race are here sketched. Note that time was occupied in the creation.

Suggestions as to the Eden Story.

If you will read closely, you will see that there are two accounts of the creation of man, differing from each other in some respects. Let us suppose as a working hypothesis that the first is a literal account of the origin of man and that the second is an allegorical account of the introduction of evil into man's life. If this be correct, then the two trees, the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, are symbols and represent something. It is commonly conceded, we believe that the cherubim placed at the entrance of the garden were symbolical and not real creatures. May it not be that the garden of Eden was itself symbolical? If it was real, when did it disappear? If it was symbolical what did it symbolize? There is much to study about.

Questions.

1. How long was it by the figures given in Genesis from the creation of man to the flood?

2. How long before the flood did Methuselah die?

If any have to buy new Bibles, we would recommend the American Revision.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Henderson.

We have gotten somewhat established in the parsonage and are beginning to feel that we are at home now, having spent one whole month in doing this. We are much pleased with our new home. The house is quite a nice one, especially the interior, the garden is ample, with coal house etc. And it is in a good community. The church is to be congratulated upon its good purchase.

The S. S. entertainment was quite free of formalities. Each family was asked to give a reading or speech, and many of the families responded in the person of the smallest child or father of the child. When this was concluded the roll of the four smallest classes was called, the children were invited to fish in a corner, hid by a curtain, and what is unusual in fishing, every one made a catch.

Our community was fortunate enough to escape the Christmas fatalities that so frequently come in the form of death from the unloaded gun and severe burns etc. but the noise is terrific. What a pity for the multitudes of us, the ninety per cent of us, to be terrorized by the baby waker, cannon cracker nuisance in the very season of the year when our thoughts would run back to the simple life of Jesus, with his quiet of soul and freedom from such demonstrations.

With best wishes for a prosperous new year to all the brethren, I am fraternally yours,

R. M. Andrews.

We had a unique and interesting Sunday-school entertainment, Friday night, the 23rd. Also splendid Sunday services in Sunday-school and church, Christmas day. Home coming and Christmas giving have been the order of the day.

We were saddened by the untimely death of our friend and brother, Rev. W. L. Harris, which occurred on the 21st. Revs. Andrews and Stubbins officiated at the funeral. We sang feelingly "Servant of God, well done."

From Yarbrough's to Granville.

Getting back to Cross Anchor immediately after Conference, packing up to move was in order. It seemed like there was more to do than formerly for some reason I can't explain why, for we have no more than formerly—except children. But we were ready to get away by Wednesday after the first Sunday in December which caused me to miss my first appointment on this charge, but I felt like I would enjoy being with the Harmony and Yarbrough's Chapel people again. So as busy as I was through the kindness of Bro. A. M. Watson who took me to Harmony, I preached there the fourth Sunday in November. It was hard to say good-bye to those faithful people, for they have certainly upheld the hands of their pastor for the past four years and it is gratifying to see what has been done there, notwithstanding we had many trials through the influence of those who claimed to be so much better than the people who are the salt of the community. They resorted to all kind of means to accomplish their purpose, but the church still stands while that which made so much noise proved to be only a noise and died away almost as quickly as it sprang into life.

I thank God for the good people of Harmony and for what they are accomplishing. Press on, brethren, there are discouragements, it is true, but you are living for a principle that is permeating the Christian world to day and Jesus has spoken to you—"Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

The first Sunday was spent with the Yarbrough's Chapel people. It was hard to part with these good people also. It would not have been so hard to say good-bye here if no one had said anything but while trying to get my mind on the subject chosen for that morning after winding up for the last time the Sunday-school lesson with "my" men's Bible Class. Bro. Tinsley began to tell the S. S. how much he hated to see us leave and how much the S. S. had been helped. It was not until then had we been enabled to see so much of what had been done and how much it was appreciated. We will not soon forget his words of appreciation. Many acts of kindness have shown the appreciation of these good people. There are people there that do not appreciate a preacher's work, but most of them are out of our church now.

We were kindly remembered in a substantial way after Conference by Sisters Dan Yarbrough and Julia Wilson, also from Bro. and Sister Woodruff, Bro. Farrar and wife.

When we got our goods packed ready to go to the depot, Bros. J. A. Tinsley, A. B. Stone, E. R. Knox, and L. H. Wilson kindly gave us the free use of their teams. Bidding good-bye hurriedly to many as we passed on to Enoree, we packed our goods in a car left for us and giving Clelia Burd, my young horse, a full supply of hay and oats we sealed the car door and Sam and I hurriedly got aboard the train for Henderson, leaving Mrs. Bethea and the other children to have parsonage straightened up and to come on as soon as notified that our goods had arrived. Leaving Enoree thence to Laurens, taking the coast line to Clinton where we boarded a Seaboard train at 5:35 p. m.

We had an uneventful ride till 3:06 a. m. without change when we reached Henderson. In a few minutes we were pulling the door bell at the residence of Bro. C. W. Finch who was our delegate to our last Conference and we had a time getting him awake, as he had just gotten in a few minutes before from Richmond.

In a few minutes Sam and I were lost in slumber, for after such a rush and being up most of the night it required no rocking to get to sleep.

But I must close for this week.

On Christmas day we had a very interesting Christmas service. The church was decorated. Mrs. J. C. Beam and Ogburn Lenheart had trained the children for occasion. An offering was made for the Denton Orphanage and Foreign Missions.

Dear Herald: Our pastor, Bro. Cecil, filled his regular appointment Sunday, Dec. 25. He gave us a good sermon, as usual. We are always glad to see him and anxious for our preaching day to arrive. Bro. Cecil always meets us with a smiling face and a kind word; we like so much to have him visit our homes, he always brings sunshine and gladness and we are all made better by his coming. We have our new pews and stoves arranged, and steps are being taken for further improvements on the church. Our Sunday-school hasn't gone into winter quarters yet, but we do think more interest could be manifested. If the parents and older people of the community could only be made to see the necessity, of not only attending Sunday-school themselves, but of sending their children, what a good school we could have and what a great amount of work could be accomplished for the Master. The prize, which was a beautiful teacher's Bible, offered in the primary class was won this year by Mr. Willie Anderson. We wish more of the boys and girls had been as faithful the past year as he, and we trust he will continue to be as faithful in the coming years.

We were glad to have worship with us Sunday Mr. D. M. Neace and family of High Point. They have moved near the church and we will be very glad to have them attend church and Sunday-school with us. We want the church, not only this one, but every Methodist Protestant church throughout this broad land to make great progress this year. We want them all to make up and do for the Master every thing that will tend to spread his gospel. We ask the prayers of every Christian that our little church may grow and accomplish much and lasting good; and that we as workers may never one time become disheartened or discouraged in working for the cause of Christ.

On the first Sunday in December, I filled my first appointment at Zion and Piny Grove churches. On account of the inclemency of the weather and it not being certain that I would be there, the congregations were small. These churches are located in a prosperous section of country and I believe there are indications of development. On the second Sunday I visited Hope; here we were met by a good congregation. This church is situated so near the new village Bonlee on the Southern Railroad and is the terminus of the new railroad, the Bonlee and Western.

On the evening of the same day I preached at Siler City; the congregation was large and very attentive. On the third Sunday I was met at Hickory Grove by a good and encouraging congregation. On the fourth Sunday I was again at Siler City; the congregation was again large, and the pastor felt much encouraged. I suppose some one else will report the nice Christmas entertainment here on Saturday eve. However, the recitations by the children, and the tree were much enjoyed by all. On the afternoon of the fourth Sunday I was at Fairfield and preached to a good congregation. The pastor felt encouraged with each church and with the co-operation of the people believes that each church may be considerably developed and much good accomplished. Let the watch word of each one be, "Go forward."

Fraternally,

High Point.

The church work in High Point seems to be starting off very well in the new Conference year. Our Sunday-school has already out grown the splendid new quarters which were opened up just two years ago. The Philathea class had very kindly gone into the church auditorium to make room for a Junior Philathea Class that has recently been organized. The number of classes in the Sunday-school had recently been increased by two, a Junior Philathea Class and a Junior Baraca Class thus bringing two new teachers into active work, and at the same time leaving all the other classes large enough for good work, and also giving them the better opportunity to bring in new members. This they do not fail to do. Our school has at no time had phenomenal growth, but its growth for the last two years has been a steady one, as shown by the secretary's books. The average attendance for 1908 was 131, for 1909 it was 173, and for 1910 it was 185.

The secretary's book also shows a steady though small increase in the contributions for the three years.

Our church now has before it one of the most glorious opportunities of work for the Master through the young people that are gathering under its influence. We are praying most earnestly every day that the dear Father will lead us to provide wisely the needed room for work. O, for a vision of greater things for our Lord on the part of every individual member of the Methodist Protestant church in High Point.

We hope the Editor and all the readers had a pleasant Christmas. Owing to the continued illness of our pastor's little boy, Bro. Mansfield Owen filled his appointment the 4th Sunday in December with a very interesting Christmas sermon. On Monday evening at 3 o'clock we had a Christmas tree for the S. S. All seemed to enjoy it very much. We had two short but very good and encouraging talks by Bros. Phillips and Owen. We wish for Bro. Powell's little son a speedy recovery.

Notwithstanding the bad day that new year was, our Sunday-school under the new organization opened the new year with a good attendance of young men and some women. Our school has run down some in numbers and the Superintendent with his teachers are preparing to make the most desperate effort to accomplish the most of any year of their lives.

Our church has suffered some by the enforced absence of the pastor since the early fall. But we will say nothing to add to his burden, nor lay in any word of complaint, but will extend to him our purest sympathy.

We extend to the Editor a hearty commendation in his defence of Methodist Protestantism.

I live in Nazareth, and even the Editor has a kind of contempt for anything coming out of Nazareth, but I have an opinion and that opinion is that Methodist Protestantism is a principle too well established to be rooted up and swallowed by something smaller. Now if I did not live at Nazareth and my thoughts were worth anyting, I would suggest that the churches interested come together in convention and for the present and for the purpose of the convention ignore the old organizations: then appoint a committee of liberal minded men to draft a constitution and laws for a new church. But I did not start out to advise and so with hope that all churches will be filled with liberality while I yet live I close.

Asheville.

Our Christmas affairs were all quite successful. The Burnsville Hill S. S. gave an entertainment and Christmas tree on the night of the 23rd. It was a night of slush. Yet the school building was packed. All had a good time. This school was commenced the first Sunday in last February. It has been a complete success. It has survived two other schools in the neighborhood. They are very eager for a chapel that they may have a Sunday school home all to themselves. They have not missed more than three weekly teachers' meetings in ten months. Brother W. A. Swain is their Supt.

The entertainment at Woolsey Hall was given on the night of 28th. The hall was packed with interested friends. The program was well planned and successfully carried out. Miss Birdie Walser and Mrs. Welbourn had trained the children faithfully.

The hall has recently been donated to the Mission Hospital. The hospital management has accorded us the use of it until they can decide what to do with it. A good platform was built for the entertainment and electrical lights were installed. It is now equipped for frequent evening gatherings. Our friends in the neighborhood are planning a box supper to raise funds for paying for the organ. They are a working set. Apples and oranges were distributed to all present. This school began the last Sunday in January of last year. Our young friend Frank Edwards is the efficient Supt. He and his new bride have started in for the work again this year.

The entertainment by the main school was given on the night of the 30th. It was pronounced the best we have ever given. The children were trained by Miss Jessie Rowe Williams. There were two programs—one on the evening of the 25th. Both were largely attended.

"Twelve-baskets-full" of oranges and big apples were distributed to all present. All these entertainments were gotten up against many odds of unusually bad weather and much sickness.

The Rice Male Chorus of fourteen gave us a new year song service on Sunday night that was highly enjoyed. Secretary Hunter of the Y. M. C. A. gave us a fine talk.

We are entering the new year with great hope and faith. And with great good will for all.

Vance Circuit.

Ous 1st quarterly conference was held at Harris Chapel Saturday before the second Sunday in December; nothing out of the regular routine of business except Bros. Ellis and Satterwhite were present as representatives from Gilburg church to ask for pastoral supply from Vance circuit. This request was granted and they were given the 4th Sunday in each month for services.

The writer expects to buy a horse as soon as he finds one suitable and hopes by doing so he can handle the work to a better advantage. Our last year's stay on Vance was very pleasant to us and the people showed their appreciation in many ways.

Before conference the good people of Flat Rock gave me a nice suit of clothes and you know such a present always comes to a minister at exactly the right time. Since Conference we have received some gifts as follows: Mr. B. W. Brown, some beefsteak; Mr. A. E. White, a cord of wood, Mr. S. A. Greenway, a nice Christmas present; Mrs. J. P. Satterwhite, butter and eggs, Mrs. Jno. Reavis, sausage and backbone: Mrs. T. Hestes, sausage.

We have been kept away from New Hope at both appointments this year by bad weather which was much disappointment to us, as we enjoy preaching to those faithful and appreciative people.

Harris Chapel was about forty dollars behind on pastor's salary at Conference, but has now paid about half of the amount and expect to pay the remainder in a few days.

We have lately united in marriage at the parsonage Mr. Roberson and Miss Bowling of Gilburg and Mr. John D. Dawling of Va. and Miss Theodora Dawling of Manson, N. C. The later, (Miss Dawling) now Mrs. Dawling, is one of our most loyal members at New Hope

We predict for both couples a successful future.

Spring Church.

Our new pastor, Rev. W. F. Ashburn, filled his first appointment here last fourth Sunday, to a very large and attentive congregation. He delivered an excellent sermon, which was enjoyed by all. It was a great pleasure to us for him to be with us again as our pastor. We all feel sure that he will do good work for us this year. Our new church is completed, all except painting, which we hope to do in the near future. Our Sunday-school is moving on nicely, we are trying to keep it ever-green and not let it go into winter quarters.

We have re-organized our school, new officers and teachers were elected, with J. J. Massey superintendent and Miss Mary L. Massey secretary and treasurer.

We are hoping to have a good attendance throughout this year, and trust that they will be more prompt than ever before. We had our Christmas entertainment on Monday night, which was right good. "After Old Santa" delivered his presents a collection was taken for Foreign Missions which amounted to $6.00.

First quarterly conference will convene here next fourth Saturday, all official members are requested to be present. Since my last report, Mr. Henry Vassar, one of our oldest members of Spring church, has passed away. He was in his seventy-sixth year. He had been in poor health for nearly six months, but on December 20th, the Lord gently released him from his suffering. He leaves an aged wife and one daughter to mourn their loss, but we trust their loss may be his eternal gain.

India, my sister, continues very ill, I will again ask the Herald readers to pray for her recovery.

Wishing the Herald readers a happy and prosperous new year.

Yours for Christ.

We were glad to have Messrs. Hunter and Stone who have been away in school spend the holidays with us.

THE POSTAL CARD.

W. F. Kennett, Editor.

Christmas has come and gone and we are now in the new year, 1911. May it be a happy year to all our readers.

We greatly missed the M. P. Herald and the Henderson "Gold Leaf" from our exchanges last week.

The Greensboro Patriot came as usual. All services were rained out last Sunday Jan. 1st. This week we thank Mrs. E. P. Robinson, Mrs. T. A. Wilson, Mrs. N. W. Gordon, Mrs. B. W. Johnson, Mrs. J. R. Dwiggins and Mrs. Geo. Brown for remembering us with hog killing products —sausage, backbone, spare ribs etc. We thank Mrs. J. B. Ogburn and Mrs. H. G. Moore for Christmas cakes and Mrs. Ogburn and Mrs. Johnson for butter.

Dr. Tagg's editorial in the Methodist Protestant of Dec. 14th on "That China Mission" makes interesting reading. We would copy it into the Postal Card had we the room. His account of "That Milford Revival" is also interesting to an unusual degree.

Yarboro and Anderson Circuits.

I am at work on my new charge. It was hard to say good-bye to our dear kind friends at Democrat.

The four years spent West of the Ridge were pleasant. Though many trials and hardships fell on us, yet we were with good people. No people will ever be kinder to us than they. The good people on Ivy circuit can not be surpassed for hospitality.

The high esteem in which they hold their pastor makes the work pleasant. They don't handle a preacher's name as some people handle a pug dog. And when he goes to do something they don't rise up to defeat it. Sister McLean's thoughtfulness of the preacher's family added largely to their comfort.

Miss Cora Carter was the Martha of that community to do what she could. The Maneys, Carters, Andersons, Dillinghams, Clouses, Wilsons, Rays, Holcombs and many others did much to make our work a success. May God bless the dear people and pastor.

I was assigned to Anderson circuit Since Conference I have also excepted Yarboro by request of people, and moved into parsonage at Cross Anchor.

This is a kind people.

The ladies made us understand when we came here that they knew how to make a preacher feel good. When we arrived Wednesday, the 28th, they had charge of the parsonage, dinner ready, good fire and a hearty welcome. No burden was attached to it for preacher's wife, a colored woman was with them for the business of clearing away the dishes.

I don't know all the names. One thing I know---where things were scarce to eat there were plenty. Yarbors, Knox and Stones are some of the names we remember.

Liberty Hill and Fair View churches have received us warmly.

Four converts at Liberty Hill Christmas day.

While we can begin to see we have a good people to serve, at the same time the responsibility is great. We can't meet the demand in every respect, but will do our best.

Bro. W. R. Lowdermilk and family have visited friends and relatives in this country which was appreciated by his friends.

Liberty Circuit.

December 1st, 1910, found me located in the thriving little town of Liberty, N. C., and ready for service, I filled the first appointment the first Sunday in December, at Mt. Pleasant, and Pleasant Union and all since except one in which I was rained in. I have been kindly received by the good people on this charge, and hope to do a good year's work for the Master.

There was a Christmas entertainment held in our church at Liberty on Monday night, Dec, 26th, which was a success. There were recitations and songs, and a fish pond. The children were delighted to see Santa Claus fish out the presents for them. Liberty Grove Sunday-school treated the children also, Sunday afternoon, when there were songs and talks by pastor and a Mr. Palmer.

We held the first quarterly Conference at Mt. Pleasant on Saturday before the 3rd Sunday in December, with all the churches represented. There was a seeming lack of a spirit of aggressiveness, and progressiveness that chilled the enthusiasm of the pastor, but he has since learned that it was only "seeming" and that the entire circuit is ready and willing for aggressive work.

I wish to acknowledge the following donations: Mrs. J. Logan Hardin, sausage, pudding and chine; Miss Millie Bowman, eggs, and sausage, for which we thank them.

Family reunion. On Thursday, December 29th, was held the annual reunion of the Hardin family at the home, in Liberty, of J. Logan Hardin. Owing to illness in the families of Bros. C. H. and W. D. Hardin of Julian and Pleasant Garden respectively, all of their families were not present, but were represented in part. A number of friends in Liberty were also present. A sumptuous dinner was served by Mrs. J. Logan Hardin in her affable manner, making it pleasant indeed for her guests. After some time spent in pleasant conversation all departed to their homes, feeling it would always be a pleasure to remember this occasion.

A Delayed Report from Spring Church and Greenville Circuits.

I was too busy during the closing days of the Conference year 1910 to write a report as I wished to do, covering the three years of my pastorate on Spring church and Greensville circuits, and the first days of my pastorate on Liberty circuit find me equally busy; but at this late date I will write something.

I do this in justice to those noble people who helped their pastor to bring order out of chaos, and not in self-laudation.

When I reached Virginia three years ago and took an inventory of the situation I found, but one Sunday-school on Greensville circuit, and it ran only a part of the year with twelve or fifteen scholars, one church, Wesley's Chapel, had been sold to satisfy a judgment against it for three hundred dollars; two other churches had small debts on them, of long standing, and the energies of the membership paralyzed. The out-look was dark and gloomy.

On Spring church circuit, I found at Spring church a good Sunday-school and prayer-meeting, but they needed a better church. One church, Lebanon, had been burned and the membership were worshiping in a school-house and running a Sunday-school in the same. One other church had practically no membership. We went to work to restore confidence and after a while succeeded, so that now at the close of a three year's pastorate I can report that there are good Sunday-schools in four of the five churches on Greensville circuit, Wesleys Chapel redeemed and the debts lifted from the other two, and new pews in Hobbs Chapel and the house painted. Philadelphia repainted and new organs in four of the churches, and a spirit of hopefulness that promises much for the future.

At Spring church, we sold the Gumbury church and rebuilt at Lebanon a splendid little church that when finished will be a neat place to worship in. A splendid parsonage was built at Pleasant Hill costing about twelve hundred dollars, and this year the crowning achievement was the building of a splendid new church at Spring church, 32x54, tower on corner and a class room in the rear, gothic windows and doors. There are two large twin memorial windows which cost ninety-three dollars each, built by the H. T. Greenhardt Art Glass Co., Baltimore. One of these was put in by the children of the late Cyprian Daniel and wife who was long one of the church's leading members, and the other by the children of Geo. F. Robinson who still lives, and is one of the pillars of the church. There are also two smaller memorial windows, made by the same company. (I am glad to mention this company, for this work is of the highest order, and at reasonable prices.) One for Bro. J. W. Crew, who is living and an active member, and J. C. Powell deceased, who died in young manhood beloved by all who knew him for his noble parts. These two windows were paid for by a Mr. Andrew Stephenson who was, and is, a close friend of the parties named, but not a member of any church. This church was not quite completed when I came away, but I feel sure it is by this time. When it is painted it will have cost about seventeen hundred dollars, and will be the best country church in Greensville County, Va.

There were also, during the three years, about two hundred conversions and accessions. The pastor's salary was raised the second year from six to seven hundred dollars, and always paid in full, and over.

There are some noble souls on these two charges, as are to be found anywhere, and they shall always have a warm place in my heart. God bless you, dear people, stand by your present pastor, and let the good work go on.

Dear Bro. Swain:

The first quarterly meeting was held at Fairfield church on Saturday, Dec. 31st, 1910. The attendance was good; all the churches being represented.

The business was transacted in the spirit of brotherly love. The reports were very good. Bro. Gray was elected secretary for another year. Bro. Leonard of Hickory Grove church was elected circuit Sunday-school Supt. to look after and work up the Sunday-school interests.

Bro. Davis of Fairfield church was elected circuit steward to look after the financial interests. So we are looking forward to a profitable year.

May God help each one of us to do our best for Him this year.

Pray for us.

The first quarterly conference was held last Saturday at Tabernacle church. The president preached at 11 a. m. to an attentive but small congregation, after which we had a good dinner, and a short intermission.

The president opened conference by reading and prayer, after which the business was transacted. All the churches were represented as follows: Tabernacle, 8 officials present out of 15; Julian, 2 official present out of 7; Moriah, 3 officials present out of 15. Shady Grove, 1 official present out of 6. Total number of officials present, 14; total number on circuit, 44, making number of the absentees 30. My reason for making this report is that those who were absent may read and see how much we needed them in our Conference. Hope they will do better in the future. Our work is starting off very well and I am expecting the membership to take hold with us, and I am certain we can do a better year's work than last year. Some of the churches need some work done on them. The Trustees I hope will see to it that this is done in the early part of the year, also that the Stewards, both for general interests and pastor's salary, begin their work at once and try to raise as much as they can before the busy part of the year comes, and this will help the various boards as well as the pastor.

Hope to receive renewals and new subscriptions as I go round for our church papers.

Thomasville.

Last Sunday "New Year's Day," was so bad with rain and cold weather not many of us got out to church to hear our new year's sermon by Bro. Suits, which some of us regretted having to miss, for we are sure he would have told us something which might have done us good all through the year and strengthened us to put our good resolutions (for no doubt many have been made) into practice.

Officers were to have been elected for the Sunday-school, but was postponed till next Sunday.

Our Christmas tree was beautiful, and with a crowded house everything passed off quietly as could be expected.

The Ladies Aid Society met at church last Thursday, and elected officers for the new year with just a few members present; was rather discouraging to begin with; however, the ones present enjoyed the evening and we are hoping by next month the sick ones will be well and the busy house wives will lay aside their work for one short evening and meet us at Mrs. Ritchie's home. By doing that we might help some one in several homes. The ladies have undertaken to paper two rooms and the hall in the parsonage; got one room finished before Christmas, the other we hope to finish this week and next, and trust we can aid more in the church work this year than in the past years, and only by efforts united we can succeed.

A nice little smoke house has been built on the parsonage lot, which indicates "Hog-killing time" at our Pastor's.

Best wishes for a Happy New Year to all the Herald readers and its Editor.

Thomasville, N. C., Jan. 2, 1911.

We are proud to have Bro. Suits with us again next year. He has been with us since the birth of our church and knows and understands our people much better than a new man would, and our church has certainly prospered under his wise and efficient management.

Only four years ago there were only nine members and now we have a membership of near one hundred and fifty, which is a growth of over thirty consistent members per year, not counting the number which the class leader has dropped from his roll.

We have a small but neat church situated in as pretty a grove as Thomasville affords, and on an adjoining lot is our parsonage, a six room cottage very nearly finished, or all finished except papering.

We are in debt some on our buildings, but the Lord is with us in our undertakings and each year finds us climbing the ladder of fortune; that is to say, we get nearer out every year, and we are going to strive to do more this year than ever before.

Our Christmas tree was indeed a success.

Following the program were short addresses by the Pastor and superintendent, after which the presents were delivered in a stylish manner by four little girls.

The tree was nicely decorated and all present termed it a success in every respect.

Mr. James Perry, Jr., and Miss Rachael Miller of this place were happily married at the parsonage on Saturday evening, Dec. 14th, Rev. Suits officiating. The groom is the well known son of Mr. J. T. Perry of this place, and the bride is the daughter of Mr. Geo. Miller of High Point. The writer extends to them a long, happy, prosperous life.

Mr. D. R. Loftin and wife have just returned from a few days' visit to relatives and friends in High Point.

As this is the 1st day of Jan., 1911, we should all make a resolution to do more and greater things than we ever have done, not saying that the first of the year is the only time to make a pledge, but it is as good time as one could have and my prayer is, that we may live on a higher plane of Christian life than we have ever lived before, and that in the end we may reap life everlasting.

I certainly enjoy reading the columns of your valued paper, and like the change you made some time ago.

I think that Methodist Protestant Herald sounds so much nore fitting, than Church Record.

The writer wishes you and your paper much success during the present year, and as time flits by, may you have a wider and wider circulation.

Sincerely Yours,

R. C.

Two young men, Roy and Vernon Forrest, were received into the church the first Sunday of the new year.

The Misses Pratt of Raleigh, Miss Lillie Bivins of Duke, and Prof. O. L. Baity of Salisbury visited home folks during holidays and attended services Christmas night.

W. A. Thompson and Miss Lizzie Terrell were married on Christmas at the bride's home near Mebane.

At the first quarterly conference Julian J. Brown was elected secretary.

Concord.

Bro. Lindley filled his regular appointment at Fairview last Sunday morning at 11 o'clock, but came back and gave us a good sermon Sunday night and had a very good congregation for the weather, as it was stormy. Our S. S. was not very large either. We have 201 scholars on roll, but only 79 were present.

Our first quarterly conference will be held at Concord church on next Saturday night.

Sister D. R. Brown spent Christmas with her four children at the orphanage at Denton. We miss the children in S. S. very much, for they were regular attendants.

Our new pastor and his wife, Rev. and Mrs. W. D. Fogleman, have moved in among us, and we are so glad to have them in our town.

Bro. Fogleman filled the regular appointments here on the second Sunday and our people are very favorably impressed with his sermons. He has organized a Tuesday night prayer-meeting and the first one was well attended. We hope to be able to keep up interest in these prayer services, for our church needs them.

Our Sunday-school has decided to give the children a Christmas treat on Monday night, the twenty-sixth. Instead of a tree there is to be a "Fish Pond," with a Santa Claus to fish out the presents. There is also to be a short program of songs and recitations.

We are hoping to have a very prosperous year and are working to that end.

Yours in the work.

A Severe Pounding.

After returning from the quarterly conference Saturday, December 31, 1910, and after the usual chores were done, wife and myself and little May had settled down to reading when there came a knock at the door. Wife rose to open the door, when behold! it came open, and the first thing to be seen was the end of a sack of flour. The company began to march in single file; on they went to the dining room table, bearing sacks of flour, boxes, packages and soon, which they deposited on the table until it seemed as if it were going to break. The rest was placed under and around the table. I am sure had they not had mercy the table would have gone down with a great crash. The company then marched into the sitting room where they were addressed by Bro. Gray. Then your humble servant was asked to speak and after a few remarks the company rose and sang: All hail the power of Jesus name, after which the pastor was called to lead the house in prayer. After the company had retreated, and the smoke of battle had cleared away, wife and I began to look over the results and found flour, sugar, coffee, chickens, meat, sausage, soda, butter, pickles, potatoes, preserves, canned peaches, apples, beans, molasses, pears, oranges, Quaker Oats, and candy and raisens for the baby. "Patsy" the faithful horse, was not forgotten, for there was corn for her.

There were 17 in the company representing Fairfield, Spring Hill, Mitchel's Grove, Red Hill and Shady Grove and possibly others. There were names on part of the packages and part there were not. Time and space will not permit me giving the names. May God bless these good people in these acts of kindness toward us. And may He too help us in serving them.

Again praying God's richest blessings upon each individual I am yours in His name.

A Happy Wedding.

On Wednesday evening December 21, 1910, at the M. P. parsonage in Concord, N. C., Miss Lula Kiser became the bride of Mr. Walter Blackwelder. These are two of our best young people of Fair View church; and we predict for them a happy and successful voyage through life. A dozen or more of their friends attended their marriage; after which they left for the home of the groom which is near Concord, N. C.

We wish them much happiness.

Pounded.

The members and friends of the M. P. church in Concord, came to the parsonage on December 21; and left the table in the dining room laden with many good things to eat. They left the pastor with a thankful heart for their kindness; and with one filled with gratitude to God who gave them those things, and put the idea in their minds. May God make their pastor a blessing to them, and continue to fill them with all the fulness of God!

Mrs. Brown, Concord, 6 jars fruit, 3 cakes. Haw River, S. S., 1 quilt. Mrs. Clouse, Asheville, 1 pr. pillows. Mr. Hues, Denton, 1 cord wood. Mr. J. R. Reace, Denton, 14 loads wood. Mr. Mitchell, Piney Grove church, butter and meat. Winston, Greensboro, (Grace church), Flat Rock, Flat Rock circuit, and Asheboro church sent Christmas boxes well filled with toys, candies, nuts and fruits as well as useful things.

Asheboro Aux. sent $4.00, Mr. L. L. Wrenn, Siler City, $5.00, Mrs. Capt. Jones, Denton, 50 cents, that the little ones might be made glad on Christmas morning.

This has truly been a joyous season to us, and if it is more blessed to give than to receive, how very happy some good people must be.

I want to thank all, in behalf of the little ones, for so many pleasures.

Obituary.

The subject of this brief and imperfect sketch, Mrs. Mary Crowley Whitaker, was born in Augusta, Ga., Feb. 8, 1834. She attended Sunday-school in the first Baptist church there throughout her young life, becoming a member of this church when about fourteen years of age. When she was sixteen years of age the family moved to Maritta, Ga. July 14, 1853, she was married to Mr. T. L. Whitaker, in Whitaker's Chapel, Halifax Co., N. C. To this union four sons and four daughters were born, all but two daughters of whom, with twenty grandchildren, survive her departure. Her husband also is left to mourn the loss of a true wife.

Mrs. Whitaker was true to all her convictions, clinging tenaciously but not unreasonably to opinions she believed founded on God's word, and defending courageously but in the sweetest spirit her opinions, her friends, her church and all she held dear. After settling in North Carolina she held her church letter until the formation of a Baptist church in Enfield whereupon she united with that church; and she remained a faithful member, though depruid through severe afflictions of regular attendance and active service, until her death.

Though suffering the past summer and fall the partial disuse of her normal powers she yet continued those tender, patient loving ministries for which she was noted, until while waiting on some sick loved ones, Oct. 23, she received a fall rendering her entirely helpless and a great sufferer until relieved by death Dec. 24. Her sufferings were so great she longed to depart and prayed and asked others to pray that she might die. How sweet heaven must be, in all its quiet and peace and restfulness to her weary soul, now that life's fitful fever is over! Very few have lived a life so devoted to the service of others. She really seemed to live in and for her friends She will be greatly missed here; but many hope to greet her in a fairer world "some sweet day." After a funeral service conducted by her pastor, Rev. W. L. Britt, assisted by Rev. C. L. Whitaker, her body was laid to rest beside her eldest daughter in the cemetery at Whitaker's Chapel, Dec. 26, 1910, there to await the resurrection to immortality and eternal life.

T. J. Ogburn.

Sister K. W. Coghill died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Newell, at Falls Church, Va., on Dec. 26 and was buried from the Methodist Protestant Church of which she was a faithful member on Tuesday at 10:30. The services were conducted by the writer.

Sister Coghill was sixty-five years of age and had been a great sufferer for the past several months, sustaining several strokes of paralysis. A few weeks ago she was taken from Rocky Mount to Washington City with the hope that the care of the skilled physicians may restore her, and she did appear to gain some benefit from it at the first. But death came as a release to her suffering body and she went home to Jesus shortly after midnight Sunday night.

She leaves one daughter, Mrs. Carrie Harris, in Henderson, one in Falls Church, one in Rocky Mount, one in Charlotte and three sons with her husband, Brother K. W. Coghill.

The separation to her husband, while expecting it for months, has been most keenly felt. Their lives clung together like the ivy and the wall, their wills seemed to fuse like two rivers that formed a larger one, he leaned upon her and was comforted with even the touch of her hand. We pray that God may give him grace to bear this heavy loss and to make his bed in his sickness one of peace.

R. M. Andrews.

Died October 27, 1910, Catherine Bess. She was the widow of Lawson Bess. She was one of the oldest members at Bess Chapel. She died in her 88th year. She was a very excellent woman, had the esteem of all who knew her. She was faithful to the church. Her house was the preacher's home.

Magazine Agency.

Miss Victoria Dean, of Kernersville, R. F. D. 4, has a magazine and paper agency, permanent business. Any persons desiring a magazine or paper will do well to see her, as she will give a discount of 10 per cent from subscription prices of papers, to be applied to our Orphanage, or to anything you wish it applied. Miss Dean is worthy of our patronage.

Our pastor, Bro. D. R. Williams, arrived on our work Dec. 8, but not being acquainted with the mountains felt quite a bit like he was being hurried ankle deep head downward.

But being a man who can readily adapt himself to the situation soon became accustomed to looking upward, from whence all blessings flow.

And even among the hills he found the atmosphere pure and bracing, and was enjoying it all O. K. until he started across the mountain for Pensacola, Dec. 24.

He rode higher and higher up the mountain until the fog that hung in silvery mists o'er the woodland had all cleared away, so he could see peak after peak all along our rugged heights standing up heavenward.

While in the distance he could see Mt. Mitchell standing up in grandeur, until he could say as King David.

"Day unto day uttereth speech."

And after he had over topped the mountain going down the other side, finding quite a bit of ice in the road and his horse being slick shod began slipping, so he dismounted almost as quickly as if he had been on a runaway train. But was perplexed on account of not hearing the whistle for down brakes.

He arrived in good time, preached an excellent sermon both on Saturday and Sunday.

Our people are much pleased with him as a pastor, and we think he would like it fine were it not for the red clay that sticketh closer than a brother.

Our first quarterly conference was held at Mountain Valley, all churches were represented save one that was hindered on account of a burial.

The business was transacted harmoniously. Also it was agreed that a phone be put in the parsonage and a pipe line so as to have water convenient.

We are hoping for a prosperous year.

Sincerely,

R. R. Ray.

How we miss the Herald when it stops for a week!

Christmas passed off very quietly with us. Our exercise on Monday night, the 26th, was said to be one of the best we have ever had. The absence of many faces, which were there at last Christmastide, gave a tinge of sadness to the occasion. Several have been called away by death, and others are gone for various other reasons. A nice treat, a chimney and "Santa Claus," delighted young and old alike.

Nearly 500 packages were distributed to members of the Sunday-school.

There were 190 present in S. S. on Christmas day and the collection was $22.71. Last Sunday the weather was very unfavorable and the attendance was only 73, with a collection of $1.92. This seems a rather bad start for the new year, but we are sure that we will do better.

The question of adopting the coupon system in the school was taken up, but no definite action was taken. The matter will be brought before the school again next Sunday for final action.

Bro. Williams had several funerals last week, two of which were in the church. He conducted the funeral of Mrs. Mary C. Kenny on Thursday. Mrs. Kenney was about 42 years of age and had been a member of the M. P. church for about 30 years. She was a good woman.

On Saturday, the funeral of Mr. W. C. Lineberry was conducted in the church. He was not a member of any church. His was the thirty-second funeral conducted by Bro. Williams during 1910. Eight or nine of these were members of the church here.

On December 21, at the home of the bride, Mr. E. O. Way, and Miss Mollie Fuqua were united in marriage, Bro. Williams officiating. Both are members of the church and are faithful attendants.

Mr. M. J. Hinshaw and Miss Daisy Durham were married on Christmas day by Mr. Jones, a Primitive Baptist preacher. Miss Durham is a member of our church. We extend congratulations to both couples.

The first quarterly conference met Monday night, but the writer has not learned what was done.

Miss Flossie Pherson of Watts Hospital, Durham, spent Christmas at home.

Miss Flora McPherson of the Stokes Sanitarium, Salisbury, is at home for a short visit.

Miss Flossie Loy spent Christmas with her uncle, Mr. H. M. Loy, in eastern North Carolina.

There's lot of fun in travelin', an' I've journeyed more er less;
But wherever I hev been to, there's a sort o'homesickness—
Jest a curis kind o' feelin' that I can't no ways express.

There's a deal of pride in goin' with yer clothes all spick an' span;
Makes ye straighten up an' fancy yer a noble lookin' man—
But jest notice how ye hurry on the old suit when ye can.

Sure, folks orto go sight-seein'; of fine places there's no lack;
An' it widens out one's knowedge jest to leave the toil-worn track;
Yes, there's lots o' fun in goin'—but there's more in gettin' back.

When I'm on the train or steamboat, I've no fear my joy to mar;
An' the trolleys be amazin', how they go so fast an' far;
But I've never yit stampeded on an autymobile car.

I hev clim up lofty mountains, an' I've trod the grand seashore;
An' I've seen some mighty cities, an' hev heard their clash an' roar;
Oh, I love the fun of goin'—love the gittin' back once more.

IN A MAN'S WAKE.

A group of people had been waiting half an hour or so in the outer office of a doctor's suite of rooms. They all looked more or less dispirited and bored, when suddenly the door opened, and the doctor came in and passed through the room, with a genial smile and word of greeting. What a change came over every person there! There was an expression of greater courage and cheer and good will on the face of every one in the room after he had disappeared into the inner office.

"Yes, I knew Dr. Lee was in," said a lady who entered a moment later. "He always leaves such a trail of cheerfulness behind him. It makes me think of the wake of a steamship. We can tell when it has just passed up the river, even after it has disappeared around the bend, by the white track it leaves behind it."

The figure remained in my mind, and I knew it to be true of this particular doctor that whether he passes through his office of waiting patients, or gave cheery greetings to people he met on the street, or stopped for a moment's chat in a friend's house, he always left a wake of brightness behind him.

Then the thought came, of course, that we must all of us leave some kind of a wake behind us wherever we go. And how do people feel after we have left them—a little cheerier and happier, or more indifferent or dispirited, or, possibly, distinctly uncomfortable? It is worth while, isn't it, to be sure that that wake, which is bound to follow us any way, should always be a bright and shining one? —Wellspring.

—"Mamma," said little Ethel, with a discouraged look on her face, "I ain't going to school any more." "Why, my dearie, what's the matter?" the mother gently inquired. "'Cause it ain't no use at all. I can never learn to spell. The teacher keeps changing the words on me all the time."—Success Magazine.

—Two year-old Harry had never seen a live lamb, his only knowledge of animal being derived from a toy one on wheels. While visiting grandpa on the farm, he was taken to the sheep-pen to see the lambs. After looking at them for a few minutes, he looked up at grandpa with a puzzled expression, and asked: "Where's the wheels?"

— A boy reading the verse. "And those who live in cottages are happier than those who sit on thrones," startled the crowd by reading thus: "And those who live in cottages are happier than those who sit on thorns."

—Jamie had caught cold in some way, and was very stiff in consequence. "I think, when I had my bath yesterday," he said, "somebody must have put starch in the water."—Harper's Young People.

OUR YEARS

Our years whether few or many have gone into the unchangeable past. What has been said and done is recorded in the annals of time. One by one they have passed from us and we look for close of the old year with as much interest as ever in the past. If, in looking over the calendar of the years, time has run to waste and many regrets look boldly at the searcher of records; let them not discourage you. Although many blots on its pages may be seen, and many deeds written there may blush the face with shame, let them not discourage you from trying again to do right and to make more and better use of the returning years.

The number of our years. There is a limit to them; a few pass over the limit, many, very many never reach it. To feel that they must be numbered either in a long or short term ought to impress every one with the great importance of rightly appreciating and improving them. Many act as though they had to stay here all the time, giving but little, if any, attention to preparing themselves for a future state. Count back and look forward, and see how rapidly they come and go. Many who journeyed with you last year are not with you at the close of this. Their vacant chair will be used by others, while you remember them tenderly and speak of them pleasantly. Gone to that mysterious, silent abode where nothing awakens or disturbs their quiet rest and peaceful slumber.

At the passing of the old year many joyous ones will be seen, and their glad hearts will make others happy. Friends and relatives visiting each other, strangers meeting and new acquaintances formed; visiting the old home after an absence, and making new homes and friends will be the glad privilege of many.

All over the world so many glad hearts to-night beating with young life. Glad, because they expect a good time at Christmas. Giving and receiving presents will be a part of their joy. And it will be a very considerate and a most commendable thing to do. To look over this great, busy world and watch them, by imagination, so actively engaged in this work will be an interesting thing to contemplate. Every one will be at his best, and everything will put on its best looks so as to be attractive. In selecting these presents do not forget the sick ones, the old ones, nor the poor ones. While you are glad, help to make them happy.

We spend our years. How are they spent? Let everyone ask himself this question, and see how he is spending them. Great, inviting fields are before you which need to be cultivated. Will you enter them and work while you have the opportunity? You have made mistakes in the past, correct them by doing better service.

This year has been one of peace, pleasure plenty, and prosperity, with so many bright days, with so many blessings and great privileges, that our glad hearts swell with gratitude to God, and our delighted minds run up the shining way to love and praise Him. And now the work for 1910 will soon be done, and many precious, happy thoughts will foudly linger in the old year.

The pen which writes these lines, and which has written others in these columns during the past year, hesitates to say the parting word, but it must say a long and last good bye to it.

WHICH WAY IS IT IN YOUR SCHOOL?

We have written so much about variety in the opening and closing exercises of the Sunday-school and in the teaching of the Sunday-school lesson and in the conducting of prayer-meetings and other religious services that some of our brethren accuse us of being a crank on that subject. Some have even said that this is a hobby of the editor and his peculiar doctrine.

We subjoin below a quotation from a book by Brown on Boys' Eye Views of Sunday-school, published by the Sunday-school Times Co., which suggests that the editor has at least a little company. In the future we may see fit to quote from several other books along the same line.

"We had election of officers in our school the other Sunday for the new year. Of course they elected the same old Superintendent again, for they all think there isn't any body else will have it. I bet some of them would if they ever got a chance.

"I don't think much of our superintendent. He may be allright for a Sunday-school, but he sure never would do in a football game. Why, he would always do the very same thing with the ball that he did last time, and before he got started the whole of the other team would be on top of him. I tell you, you've got to have some life to play football. You can't have just any old walking corpse on your team.

"I heard our superintendent say once that he was born the same year that gold was discovered in California. If he was it looks like he would have caught the fever and would discover something new for the opening exercises of our school.

"But it's always the same old thing. There isn't a boy in our class but could get up and run the school just the way he does, from "We will open our school this morning by the use of hymn number 69," to "The teachers will now take their classes." We don't have to listen, for we always know just what is coming next.

"He don't even have to tell us how to read the lesson, for he seems to think there isn't but one way it can be read. "Read the lesson," means for him to read one verse and we read the next, and so on; you know how.

"I've been to this school more than a year now, and he's never read it any other way yet. Bunys Brown wanted to bet his watch against my bird-dog pup that he wouldn't read the lesson any other way before summer vacation. But I don't bet, at least not when it's a dead sure thing I lose.

"Our class knows who would make a good superintendent, and he would take it, too, because we asked him one day. But they never give us a chance to say nothing on election Sunday. If it wasn't for our teacher and Brother Parker, a lot of the boys in our class say they'd quit and go to the Baptist.

"I'm mighty glad Conference let him come back this year, for I'd hate to have our class run down like the Bible class was before Brother Parker came. There was only three members and two of them didn't come very regular.

"I expect I would be the one in our class that would have to come every Sunday anyhow, because my father's the class leader and mother teaches the young ladies' class, and I just know they wouldn't never let me stay at home or go to any other school.

"I bet if our class broke up they'd even put me in that old class of girls, and I'd have to sit along-side of Mayme Whitney and hear the silly things talk about parties and dresses and such stuff.

"The Baptist school has got a fine superintendent. He looks like he was just a young fellow, but he's editor of the paper and secretary of the school board and sends the telegrams to the Wichita papers when anybody gets killed or there is a cyclone or anything else interesting.

"Jim Purdy goes to that Sunday-school and tells us all about it at recess. Jim don't care nothing for Sunday-school. He says he just goes for the fun of it, to see what in the thunder they will do next. (That isn't swearing.) He says their superintendent believes in running their Sunday-school the way he runs his paper, and that if he didn't get something new in his paper once in a while nobody would take it.

"Jim says you never know how they are going to start that school. Sometimes they sing three songs right along, or they may read the lesson first. Sometimes they begin with three of four preyers, and once in a while the superintendent will tell a story first of all, that somehow show how things just like the lesson are happening now.

"And after they get started you never know what is coming next. Perhaps it's a song or a prayer, or maybe Bible verses or a review of the last lssson, or just anything. Jim says it's like a three-ring circus, you have to watch every minute or you miss something.

"My father says he thinks they carry it too far making the Sunday-school like a circus, but Jim didn't mean like a real circus, but just that it's interesting.

"Jim Purdy's father is engineer on the Flyer, and sometimes Jim goes with him on the engine. Jim says maybe he will take me with him some day. He says it will nearly take my breath away, but he says nothing slow for him, and I say so too.

"Over at the Baptist they read the lesson a different way nearly every Sunday. Sometimes one person will read it all, and all the rest of them will just sit and listen. Sometimes the whole school reads it together. But Jim says the best is when they divide it up like a dialogue, all the boys read what the men in the lesson say, all the girls read what the women in the lesson say, and the superintndent reads what comes in between. He says you can get some sense out of it then.

"I wish our old superintendent was a Baptist."

C.E. TOPIC FOR JANUARY 8—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Blessed—to Bless—Gen. 12: 1-2; Ps. 107: 1-3.

(An Evangelistic Meeting).

The Scripture.—Have two readers and two commentators, one each for each of the two passages.

Scripture Verses.—Let the leader in connection with the prayer-meeting committee select twenty-five fine passages, using Concordance, showing what the Bible teaches in regard to blessing, on what conditions received and how maintained. Ask that those who get verses memorize them and add a word of comment when they give voluntarily.

Questions for Voluntary Answer:

What is it "to be blessed?"

What is it "to bless?"

How are these interdependent?

Whom should we bless?

How can thoughtfulness of others be cultivated?

How may selfishness be overcome?

What blessing do I most desire? (To several).

What blessing do I wish most for others? (To several).

How are the meek blessed?

The pure in heart?

The merciful?

They that hunger after righteousness?

Those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake?

Why does Christ call his followers the salt of the earth?

Why does He call them light of the world?

C. E. TOPIC FOR JANUARY 15- A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Lessons from Abraham's Life, Gen. 22: 1-18.

The Scripture.—Appoint five readers as follows: one to read the narrative portions, another the words of the Lord, another the words of the angel of the Lord, the fourth Abraham's words, the fifth Isaac's words. Let them practice reading those wonderful passages dramatically and render it with feeling. The effect must be electrifying.

The Leader.—The leader will show that Isaac was as much sacrificed to God as if Abraham had spilled his blood upon the altar. It is the spirit that makes the sacrifice acceptable. Show that we are called upon to offer ourselves a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God. The leader may see fit in brief fashion to indicate how we may make this holy sacrifice also a whole one.

Questions for Voluntary Answer:

Show that Abraham had a right to be called "the man of faith."

What lesson do we get from Abraham leaving his home?

What from his falsehood?

What from his separation from Lot?

What from his covenant with God?

What from his sacrifice of Isaac?

What from his prosperity?

What from his adversity?

Why did Abraham have his name changed?

How do faith and works go together in Abraham's life?

What does James say about faith and works?

What are works in the Bible sense?

Review of Abraham's Life:

Have 14 endeavorers of the verse-reader's class to tell in a minute each what the chapter of Genesis dealing with that matter says about

1. Abraham leaving Haran.
2. His Falsehood.
3. Choice of Hebron.
4. Rescue of Lot.
5. God's promise to him.
6. Abraham's covenant with God.
7. His Hospitality.
8. His prayer for Sodom.
9. Fate of Lot's wife.
10. Hagar and Ishmael.
11. Sacrifice of Isaac.
12. Abraham's Prosperity.
13. His Faith.
14. Abraham as the Friend of God.

For Next Week:

Ask each member to select his favorite prayer verse from the Bible and be able to give it at the beginning of the next meeting.

DUTY.

Some Christians do not like the word "duty," because it has a hard and cold sound. D. L. Moody used to object to the use of this term in reference to religious life. He did not like to hear people talk about the duty of prayer or read in the Bible or worship. He insisted that we should do these and all other things that ought to be done from the noble impulse of love. Love is a warmer, sweeter word than duty.

But duty and love are inseparable. Duty is a debt, and doing duty is paying one's debts. Love is a debt, the one all comprehending duty. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself. On these two hang all the law and the prophets." "Love is the fulfilling of the law."

We are all indebted to God. He is the Author of all our mercies. "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits to ward me?" and Jesus answers, "Render unto God the things that are God's" Render unto Him thanksgiving and praise and honor and worship. All these are due and more. We owe Him ourselves. We are His. We shall never fulfill this precept until we have rendered and surrendered ourselves unto Him.

My gracious Lord, I own Thy right
To every service I can pay.
And call it my supreme delight
To hear Thy dictates and obey.

We are indebted to our country. For protection, for civil liberty, for educational advantages, for opportunity to make an honest living, where none dares to molest or make us afraid, and for all the tremendous sacrifices these inestimable treasures have cost, we are indebted to our country. No one can escape from the loyal and patriotic service of his country in war and peace without running away from plain duty.

We are indebted to the Church. What would become of our homes if the churches were removed? What sort of a country would this be without the churches? Whether church members or not, we are indebted to the Church, and the debt is so great we can never fully pay it. We owe the Church loyal support. By our presence in the house of God in time of worship, by our sympathy and by our money we must support the Church as a matter of duty. Few people consider the support of the Church a duty. When they give money into the treasury of the Church they do not regard it as the payment of a debt, but a sort of gratuity. They feel at perfect liberty to give or not give, to go or not go, to talk the Church up or down, according to their mood, without incurring any guilt. But they are wrong.

We are indebted to our parents. "Honor thy father and thy mother." We are indebted to our neighbors. Whether they have done anything for us or not, we are greatly indebted to them. There is a debt of love as well as justice. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor." "We love him because he first loved us." This is said of God. But it is not said of our neighbor "We love him because he first loved us." We are not commanded to love him and help him because he has done so much for us. He may have done nothing for us. He may have done much against us. He may hate us and persecute us. He may be our enemy. Still we are indebted to him. "Love your enemies," said Jesus. Jesus loved those who did nothing for Him but persecute Him and put Him to death.

There is nothing in life which is not under the law of duty. We cannot set off a small section of life and say, "My duties are all here, and for the rest, there is no obligation." In business life, in social life, in political life, in all of life we must acknowledge our duty, find it and perform it.

We may be perplexed to know what is our duty at times. But God will not leave us to walk in darkness. Not that we may expect a distinct message from heaven for each particular step which will save us the trouble of searching the Scriptures and making use of our own judgment. But one who commits the keeping of his soul and life fully to God, and diligently searches the Scriptures to find the right way, will not be suffered to walk in darkness. "Thou shalt hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it." Let any man who earnestly desires to know his duty and do it, turn aside from men for a season and be alone with God, and his doubts will be scattered and the way made plain before his face.

Walk in the light and thou shalt own
Thy darkness passed away,
Because that light hath on Thee shone
In which is perfect day.

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary. (G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass.) surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers, under the supervision of Dr. W. T Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reenforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonyms, pronunciation, have received unsparing scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fullness and clearness. In size of vocabulary, in richness of general information, and in convenience of consultation, the book sets a new mark in lexicography.

THE HENDERSON CORRESPONDENT.

Dear Bro. J. F. McCulloch:

Suffer me through the Methodist Protestant Herald to congratulate you on your reply to Bro. T. T. Hicks, in the last issue of said paper, (Dec. 22, 1910). And while you have answered Bro. Hicks, more intelligently than I can possibly do, yet I would like to ask Bro. Hicks a few questions:

1st. Did John Wesley ever suffer himself to be called a Bishop? Wesley said, "Men may call me a mad man, knave or a fool, but a bishop never!"

2. Did Wesley ever favor calling any other man bishop, clothing him with the same power and authority that bishops have now in the M. E. churches? If s., tell us where the proof may be found.

Is it reasonable to suppose that Wesley, would favor conferring on others that which was destable to him?

3rd. Will it make any man better or wiser to call him bishop? If so, please tell us how it can affect a man in either way. If the mere calling preachers bishops will make them better and wiser, then it would be wise to call all ministers bishops; but if the term bishop, is a mere human ornament, and in violation of God's word, I say away with it. True Methodist Protestants do not so much object to the name bishop as they do to the authority which bishops are clothed with in the M. E. churches. If Bro. Hicks, will turn to 1. Peter 5, and read 1, 2, and 3 verses, he will see the duties of (ministers,) Elders, not bishops, and that they are not to be "Lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock."

And just here, I challenge Bro. Hicks, or any other brother to show that the bishops in the M. E. churches do not "Lord it over" God's heritage; which is in plain violation of God's word. Ministers in the M. E. church, South, especially, must in order to be ordained, take upon their knees, their right hand on the Holy Bible, a solemn obligation, (or oath,) that they will obey their superiors in office, (not holiness or wisdom).

Note, superiors in office. Then the bishop, that presides over the annual or general Conference, is the "superior in office," and all others are under him and have sworn to obey him. And when he (the bishop) says to this man go, and he goeth; and to that man come and he cometh, is not that "lording it over God's heritage?" If this is not, pray tell me, my dear Bro. Hicks, what a bishop would have to do to "lord it over God's heritage?"

Add to these things the fact that the bishop presiding over the general Conference has the veto power over that body; and the only alternative the General Conference has is to appeal to the College of Bishops, and their decision is final! Is this not "lording it over God's heritage?" And what has become of the rights of the laity?

Every intelligent man that has ever studied the government knows that there is no lay representation in the M. E. Church, South. Every layman in either the Annual or General Conference, is a creature of the officiary of the church, and are not elected by a direct vote of the laity! The power to oppress in the M. E. church today is very nearly the same that it was in 1828, but the ministry of that church are more or less restrained from exercising their power by the existence of the M. P. Church! But let the time come when there shall be no M. P. church, and then you will be likely to see quite a change.

And as you say, Mr. Editor,—"If we can't help our unfortunate brethren of the M. E. churches out of their troubles, let us not be so foolish as to let them draw us into the very condition from which they are trying to escape." I will add, if we do not take your advice, then I think there will be a striking likeness in our action to the fable of the Fox convention. viz. "A fox that got his tail cut off in a trap, called a convention of all the foxes and got them to pass a resolution, that all foxes should have their tails cut off."

In kindness to all, I say let us be careful what we do. Geo. E. Hunt.

ABRAHAM'S GROWTH IN FAITH.

Abraham came to be a man of wonderful faith in God, but he was not always so. He doubtless had extraordinary faith in God when he went out at the command of God seeking a country that he knew not. But some of his later acts disclose the fact that he had not yet come to perfection of faith.

Some people do not like to see any faults in the good men and women of the Bible. Thy prefer to think that all they did was right. But do we not miss one of the chief lessons of the Bible if we do not discover that among men there are none perfect, that man is prone to evil, and that whatever of virtue we find in human life is due to a special exercise of divine favor? The Bible gives a very low estimate of man, morally considered, and a very high estimate of God. In human life sin abounds, imperfection is everywhere, and the only hope for man is in the remedial measures provided by God.

So we must not be surprised if we find that Abraham, the "most faithful man," failed even in the exercise of faith. Indeed, it has been remarked that men fail at their strongest points. Moses was one of the meekest of men, yet anger got the better of him. Solomon was the wisest of men, and yet did some of the foolishest things. Peter was very bold, but became a contemptible coward. Abraham had great faith, but not great enough. His faith in his earlier years, while far in advance of that of his idolatrous neighbors, did not begin to rise to that hight demanded by the character of God.

The fact is, faith in God grows with knowledge of God, and Abraham's earlier knowledge of God was very imperfect. How could it be otherwise? God had not then revealed himself to the world as He has today. So we see in Abraham's life indications that he did not know God well and did not trust God fully.

This is shown in the course he took to protect himself in Egypt. He feared for it to be known that Sarai was his wife, and gave it out that she was his sister—a half truth and a whole lie. Why did Abraham resort to dishonest means? For the same reason that many men do today: lack of faith in God. They think that God will not protect them or provide for them, and so they seek to provide for themselves in ways that are crooked. God gave Abraham a lesson in that the course he chose to avoid trouble was the very means of bringing him into trouble. Abraham found his wife transferred to the harem of the Egyptian ruler, a place so guarded that escape or rescue was impossible. Had not the God whom Abraham failed to trust come to his help, he would have been miserable indeed.

But this first lesson was not enough to establish Abraham's faith in God. The lesson had to be repeated; for in the land of Abimelech Abraham practiced the same deception, with similar results. Again God came to the rescue and showed Abraham that He could be trusted to protect and preserve His own.

As the years passed and Abraham thought on God's dealings with him, he came to larger and larger faith, until we see him prepared for that sublime exhibition we witness in the sacrifice of Isaac. He had learned to obey—to do right—and to leave the consequences with God. God will fufill His promises, however unlikely it may seem, judging from present conditions. As Abraham goes to the place of offering, accompanied by Isaac, we hear him say in response to the son's question: "God will provide." And when the test has been passed, and an offering has been found in a ram caught in a thicket by his horns, Abraham names the place "Jehovah-jireh"—the Lord will provide. His faith has grown more worthy of its Great Object. He has come to believe in God so profoundly that his faith affects all his practical life.

His earlier faith has gone increasing as his knowledge of God has increased until now he trusts God so fully that he will obey at all hazards.

And it is our privilege to attain unto a like faith in God, and perhaps a greater faith. We may know more of God than Abraham knew, and every revelation God has made may help to confirm us in the belief that He is the absolutely Faithful One.

—President Taft has commuted the sentence of Fred D. Warren Socialist editor, from six months in prison and a fine of $1500 to simply a fine of $100. This was well, but we do not think the president should have spoiled his act of clemency by adding the harsh words attributed to him; namely: "I would question the wisdom of making the defendant conspicuous and feeding his vanity by treating him seriously, when his violence, his exaggerations, his wild accusations and his mock heroics ought to be treated with ridicule." He that shows mercy should do it with cheerfulness.

—We cannot publish reports of weddings from unknown and unnamed persons, for reasons that will be obvious on reflection.

—Rev. W. D. Fogleman has run up the circulation of the Herald at Liberty splendidly. Wherever he goes the people subscribe for the church paper. The secret of it is he believes so thoroughly in the utility of church papers that he confidently asks the people to subscribe. We do not know whether he urges them to subscribe—we rather think he does not, but he succeeds extraordinarily well in keeping the paper going to the families he serves.

—Rev. J. E. Hartsell has been sick for some days but he is now reported as improving.

WAITING UPON THE LORD.

They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint. Isa. 40: 31.

In the verse preceding the text the prophet says: The youths shall faint and be weary and the young men shall utterly fall. Then He contrasts most truly and beautifully between the two classes, showing clearly that one shall fail—shall fall while the other shall rise to spiritual success and happiness. A moment's thought and a glance in the dim past will show that that condition is true, and that many youths and young men have failed in the out set and in the very prime of their lives. They reached an early and premature death, going down to it, by different ways and untold causes. Tired with home influences—they become weary with its restraint and drifted out into the wide ocean of sinful pleasure where the turbulent waves of vice stranded them forever. If they started right they soon got wrong and were dashed to death by the breakers of indulgence and excess. When we recall the names of many young men, and recount their short journey, we find that so many of them who started with us are absent. They have fallen out of the line of march long ago, and are with us no more. Judging from their walk, work, and conversation they were sadly hurt and ruined by their final fall. Failing to take Jesus with them resulted in their fatal end, and caused them to be in outer darkness and excluded from the light of life. What eternal remembrances must cluster around the words, light of life! To be in perpetual despair and think of such bright living words is dreadful to consider, and yet many are in that last condition. But all who wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength—they shall be helpful, vigorous and heavenly minded, because they live and move in Him and have their lives in His life.

Waiting on the Lord. What a great privilege to have this grand opportunity! How delightfully pleasant it is to learn more of Him, and to know how to wait upon Him in an acceptable manner, so that more love may be produced, and better service rendered. It will be well to notice first how we can wait upon the Lord and get a clear conception of our duty; for if a known duty is performed, it always gives happiness, and imparts inexpressible pleasure. In the beginning of our devotion we may wait upon our Lord silently. When entering the place for worship it should be done reverently and quietly, looking up to Him, the object of our worship, believing that the Spirit will abide with and influence the service in the most helpful way. For if the mind is fixed upon earnest, devout worship, and if it will catch the comforting influence of the occasion, it will greatly help in all the service which may follow. Listen well to these words. Wait on the Lord; be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy hearts; wait, I say, on the Lord.

The withered grass waits all through the long dry burning summer day for the silent dew to fall on it. Then it looks lively and beautiful with pure drops of water like diamonds sparkling in the rising sun light, until its bright face glistens with new growth and is tinged with a brighter and better color. So when coming before the Lord to receive the blessings which waiting gives, the refreshing can be so abundant as to give greater strength to the soul that is withering under the blighting influence of sin. It may be nearly exhausted—nearly overcome by the opposing and conflicting elements, but the windows of heaven can be opened until streams of blessing shall flow into every life. When such inexhaustible showers of grace and love shall bathe the feeble soul it will swell with gladness by waiting on the Lord. Then with unmeasured and untold joy you may say: Be still and know that I am God. By silently, earnestly and continually waiting a better glimpse and a more perfect view of the shining way can be had as the Spirit leads and the soul fills with rapture and praise. O, what a power there is in silence! When the day is gone and the silent shades of evening are rolled down, and the mind turns in and examines itself in these quiet hours how delightful and pleasant is this condition!

The great powers of nature work silently, and they are active in serving the purpose in moving and controlling the worlds that revolve in their circuits, which always come and go on time, without collision. Mighty power, unseen power, silent power, upholding and displaying such dazzling splendor and such incomparable glory as the heavens declare, while they pass each other in unbounded space. While thinking of this noiseless power in such constellated grandeur it thrills with silent awe, as the wind surveys such celestial greatness. These lofty views ought to inspire in silent devotion and draw us very close to God, when the power works silently and moves the heart into a better life. What is needed, what is wanted, what must be is more spiritual power, greater strength to endure. If there is physical strength toil seems easy. In order to be strong attention must be given to diet and a faithful, continued observation of natural laws, refraining from that which is injurious, and following that mode of living most conducive to health. Strength comes by rest, quietness prudence, temperance, and from other ways of right living. Find the cause of weakness, then remove it if possible, and strength will take its place and perform good service if not crowded out by too much indulgence. So must sin be turned out of the soul, and let the Spirit come in and fill it with strength, and it can come, and only so, by waiting upon the Lord.

To renew their strength is surely a great and wonderful privilege and duty. Waiting gives time for consideration and preparation, and qualifies one to receive renewed strength. Take some simple illustrations. It is necessary to eat and properly digest food so as to get and retain physical strength and when this need receives proper attention the desired results will soon follow. The silent, unseen work is going on, performing good service all the time by showing great results. You have noticed the vegetable kingdom how it is renewed by the silent power called sap. It bursts the buds into living green and opens the flowers with such a beautiful variety of colors. This spring while looking out upon a large field of budding and blooming apple trees, thickly set, and adorned with white and pink blossoms tinged with surpassing beauty, the soul was caused to rejoice with inexpressible gladness. Words fail to express the enraptured scene and feelings. That noiseless, unseen, silent power lifting itself slowly, low and high, is worthy of our greatest admiration. Talk with delight about the hundreds and thousands of horse power engines, but they are weak compared with this silent power. Go east, west, north, south, any where and every where on God's beautiful earth and you may see the fields and woodland renewing their strength, putting on new life, and it is being done at some time and in the same way. Well may philosophers love to write and talk about the great and wonderful works of God. No wonder ey love to walk through nature's wonderful conservatory and take lessons from Him who clothes the grass of the field. For when such inviting fields are seen and explored it brings them nearer to God who made and owns them. They who wait upon the Lord do not see nor hear His power as it moves them into a better, a renewed, a stronger condition, but they feel it and love Him because He first loved them.

Another very important way to wait upon the Lord is by singing praises; for this part of service is a most delightful exercise, and should always be conducted with consecrated devotion. Without the service of song the meetings would be a drag for lack of siritual inspiration. To be able to sing well with telling effect is an acquirement, or gift, and he who is thus possessed must be greatly blessed of the Lord. Having been told in the Bible to sing with the spirit and with the understanding also, not an opportunity should be lost in doing so, for it will be a flow of joy to singers as well as the hearers. What is needed, then, is the spirit and understanding. These elements bound together with love will overtake the wanderer, touch his soul, reform his life, and bring him back to his Father.

While looking over the list of many of the most noted and gifted singers of the world it will be seen that the stage has claimed some of them. They have delighted and thrilled thousands of anxious ones. Some however have left the stage and given the remainder of their lives in singing for Christ. They have been converted and they entered upon a better life, and have been instrumental in the conversion of others by the sweet, tender persuasive songs that rolled from cultivated and consecrated voices. Some years ago in a fashionable and populous city a lady of extra attainments sang in a theatre. She was wonderfully gifted and received large pay, but for some time she had been concerned about leading a different and a better life. One night as she was going down the street to fill her engagement she passed a church and heard such good singing that it deeply impressed her. Listening for a while she hastened on to the theatre, and when she came out that same night to sing every eye was turned toward her, and every ear was listening with intense delight to catch the sweet music as it flowed over the large audience. When that soft, sweet voice began to sing, the song she heard ringing out of the church as she passed it, her heart and voice quivered with very tender emotion as she sounded out these words:

"Depth of mercy can there be Mercy still reserved for me?
Can my God his wrath forbear?
Me the chief of sinners spare?

Then when she finished this hymn which was sung with powerful effect, many were weeping for joy. What a beautiful, converting sermon she preached in that song, in that theatre on that night!

Nothing is more devotional and helpful than good singing. It imparts a special zeal and attraction for the beginning and end of every religious service. And it is a blessed thought that so many beautiful and splendid characters have been used in the service of song. P. P. Bliss, taken suddenly away in the Ashtabula disaster, gave himself to singing the gospel, has long since gone to sing with the angels in a blissful eternity. And Ira D. Sankey is another beautiful example. Many still remember with pleasure, when his soft, manly voice swelled in lovely tones over large, delighted audiences. And how he caused the silent tears to flow from so many eyes. Thousands will remember with great pleasure the wonderful and elevating song service at the World's Sunday-school Convention held in Washington, D. C., May, 1910. To many it was the most important and happy occasion they ever realized, and they will never see as many people and hear as many voices again, at one time, until they enter heaven and join in the everlasting song.

It is pleasant to remember how a dear mother used to sing with a strong, gifted and mellow voice, until it was worn by the use and strain of time. Then, when the breath was too short to sing any more, how it cheered her heart as the children and others would sing to her some favorite songs. The tears freely flowed while thinking of the long, long ago, and a vision of heaven filled her soul with transport as she dwelt on the words: "O, think of the home over there."

Another good and important way to wait upon the Lord is by prayer. Many tired, fatigued, and discouraged ones have received rest and encouragement by waiting upon Him in prayer. Some time they are not blessed as expected and desired, there may be a reason for it. The Lord may be withholding the answer to the prayers until they are ready by waiting to receive them. Or the cause may be that they do not, at any time, pray with the spirit and with the understanding. There must be faith, spirit and understanding if expected to be heard at the Father's throne and receive the needed blessings. Prayers shall be definite and appropriate. What do you want—what do you most need? Pray—pray and wait. Persist, do not become discouraged so soon. For a good example look at the Canaanitish woman who cried: "Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David; my daughter is grieviously vexed with a devil." She had faith, she meant prayful business with the Lord. At first He did not answer her favorably, but she came and worshipped Him, saying, Lord help me." She wanted her daughter healed, and she pleaded with the Lord until He granted her request, and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith; be it done unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was healed from that hour." Learn what it is to pray, then do more of it. It is the way by which you make known your needs. It is all right to ask the prayers of others, but pray for yourselves.

Another essential way to wait upon the Lord is by patience. Let patience have her perfect work, and better results will be seen. People wait at their tables, patiently about three times a day, until the food is prepared and placed before them. It is necessary for them to do this so that they may eat, and renew their physical strength. Could not live long without eating. It must be done to live. And we must wait upon the Lord to get divine strength that we may grow in grace and the divine life. If many waited on their tables, attended their meals as seldom as they wait upon the Lord they would have perished long ago. Get more patience and faith in your experience and they will doubly help you.

The author of the text employs this attractive and suitable figure in alluding to the eagle when he says: "They shall mount up with wings as eagles." The eagle is the king of birds, and it is also an emblem of the United States. With plumed wings it is impressed on the American coin, and we look upon it with admiration and pride. In its natural state, seeing so far away and flying so high, wonderfully surpassing the flight and height of all other birds, it attracts wide and interested attention from many beholders. And it often soars with seeming forethought far above the clouds when a storm is rapidly approaching with threatening danger. While the storm is raging below, and the lightning with lurid flash darts in vivid curved lines, writing its name across the cloud until it rolls in tones of thunder near the earth, the eagle is still above it, where the sun is shining, looking down upon the black rain cloud below. Up there it was quiet and light, below was darkness and danger. After the storm passed over the eagle came down and all was well. The king of birds was looked upon soaring high, upward and upward until lost to vision in the deep blue space, then again descending lower and lower, is seen folding his tired wings to rest for a while on a high mountain peak. So the soul in its flight after God is happy to rest on His eternal promises, and to abide in His presence.

To love the right and do it
Is to my heart so sweet;
It makes the path of duty
A shining golden street.
Give me thy strength, O Father,
To choose this path each day!
Then heaven within, about me,
Shall compass all my way.

SOME PERSIAN SUPERSTITIONS.

There are some Americans who do not like to sit down at a table where there are thirteen persons. Others think Friday an unlucky day, or believe that breaking a mirror is a bad omen. But even these people know how foolish such superstitions are, and every year we are growing more sensible and less afraid of "bad luck."

But in Persia superstition has a firm hold on the people. If a man is to start on a journey, he must first consult the stars and omens. If he sneezes once, it is a bad sign, and he waits a while. But if he sneezes twice or more times, he thinks all will be well, and he goes ahead.

Some Persian ladies came to call on an American missionary one day. They were an hour late, because, just as they were starting, some one sneezed once. That meant "wait a while."

A mother in Persia brought her child to the mission hospital. As the doctor gave her the medicines and instructions some one sneezed once, and the mother got up, left the medicines, and went away crying.

It is thought unlucky, too, for a mother to count her children.

The Persians believe that it brings good luck to put the bone of an animal—a horse or donkey—inside the wall of a new house when it is being built.

Charms are worn on the head or arm or about the neck, to protect the wearer from evil. These charms consist of different articles. A double almond is considered a safe charm. Sometimes the tusk of a wild animal is worn or a small copy of the Koran, which is the Mohammedan's sacred book.—The Continent.

CHINESE GIRL BRAVES NEW LAND TO BECOME NURSE.

New York Press.

Hsui Lan Pai, a Manchu girl whose race for 400 years has controlled the Chinese Government, arrived here yesterday on the Laurentic to study medicine in the nurses' training school connected with Johns Hopkins University. Although she is only 18 years old and cannot speak English, Miss Pai is willing to work two years or more in the university so she can return to China and become a nurse and teacher.

With her is Dr. Yamei Kin, the foremost women physician in China, and head of the Woman's Medical Department of Northern China and of the Training School for Nurses in Tientsin. Dr. Kin is a graduate of the Women's Medical College Infirmary of New York, now run in connection with Cornell University, and she frequently has visited this country. She is enthusiastic about American methods of teaching medicine, and it was she who persuaded Miss Pai's father to let the girl come to the United States.

New York was a revelation to the Manchu girl, and through Dr. Kin she admitted her astonishment last night in the Hotel Martha Washington. Although well educated and a traveler in her own country, Miss Pai confessed the rattle and bang, the big buildings and the glitter of lights along Broadway were "something different."

"Very fine, very wonderful," she repeated in Chinese to Dr. Kin, shaking her head and smiling. But she would not go into detail because she said she could not compare "American cities with our cities."

"She says," interpreted Dr. Kin, "that China and America are so different that she is confused and can't put in words the strange impression New York has made on her."

Miss Pai was reticent on the subject of woman suffrage, also, saying she "hadn't thought of it," but Dr. Kin, who has studied conditions here said:

"American women have almost every thing they desire. Why do they seek suffrage? I don't think they are sincere in asking for it. Your women who are doing national work, who really are helping your race and who are bravely forgetful of self, are not supporting such a movement. I believe in woman's rights, and in better conditions for women, but truly it seems to me the women who are the most prominent agitators of the suffrage cause are the women who have no serious life work to do, and who are talking to kill weary time."

Dr. Kin explained the double purpose of her visit to this country. After Miss Pai has been placed in school to learn English the physician will remain here two months, during which she plans to lecture and to study American hospital conditions.

Miss Pai laughed when told the story that she had brought six trunks filled with gorgeous Chinese dresses. One small trunk contains all her belongings, and although her dresses now are either Manchu or Chinese, Dr. Kin will see that she is fitted in gowns fashionable here.

KINDNESS.

Men live among their friends, their helpers, and comrades in life, but how tardily the box of precious ointment is bought, brought, and broken while they are with us. Often it is forgotten as we mingle on the path of life. Then the day comes when the good friend passes on. Then the postponed ointment and flowers are brought. It is not always so, but too frequently so. The history of the world's saviors is in large part a sad page. How little encouragement and appreciation of their merit and ministry they received while here. Many of the world's benefactors were misunderstood, hampered, and frequently persecuted as they came over the hard way of progress bearing light and service to the human race. Their paths might have been made easier, but the world plaited instead a crown of thorns for their brows and compelled them to bear their cross alone.

In respect for those who toiled on unappreciated, we now take thought, and are still busy building monuments to the heroes and saints which past generations neglected and persecuted.

The kind words we say of our friends and benefactors after they are gone are useless to them. It is postponed kindness which comes too late. Often these patient and heroic souls were weary in wonderment as to whether what they sought to give was really helpful. The words which could have affirmed it so frequently remained unspoken. We parted at life's crossroad and left the sympathy which we felt unexpressed.

It is often true that those for whom we do the most are the slowest to voice their appreciation. How much the living comrade needs your love and kindness! How brave this expression of sympathy and interest will help him be in coming days!

Distribute your love in its manifold form now. Bear another's burden. Oil the bearings of life somewhere, and thus reduce the friction.

It was easier for our Master to journey up Calvary because Mary broke the box of ointment and told him by her deed how much she loved him as her Lord. Pray and strive to make your life a help and inspiration to all you possibly can. Pay the price of giving helpful service. Then you will leave a blessing and mankind will call you blessed, and God will understand. It is only as the candle wastes that it can give light to others. Expended virtue is yet the price of healing.

Dr. Dawson has said: "Kindness is the only memorial which escapes oblivion; it is the one thing in man which God never forgets. The cup of cold water given in pure pity to a thirsty child is a thing that God recalls about a man in the last terrible assize, when all other things in life which he thought most important are forgotten."

The tears of sympathy we shed will be transmuted into pearls, and our deeds of love shall be laid up of God as our treasures in glory. To forfeit your ministry of kindness is to lose your crown. To be helpful to others is to wear the beautiful marks of your divine Master.—The Westminster.

MY HEART NEEDS THEE.

My heart needs thee, O Lord, my heart needs thee! No part of my being needs thee like my heart. All else within me can be filled by thy gifts. My hunger can be satisfied by daily bread. My thirst can be allayed by earthly waters. My cold can be removed by household fire. My weariness can be relieved by outward rest. But no outward thing can make my heart pure. The calmest day will not calm my passions. The fairest scene will not beautify my soul. The richest music will not make harmony within. The breezes can cleanse the air, but no breeze can clense a spirit. This world has not provided for my heart. It has provided for my eye; it has provided for my ear; it has provided for my touch; it has provided for my taste; it has provided for my sense of beauty; but it has not provided for my heart. Provide thou for my heart, O Lord. It is the only unwinged bird in all creation; give it wings, O Lord. Earth has failed to give it wings; its very power of loving has often drawn it in the mire. Be thou the strength of my heart. Be thou its fortress in temptation, its shield in remorse, its covert in the storm, its star in the night, its voice in the solitude. Guide it in its gloom; help it in its heat; direct it in its doubt; calm it in its conflict; fan it in its faintness; prompt it in its perplexity; lead it through its labyrinths; raise it from its ruins. I cannot rule this heart of mine; keep it under the shadow of thine own wings.—George Matheson.

TEMPERANCE REFORM IN JAPAN.

[illegible] should be one of our best things said of Methodist ministers is that they are temperance reformers inherently, and that this spirit is unconquerable, breaking out against the liquor habit wherever they find it. [illegible] excellent organ, fact in examining the reform, Light of Our Land—Kuni no Hikari—published in Tokyo, Japan. In this interesting issue of Nov. 10 we note under the title, "A Welcome Reception Unprecedented within the Past Thirty Years," the following from Rev. Dr. Julius Soper, our long-time and honored missionary to that land. Dr. Soper says:

"It was in the sixth year of Meiji that I first came to Japan; hence, thirty-seven years have already passed away. During these many years I have accepted almost numberless invitations to deliver gospel sermons and temperance addresses from near and far, and at each place I have received a warm reception, but none has been so unique and cordial as the one I received from the members of the Temperance Society at Kami Suwa, in the Province of Shinano, a few weeks ago, and I am very glad to give an account of it.

"It was about 5:30 in the afternoon of July 27 that I reached Kami Suwa station from Karuizawa, a well-known summer resort. Several of the officers of the society met me two stations below, and when we reached our destination, we found a large number of persons waiting to welcome me. There they formed a procession with two large red banners with the words, 'Suwa Temperance Society' inscribed on them in large white letters. The procession was led by a brass band, followed by the officers and members of the society. Thus I was escorted to the hotel where I was to stop over night. The procession was unusually unique and picturesque. It wonderfully attracted the attention of many passers by, and of those sitting in the stores and shops on the way. This also proved to be the very best kind of advertisement, as the great success of the evening temperance meeting abundantly proved."

Elsewhere in the magazines is a half-page illustration showing Dr. Soper giving a temperance address about the fortress at Shinagawa. Looking out on the Shinagawa Bay, he called attention forcefully to the forts near at hand, which were built by the Tokugawa government at the time that Commodore Perry visited Japan's shores, for the protection of the land against the enemy and he exhorted the people to build temperance forts against their greatest modern enemy, alcohol, and against their national drink, sake—to the Japanese what beer is to the German. It is encouraging and refreshing to learn, as in this case, that our missionaries are such stalwart and accepted leaders in temperance reform.—Zion's Herald.

OUR BIBLE SCHOOL.

Answers to Assigned Questions.

In answer to question No. 13, please ask someone who thinks the story of Eden to be an allegory to answer it.

Sincerely,
Mrs. E. G. Lowdermilk.

(There are many Christians eminent for piety and learning who think so. We do not know whether any of our class have come to this view or not. We refer the question to the entire class.)

Q. 14. Some of Cain's descendants were herdsmen, others handled musical instruments, and others were artificers in brass and iron.

Gen. 4:20, 21, 22.

Mrs. G. S. Kernodle.

15 Godly men of the house of Adam.

Mrs. W. P. Martin.

16. No answer has been received as yet. The question is somewhat indefinite, and might give rise to a variety of opinions. To me Isaac appears at his best when he submitted to be bound and laid on the altar to be sacrificed. It took great grace to do that.

17. According to my view the five most prominent men in the history are Adam, Noah, Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph.

S. A. Swaim.

(These are the ones we had in mind.)

Are all the class satisfied with Mrs. W. F. Kennett's answer as to where we find the first prayer recorded? If you will refer to Gen. 24: 12, 13, 14 you will find it, as the others referred to were spoken face to face.

(Cannot a prayer be "spoken face to face"?—Editor.)

Questions.

18. Was Joseph (Jacob's son) a type of Christ, and if so, in what respects?

Mrs. G. S. Kernodle.

19. What books of the Old Testament begin with the word "And?"

Question 18 is referred to Mrs. S. A. Swaim. Q. 19 to Miss Ida Barber.

AN ESTIMATE.

A brother sends the following estimate of a city minister's living expenses for a family of four: Board, $384; horse and buggy, keep and repairs, $150; clothes and medicine, $75; fuel, $47; telephone, $18; water rent and sewerage fee $9; tax, $6.00. Total, $689. He is rather high on some items and low on others, perhaps. He includes nothing for books and papers, nothing for church offerings, etc.

FUNERAL OCCASIONS.

It is right to give all our dead a Christian burial—to worship before God. Respecting the dead and solemnly engaging in the burial rites is a custom that we can't afford to ignore.

In this we should show our sympathy, however our relations, and it belongs to the human to "weep with them that weep." At the loss of friends some may over mourn; but better this than to fail to sympathize.

It is God-like to reverence and to worship, and it is human to sympathize with our friends and to weep.

On the occasion of the burial of an aged woman her married sons cried over their dead mother and shed tears profusely. Those tall, lusty men of families showed their sincere love for the woman that gave them birth by hearty crying.

When one must be laid low in death let the friends of the deceased give vent to their best human feelings.

There is such a thing as finding a measure of relief for our grief by crying. Do not criticise the bereaved even if they seem to over mourn.

It is encouraging to know that the people usually attend burials and funerals. Thus, it was originally intended, and is a custom that should be urged. It has become fashionable with some to hurry through funeral services, but such a tendency is not for the best.

There are many persons who are so worldly that they are slow about getting to the place of worship, and if it was even only for their sakes there should be a delay. At a funeral service there is no time for fashionable preaching (no time for such on any occasion) but, as a rule it is expected that the "sinners" will hear the word.

The great preaching for the sinner is salvation, salvation from sin that involves repentance. Repentance means to turn from sin for Christ's sake.

When circumstances will allow it, and the preacher feels to do so, he should take a text that would lead him to preach a whole hour. Of course the text will not come in the way of a short sermon.

"The majority rules" in our social affairs, and the preaching at all burial services is mainly intended, or should be, for the benefit of the congregation at large.

If circumstances will allow it a burial, or funeral, service should be slow and deliberate and not hurry through; and at a funeral service good music is needed.There is great need to use means continually in persuading the people to worship God. The human family ought to be very much united by means of sympathy, and when we unite on a funeral occasion to use the regular established means of worship, the whole occasion moves us to the happy state of sympathy. The Christian religion is the very thing to get sin-stricken humanity to sympathize, and to be united as "one heart"—"one mind." It is an encouraging thing to see the people fill their churches on a funeral occasion, and on such serious occasions the doctrine of salvation should be urged before the people. God makes preaching one of the greatest things for us—and we have need to hear, and to re-hear.

The idea really prevails with some religious people that we have too much preaching, but this is a mistaken idea.

The man called of God to preach never feels that we have too much preaching, but he feels burdened with the great need of enforcing the fundamental truths of the gospel.

Preachers and the spiritually minded thirst for the hearing of preaching. When occasion affords a chance or opportunity to preach to the people, and to sinners, the preaching should not be neglected. It is especially providential for the people to be preached to, and lectured and taught in public congregations.

Families are all in the great need of religious papers. Those who so much need the religious paper have not got it.

PROTESTANT PAPACY.

Theological intolerance repeats itself.

The pope of the Disciple sect, in an article entitled, "Curiosities of Kentucky Baptists," attacking the Baptist Standnation, published in these the following language:

"I observe that Baptists preachers—at least those in Kentucky—have not yet learned better than to leave many of their converts unbaptized. In the report of their Board of Missions I find this statement: 'Our evangelists, missionaries and colporters report 3,685 conversions and 2,873 baptisms.'

"This shows that they left 812 of their converts, or more than one fourth of them, unbaptized. When will these 'evangelists, missionaries and colporters' learn what the commission is under which they claim to labor, and to comply with it as the apostles did? How many of their converts did Peter and Paul leave unbaptized?"

To answer the Disciple pope's last question first, we may let Paul speak for himself, by quoting his words recorded in 1 Corinthians 1: 14-17:

"I thank God that I baptized none of you, save Crispus and Gaius; lest any man should say that ye were baptized into my name. And I baptized also the household of Stephanas: besides, I know not whether I baptized any other. For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel."

This language of Paul proves that he was not a Campbellite: for no one ever heard a Campbellite missionary talk so disrespectfully of baptism.

Peter spoke of baptism properly always; but he did not have the spirit of Alexander Campbell about it: for I find that he is only mentioned in the Bible as having spoken of baptism on four occasions, recorded in Acts 2nd chapter, Acts 10 chapter, Acts 11th chapter, and 1st Peter 3rd chapter. And one whole book of Peter does not even mention baptism. The Campbellite pope would not have written a whole book on the subjects that Peter treated, without mentioning baptism. That fact shows that the Disciples have not the spirit of the Bible writers, and of the Bible preachers.

Let not a word that I have said be construed as implying that I do not believe in water baptism. I do believe in it. I believe that Jesus intended it to be a continuing ordinance. But Jesus did not intend it to be a flood between Christians; so that a whole denomination should be condemned because some of its evangelists did not baptize all their converts. Protestant infallibility is a [redacted] Roman infallibility.

It is a blessed thing that there are only two protestant denominations that claim infallibility for themselves.

J. J. Summerbell.

A true test of a man may be seen in the attitude which he bears to the conditions confronting the church—whether he unconsciously excuses his own inactivity by calling them 'problems,' or whether he assumes the militant attitude and recognizes the difficulties of opportunities. Paul was not blind to the difficulties which confronted him. 'A great door and effectual is opened unto me,' he declared, 'and there are many adversaries.' The adversaries only stimulated him to win greater victories. The pastor who holds so vital a relation to the coming of the kingdom must see three great opportunities, and avail himself of them.—Bates.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Greensboro.

On Wednesday night of last week, the teacher-training class and other friends were handsomely entertained by Mr. and Mrs. J. Norman Wills in the new Philathea Class Room. Refreshments were served and a social hour was enjoyed after the serious work was through, which was an outlining of the course of study to be pursued.

On Sunday morning last, Mr. Chas. Ireland spoke during the preaching hour, the meeting being in the hands of the Laymen's Missionary Committee.

—A call has been issued for a meeting of Pennsylvania's Christian citizens in Harrisburg on Feb. 27, in the interest of several reforms, particularly better divorce laws, better Sabbath observance, better public education, and more temperance.

Hope, Chatham Ct.

Rev. J. H. Bowman filled his Feby. appointment at this place, second Sunday. He preached an inspiring sermon. The congregation was small, owing to the muddy condition of the roads, and largely to an appointment at a nearby church. The advisability of changing to an afternoon service was discussed, but because of members living at some distance it did not seem best to make the change.

At the request of the quarterly conference, Mr. Bowma stepped out of the pastor's shoes into those of a committee, and advised the payment of dues and pastor's salary as promptly and systematically as possible. I hope the church will adopt the plan or suggestion. Certainly there should be more system and business than we use in our church work.

Would say for the benefit of Mr. Underwood, that my first report probably appeared before you received a copy of our paper. So the "chunk" you threw "fell by the wayside."

Liberty Church.

Our pastor, Rev. W. D. Fogleman, filled the regular appointments here yesterday morning and night. At the morning service we had Communion and Brother Fogleman gave us a good sermon explaining this beautiful institution. There were large attentive congregations at both services.

Our Tuesday night prayer meetings are growing in interest. Last Tuesday night Brother Fogleman took for his subject the word "Come," and he made the service very interesting by giving out references bearing on the subject, to different ones in the congregation. After each one would read Brother Fogleman would explain the passage of scripture. We hope to have an increase in attendance from time to time.

Our special meeting will begin on Tuesday night before the second Sunday in March. Rev. S. W. Taylor is to assist in the meeting but will not be here till the latter part of the first week. We are praying that the church may be greatly revived and that many of the unsaved may be converted.

Our Sunday-school has just adopted the plan of giving buttons as a reward for regular attendance. At the end of each quarter one button is returned and another is given until the end of a year the gold button is given to be kept.

With best wishes for the success of the Herald, I am yours in the work.

Our pastor, Rev. J. W. Self, filled his appointment at Antioch the second Sunday in Feb.; he preached a very forceful sermon to a large and attentive congregation. There will be prayermeeting at Antioch next Sunday at 10 o'clock. We are going to work our church over and fix it up. We have had Bro. E. H. Mullis preaching for us; he is doing well and all of the people like him. He is a good preacher. Bro. We will ask President Swain to come to Moriah church this year and see us.

Our pastor who has been sick with lagrippe for more than a week is improving slowly; he was not able to preach yesterday. Bro. C. E. Crist, our good Moravian friend, filled his pulpit in the morning; there was no preaching at night.

Mrs. J. R. Cunnings entertained the Ladies' Aid Society last Monday afternoon in an exceedingly pleasant manner. The president, Mrs. W. B. Speas, conducted the devotional exercises, after which the business of the afternoon was brought before the society. The principal feature of this was the decision of the ladies to purchase an individual communion service for the church. So unanimously in favor of the movement were they that the necessary funds were collected on the spot. Each member also pledged herself to contribute one dollar at the next meeting towards the work of the society. One new name was added for membership and seventeen members of the society were present. The election of officers resulted in every one of the former officers being re-elected, with Mrs. W. B. Speas and Mrs. G. F. Millaway as the visiting committee. During the afternoon Mrs. Cunnings served delicious refreshments in two courses.

The ladies will meet with Mrs. J. W. Hester for the March meeting.

Our paper has changed its name. I like it fine, but I was better pleased when I heard our preacher was coming back. We had a Christmas tree, also exercise. I think it was real good. Children spoke well, trained by Mrs. Lowdermilk, Bro. Lowdermilk has been giving us several good sermons this year, but that is nothing unusual. Bro. Lowdermilk is a broad-minded man, a good preacher, a man that is thought well of by every body; and as to his wife, every body loves, her I think.

Our Sunday-school is moving along nicely. Our superintendent offered to give a premium to the one that would recite the most verses out of the Bible by heart from last May till Christmas; this was offered to a little class, ages about twelve years old; also one for the attendance. Miss Florence Lefler received the one for reciting most verses, some over seven hundred, it being a nice Bible. Lillie Sides and Lottie Lowder received the attendance prize, it being a Bible also.

We are glad that Bro. Matthew Furr and family have moved back to his farm near here. He has been in Albemarle for some years.

I close with best wishes to the Herald.

We have been silent for some time, but not idle. Our Sunday-school is progressing nicely. We decided Christmas to go into winter quarters, but later decided to have Sunday-school twice a month. Jan., we held the 2nd and 4th Sundays; Feb., 1st, 2nd, and 4th Sundays, and I think by the second quarter we will be running in full blast. I don't think it will be worth while for us to try winter quarters soon again. Our Sunday-school was reorganized some time ago, electing Bro. R. F. Leonard Supt., Lee Wagoner Sec. and treas., and Miss Bessie Wagner, organist. On last Saturday night Rev. H. L. Powell, our pastor, went to West Lexington to fill his regular appointment, after services were closed he went to his buggy, finding it heavily laden with flour and other good things to eat, too numerous to mention. May the good Lord, the one great Giver of all perfect gifts, remember each giver and may the hearts and minds of pastor and people be so united that great and lasting good may be accomplished.

Bro. Powell filled his regular appointment at Bethesda today, giving us a very inspiring sermon. His little boy (Henry) is getting so he can be up again.

Bro. Fred Leonard's health is improving very slowly; we hope he will soon be well again. Mr. and Mrs. Alex Evans were visitors at Mr. John Sink's last Sunday.

Master Clem Yokley had the misfortune to fall from a tree at school and break his leg, also Flavins Whitlow broke his arm.

The writer has been battling with the mumps for the past two weeks, but is better now.

Mr. R. E. Leonard's little boy (Fred) got kicked badly in the face by a mule, but the wounds are healing nicely. Success to the M. P. Herald.

High Point.

The snow and rain of last Saturday night occasioned quite a decrease in our Sunday-school and Sunday morning congregation. There were only 160 in Sunday-school, and that was a considerable drop down from 227 the Sunday before. At the 11 o'clock serice last Sunday the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society held its Thank-offering service. The congregation was rather small, but the offering amounted to about $29.00, and more will come in yet through the "Golden Shower Bags" that were given out for the service.

We have already paid our assessment to the Board of Foreign Missions for this year, and hope to send in our assessment for Church Extension early in March.

On the 29th of January Mrs. C. J. Ferree and her three daughters, Misses Alma, Lizzie and Grace Ferree were received by certificate from the Asheboro, N. C., M. P. Church.

On last Sunday Miss Vera Idol was granted a certificate of transfer. We regret to lost her.

Mr. Cameron Johnson, of Richmond, Va., was with us on Feb. 5th, and gave a splendid address on Foreign Missions.

Burlington.

After a night of almost continual rain, and in spite of our very muddy streets, there were 218 in Sunday School, and the collection was $3.64. The pastor announced his intention of starting a class for Bible Study, to use as a text book, "Training for Service." This class will meet on Wednesday evenings and will take the place of the regular Wednsday evening prayer service. Every one will be invited to attend, and it is believed that the study of the Bible with this text-book will make the meetings more interesting. Already nearly thirty have subscribed for the book, and they will be ordered at once. The class will hold its first meeting next Wednesday evening, Feb. 22.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society met last Sunday afternoon. New officers were elected for this year as follows:

Pres., Mrs. J. G. Rogers; V. Pres., Mrs. S. M. Hornaday; Rec. Sec., Miss Mamie McPherson; Cor. Sec., Mrs. W. N. Thompson; Treasurer, Miss Ila Stafford.

The Ladies' Aid met at the parsonage on Monday afternoon. There was a good attendance of the members. This Society has elected its officers for this year: Mrs. J. D. Williams, Pres.; Mrs. J. Ed. Moore, V. Pres.; Mrs. S. M. Hornaday, Sec. and Treas.; Mrs. J. B. Cheek, Asst. Sec.

It has been decided to hold the meetings of the W. H. M. S. and Ladies' Aid together hereafter.

Mrs. S. A. Brown and Mr. H. B. Cole are sick at this writing. We hope they will soon be well again.

At Bro. Taylor's last appointment, some strangers and many visitors were present. He discoursed beautifully upon the Lord's Supper; after which the Sacrament was administered.

Members of church remained after congregation was dismissed. Rev. M. J. Morris, steward, read individual assessments for pastor's salary which seemed to be satisfactory. We were told also that we have a little debt on our new church yet that must be met soon. Our interested members have paid liberally and worked hard, sometimes feel like giving up in despair, but we know this won't do; must continue to work and pay, work and pray till all is finished.

Mrs. Pattie Parks, who formerly lived on Halifax Ct., near Eden church, is living near here now. With her consent the Ladies' Aid Society had a "measuring" party in her home to help get hymn books for our Sunday school. Everybody behaved so nicely she invites us to have another entertainment for the church. She is a strong M. P. and wishes to help us in the good work. Our organist, Miss Julia Carter, has ordered the books, Hallowed Hymns, and informs us they will be in soon.

Mr. Jesse Carter, Jr., and Miss Blanche Morris, both members of this church, were united in marriage here in Corinth church last Sunday, 12th, at four o'clock in the presence of a few friends. Bro. Taylor officiated. From church, they went to their new home near here which the groom had furnished previously. They both are industrious, raised by pious parents. We believe they will do well. We trust that their married life will be a happy one.

The death angel visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charlie Williams on the 3rd of this month and took their seven months old little girl. She was taken very ill about 8 o'clock and died at eleven of the same evening. The remains were brought to Corinth burying ground. Burial services were conducted by Bro. Taylor. Many friends were present. This being the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Williams, her death has brought deep sorrow. We can't hardly help weeping with them, but why weep ? Remember Christ says, Of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Your friend,

Fannie Barnes.

We thought the shower was over and the pounding had ceased when they had given the "hard" pounding, ending with one less hard, but to our surprise and pleasure, on last Tuesday night Friendship came with an army about forty strong and gave us one of the heaviest we have ever had; even Sam, the house, was not forgotten, and was remembered with a nice lot of corn. The first thing we noticed when we had recovered from the shock, was Bro. Sidney Short trying to press thru' the door with a packing too large for the door, and the door is wide too.

I would be glad to give names of persons and articles brought, but it would take too much space; however will say the amount is so great that the supply will not be exhausted until we can gather fresh from the orchards and gardens, etc. To all the dear ones we would, if we could, express our inexpressible gratitude. May the Lord bless them all and help us to repay them in service.

We were delighted on last Sunday to find lumber accumulating on the grounds at Mt. Moriah to build a new church, and soon we shall hear the voice of saw and hammer. While you are reading this we will be in our rally at Friendship. Pray for this meeting.

Mrs. Dallie Pickens Roberts was buried on Thursday the 9th of February. She had been a sufferer for many months. It was a great grief to the family and community and church to have to give her up. Her aged father, "Uncle Bobbbie," died about a year ago. Mrs. Roberts had moved into the old home and was caring for her mother. She leaves a devoted husband, Bro. Eddie Roberts, and two children. All these were as tender toward her as a mother to a little child. A large crowd attended the funeral services.

There is much sickness among the people. Mrs. Andy Roberts is in feeble health and her daughter, Mrs. Kirk, has been ill at Dillsboro. And there are others.

It is a sore trial to these good people to be without a pastor; but they are brave and true.

One splendid man confessed Christ in the morning service Sunday, another strong and fine fellow asked for prayer in the morning service.

A real prodigal son joy has come to one of our families in the return of a lost one.

Our Ladies' Aid will give a Valentine social this Tuesday evening.

The Baraca boys will lead the prayer-meeting Wednesday evening.

A week's meetings held at Pleasant Gap during the holidays was not what it might have been, but the attendance was small. One reclaimed and the few faithful ones revived.

A special meeting commenced at Democrat Jan. 11, and closed the 23rd. Bro. T. A. Hensley was pulpit help and a good faithful worker, four converted and a great many revived, but the results were not as great as they might have been had the Christians been as active as they should have been. One Bro., Tom Warren, was received into the church and others are expected to join later. The people say the good seed sown then is still sprouting and hope they will come to be strong plants.

Dear Herald:

We had the pleasure of hearing our new minister, Bro. Trogden; he delivered a very able sermon. The congregation was very good for the weather. It was the most attentive one I ever saw. He seems to be a man full of the Holy Spirit. We all like him and hope he will do a good work on this circuit. Brethren, pray for us that this will be a most successful year. We were very glad to see a report from Bro. T. A. Plyler last week. I am glad he is liking his new work. Bro. Plyler is a good man and served us well..

Since my last report we have lost our Sunday-school Supt., Miss Maude Lanier. She became the bride of Mr. T. C. Crutchfield, of Greensboro. They will make their home there. She will be greatly missed, also another one's seat is vacant in the choir: Miss Cleto Wright became the bride of Jesse Holt, of Thomasville.

We like the new name of the church paper very much.

Mr. Chaney Workman has entered the High school at Narcanor, N. C.

Mrs. Jane Workman, of Denton, spent a few days last week with friends here.

Mrs. John Sexton, Sr., died recently at her home near Canaan, from a cancer. She was a good woman. A well wisher to the Herald, and its many readers a sister for Christ.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

Because of unavoidable circumstances some of our Haw River congregation were not at their usual places last Sunday. Because of the death of his father, Bro. J. C. Morris was in Roanoke, Va. Misses Maggie and Lou Hughes were among the sick ones. In spite of circumstances, however, there were good, attentive congregations both morning and night.

At the Sunday-school the Little Cross and Crown Badge System was discussed, meeting the approval of many. This system will, in all probability, be adopted soon. In the interest of the Baraca and Philathea work Bros. Williams and Rogers of the Burlington Sunday-school visited the Graham Sunday-school last Sunday. These brethren may be assured that their visit was not in vain.

Among our sick ones Bro. S. S. Holt, Masters Donnell Holt and Lonnie Ezelle of Graham and Mrs. Jno. Snotherly of Haw River are improving.

We very much appreciate kindness and thoughtfulness of Dr. Goley in that he has just recently made some much needed additions to the furnishings of the pastor's home.

Sunday-school attendance last Sunday at Graham was 60; at Haw River, 63.

Gone Home.

On Jan. 29th, the death angel visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. D. L. McMahan, and took from their loving care their dear little baby boy, Edward, aged six months and seven days. All that could be done for him was done. He was a sweet child. How sad the home will be without him. How hard for father and mother to give up their only child, yet God knows best. Funeral services conducted by pastor. His remains were laid to rest in Williams cemetery to await the resurrection morn. May the father, mother and loved ones meet little Edward in the sweet by and by.

—Mrs. Counsel Tucker is at St. Leo Hospital where she underwent an operation for gall stones. She was sorely afflicted, but her recovery is hoped for.

—Among the visitors in Grace Church last Sunday were Rev. Will Davidson, of Charlotte, and Dr. Evans and wife. The last who is a sister of Dr. Johnson, of this church, was mistaken by some for Miss Ethel Harris, so close is the resemblance.

Correction.—We regret to have made an error last week in the obituary notice of Bro. Harper. His marriage occurred in 1855, and not in 1885.

GIVING.

There are few of God's children but what need to cultivate the grace of liberality. None of us give too much to the Lord's cause. Many pray for more faith and for more love while but few that they may be made more willing to give and that their liberality might be increased. Many a child of the King has not learned the lesson of giving in the rigkht spirit and thus fails in obtaining one of life's choicest blessings. Our Father in heaven, the absolute owner of all things, has given to us possessions that we might have the opportunity of being God-like in giving back to Him something of our inheritance.

No where can we use our means to better advantage than in the cause of missions. The man of large means is learning that his offerings to the Lord count for most in the mission field. Steadily but slowly the eyes of men are being opened to the great opportunity of financing this the greatest enterprise of the ages—the evangelization of the world. We grow impatient at times but he who studies the onward march of Christ's kingdom in the world sees a vision of hope.

The thought of stewardship and the relation of money to the kingdom are subjects that have a larger place in our minds than ever before and fruitage must result.

When the idea of stewardship with all that it implies has fully taken possession of us we will give more largely and will be actuated by the principle. Not how much I give, but how little need I retain for working efficiency.

Money cannot of itself redeem men's souls but in the economy of salvation it costs money to bring the Gospel into vital touch with mankind. Other things being equal, the more money we have at our disposal the more quickly can we give to men every where an opportunity to be saved. Dr. Bishop says, "Your salvation and mine, as well as the converted heatehen's, is in part some person's money transmuted into life, life here and now and the blessed hope of eternal life by and by."

He who hordes up miserly his possession fails to remember that the hope of increase lies not in what we keep but in what we give out. A farmer has ten bushels of wheat in his granary. He may have a little pleasure in the thought possessing it. But his hope of increase lies in giving it out to be scattered over the fertile fields. What an abundant harvest follows. In the same way we may have money and hide it away but our hope of blessing lies in using it to the glory of God. By so doing it is transmuted into the currency of heaven and we shall find it many days hence as treasures laid up in heaven.

That child of God is wisest who is living in the simplest manner here and now and is striving to put all the money possible into the extension of Christ's kingdom on earth.

"Good measure, pressed down, running over,
Give for God's cause, and so shall be given;
Good measure, pressed down running over,
Thus will you lay up your treasure in heaven."

A Pleasant Call.

In the evening of January 19, while sitting by the fire, someone knocked at the door and in came two young men from Milboro, Mr. Percy Julian and Mr. Redding. We chatted a while and we heard some one coming around the house and a knock and Mr. L. R. Hughes and family walked in, laden with flour, sugar, syrup, coffee, cheese, etc.

After talking for a while others knocked and in came Mr. James Wall, Oscar and Virgie Otis, while Miss Annie and May Cummings, Miss Bertha Pierce, Mrs. J. W. Caudle, Roscoe and Ralph Kirkman, Clarence Farlowe, Roy Hayes representative of New Salem and Bethany churches, leaving on our table and under it oil, vinegar, potatoes, dried apples, soda, baking powder, fresh meat, stockings, pop corn and candy for the children. On package not mentioned was "Mr. J. T. Hayes of Milboro;" water bucket, dipper, sugar: "Mr. J. G. Julian" and "Mr. Redding," also goods.

Mr. Charlie Pugh's children brought things; Mrs. Silmon and Mr. David and Pearl Fogleman. If any are left out, it was not intentional. Since then Bro. J. H. Skeen brought meal and feed, Bro. W. A. Wood, flour, dried apples, pumpkins and beans.

May the Lord bless every one of the members of these churches and all friends that participated in this good work. We are always glad to see our friends come. May the Master cause his servant, the servant of this charge, to be a better man, a greater worker, a better pastor and preacher.

Resolutions of Respect.

In the providence of an allwise Heavenly Father, He saw best to remove from our midst sister Nancy E. Wright, of Fallston, N. C., who departed this life Nov. 17, 1910, aged 66 years. 9 months and 23 days. She united in membership with the Methodist Protestant church in early childhood. She was a member of Friendship church, Fallston, N. C., in which she remained until her death.

Sister Wright was one of Friendship's best and most faithful members; therefore be it resolved, that while we reverently bow in humble submission we deeply mourn the death of our dear sister, and feel that a vacant chair has been left in our church that cannot be filled.

Resolved, that her pure Christian character, her devotion and loyalty to God and her church, brings before us the ideal Christian life, and while she is gone to her beautiful home above, she still lives in the church and in the hearts of those who knew and loved her.

Resolved, that we as a church and Sunday-school will miss her and will ever cherish a fond memory of her.

Resolved, that we the members of Friendship church extend to the bereaved husband and family our deepest sympathies.

Resolved that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the respective families, and church and county papers, for publication.

A PECULIAR MEMORIAL.

The Lord's Supper is a memorial of His death. Its observance is to always be in memory of the sacrifice which He made in behalf of the redemption of sinful people. He suffered death for the sake of saving people from their spiritual death. He gave His life, that many might receive eternal life. No one could have such life without Christ's death. And when believers properly partake of the Supper they remember that truth. At each supper they have a fresh remembrance of the fact that their present life is owing to Christ's sacrifice of his life for them. They are not only to remember his death as a fact, but also its relation to themselves. The memorial feast is a reminder of what Christians owe to Christ. They are to remember anew that they would not be Christians if Christ had not died for them; nor would they be Christians if they had not accepted the salvation which comes through that death. It is not befitting that unsaved people should partake of the memorial Supper. It is for only those who have accepted the Lord who died for sinners. Unsaved ones cannot commemorate a thing which they have refused to accept. It is true that Christ died for them, but they have not acknowledged the relation of that death to themselves, and hence they have not united themselves to Christ. The Supper is to keep its observers in renewed memory of the death which made possible their own deliverance from death, and the reception of life in its place. This memorial is distinctly different from all other memorials. The late Dr. H. E. Weston, of Crozer Theological Seminary, said: "As Christianity is unique, so are its ordinances. What human society, in any age, ever instituted a feast to commemorate the death of its founder? Then celebrate with festivity and rejoicing the birth of their heroes their accession to power, the date of discoveries by which they enrich the world. Sometimes, indeed, the death is observed, but always as an occasion of sorrow, oftentimes with wrath, never with gladness." But Christians observe the memorial of Christ's death with gladness and holy praise.

C. H. Wetherbe.

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

Life is a gift from the hand of God. That is an old-fashioned philosophy, but no reasoning or argument of man has been able to supersede it. Life can have no meaning unless that be true. Driven as we are to seek a rational purpose and motive to our human existence, we find it, if we find it at all, there. We may have difficulty, staggering difficulty, in reconciling some of the facts of our life with our doctrine of it, but unless we hold to our doctrine the whole fabric of our life falls into meaningless confusion.

And if it gives meaning, does not this fact also give dignity and worth to our human life? If we would live the days and weeks and months of this new year in even a dim consciousness of this fact, would we not thereby lift up the actions and purposes and ideals of our life into a new and holier atmosphere? It might be that to the outward seeming our life would not greatly change; for, after all, it is probable that most of us are in the place in life that God would have us fill, and that the commonplace things that we are doing are in his plan for us. But there would come into our common days a new light and glory, just because those days were put in close relation to him. It is that light from the hills of God that alone can lighten and flood every way of life; it is only because man is God's child that anything he does or is may be worth while.

If we could live our life in the consciousness of these facts, it might be that life would have just that added something that often we have dimly longed and sighed for. Honest work faithfully done; the conscientious fulfillment of the common duties and obligations of life; unselfish planning and toil for those whose lives are linked to ours—we are so constituted that all these things give us very real satisfaction and pleasure, but we may have all these and still want something of God and the divine in our life, and until we get that want filled life will be sadly unsatisfactory and incomplete.

A wise man soon learns that the effort to avoid suffering and obtain happiness in life by aloofness, by refusing to mingle with the throng, to take our place in the marching and the fighting, the fearing and the suffering that seem the common lot of our common humanity, is of all possible efforts in life the most foolish and the most hopeless. The weariness of toil and struggle and conflict is soon seen to be as nothing compared with the ache that comes to the heart and life that shuts itself up to the numbing, chilling influences of selfishness and fear. But even the wise man oftentimes learns slowly that the best, the only true, life is that one in which everything stands in definite, clear, positive relation to God; that life in which, in everything that is thought and said and done, man looks up through the earthly and the commonplace clear into the face of God.—Christian Guardian.

THE NORTH DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

The present generation has an idea that while the Civil War was raging all other activities of the country were either suspended or greatly reduced. It imagines that what happened in the South must have taken place in the North to a greater or less extent. That this view is wholly erroneous is shown by Professor Emerson David Fite, of Yale University, in his Social and Industrial Conditions During the Civil War. This is an important contribution to the history of that period, and is almost unique. We have had any amount of military histories and biographies, but little concerning the ordinary events while the young men were away fighting. The fact is that the North made extraordinary strides in every direction while the war was in progress. Although, first and last, nearly two millions of men went from the North to the armed camps, it was only near the close that a million were actually in the field at any one time. Most of these young men enlisted when they were twenty-two years old or less, and the number of those more than twenty-seven was very small, relatively speaking. Thus, although many boys and young men were withdrawn from activities, the older ones remained, and conducted business and the farms on an elaborate scale. The harvests throughout the war were unusually good, and the foreign demand was heavy. The invention of mowers and reapers made the loss of younger men on the farms less notable. Manufacturing was stimulated by the war itself and by the heavy foreign trade.

Education also flourished, for many colleges were founded in this period, and the gifts were unusually heavy to those of older standing. On the whole, the chief trouble in the North seems to have been anxiety over the issue of the conflict, and grief for the dead, rather than for a loss of commercial and industrial activities. It is true that many soldiers left dependent families behind, but to a large extent these were cared for by friends; so that at the close of the conflict the North, with its new potentialities in all directions, was really stronger than ever before, while the South lay industrially, prostrate. The book is primarily for the student of economics, but it will be interesting to any one who wants to get a good historical perspective.—Book News.

—The Young People's Missionary Movement of the United States and Canada will hold seven conferences this summer for education and training. The conferences will be held by the Movement in behalf of Home and Foreign Mission Boards of the two countries. The conferences aim to train missionary leaders, so that in every department of the church there may be those who are qualified to arouse the church to adequate efforts in the evangelization of the world. The conferences this summer will provide institutes and classes to prepare missionary leaders in the Sunday-school as well as in all other forms of church work. One of the conferences will be held at Asheville, N. C., June30-July 9—the only one to be held in the South.

These conferences, on an enormous scale both as to inspiration and in practical benefits are another evidence of the awakthe matter of world-wide evangelization.

"Helping together by prayer" II Cor. 1, 11.)

I like to feel that though on earth
We never meet.
Yet we may hold heart-fellowship
At God's dear feet.
I like to feel in all the work
Thou hast to do,
That I, by lifting hands of prayer
May help thee too.
I like to think that when on high
Results we see.
Perchance thou wilt rejoice that I
Thus prayed for thee!

TALENTS.

By R. J. Craig.

He that uses,
Not abuses,
Talents that the Master gives Is achieving
And receiving
Every moment that he lives.

He that, hearing,
Heeding, fearing,
Proves himself a fruitful soul,
Will be ready,
True and steady,
When the billows round him roll.

He that, bending,
Lifting, lending,
Helps the burdened, feeds the poor
Will fall never,
But stand ever
On a promise that is sure.

A BOY'S COPY BOOK EIGHTEEN HUNDRED YEARS BEFORE CHRIST.

The Egyptian boys and girls back in the days of Abraham had to learn the multiplication table the same as children do nowadays, and doubtless thought it as much of a punishment. Arithmetic is as old as the Pyramids, and evidently was a common study thousands of years ago. In fact, no one knows just when the science was invented, but at any rate little Rameses and Amuramit struggled with fractions and equations just as you do.

A short time ago a copy book for home lessons in arithmetic was unearthed from one of the Egyptian tombs. The papyrus, which is in excellent condition, dates from a period of about eighteen hundred years before Christ, which makes it nearly four thousand years old. It probably is the oldest boy's copy book in the world.

When the boy lived who used it the shepherd kings were reigning in Eygpt, and the patriarch Joseph could not have been long dead. Thebes, Memphis, and Babylon were then the great cities of the world. Athens and Troy had not been built and Rome was undreamed of. The great Hittite empire was in its full glory. How long ago it was! It almost makes one dizzy to think of it.

The papyrus is very valuable; probably you could not buy it for many thousands of dollars. Just who the owner was it is impossible to tell, probably the son of some official about the court, and we can imagine him in his short khita or tunic his sandals, and his armlets, a costume which left many bare spots on his brown skin, poring over his lessons and going to the temple to recite them to the priests, who were the schoolmasters of that ancient day. Poor little Egyptian lad, he did not have the advantages of the youth of to-day; he knew nothing of the Bible, and never went to church in his life.

The places of worship were the great gloomy temples, where costly sacrifices were made to the gods—to Osiris, to Phtha, to Amun, and to Isis, and a large number of other deities they believed in. The ancient Egyptians worshiped a great many gods. They even worshipped animals. Throughout Egypt the ox, the dog, the cat, the ibis, the hawk, and in some places the sheep, the ass, and the goat were held sacred. If any one was unfortunate enough to kill a cat even by accident, he immediately forfeited his life. If a dog chanced to die, the whole family went into mourning, cutting their hair and shaving their eyerows. It was a very strange religion. I am sure you are glad you do not live in old Egypt.

But the copy of this Egyptian boy! The papyrus has a long heading: "Direction how to obtain the knowledge of all dark things," etc. In the old time knowledge was believed to be dark and secret, and men had to work hard to obtain it. The examples given tend to show that the principal operations with entire units and fractions were made by means of addition and multiplication. Substraction and division in their present form do not seem to have been known, but correct results were obtained nevertheless.

There are some equations found in this copy book. It contains calculations of area and calculations of the area of a circle, and its transformation into a square, and, finally, calculations of the cubic measurements of the Pyramids. The examples given are not so dissimilar from those in modern arithmetics. Here is one: "Ten measures of barley are to be divided among ten persons in such a manner that each subsequent person receives one-eighth of a measure less than the one before him." Another reads as follows: "There are seven men; each one has seven cats. Each cat has eaten seven rats; each rat has eaten seven grains of barley. Each grain of barley would, if cultivated, have yielded seven measures of barley. How much barley has been lost that way?"

Can you not imagine the slight, brown-eyed Egyptian lad bending studiously over his book and thinking for all he was worth in those old days when the Pyramids were young? For some reason or another he did not finish his course in arithmetic. Perhaps he grew tired and gave up the search for "dark things." Perhaps he died and the little copy book was laid away besides his mummy, to be exhumed centuries later, when a new era had dawned upon the world which the old dwellers by the Nile knew so well.

Precious, thumb-worn relic, what a story it tells of the past! Its owner has been dead for ages, his mummy is dust in the land of the Pyramids, but the papyrus is none the worse for wear, and serves in a manner to connect that old world with our own day. Looking at the copy book, it does not seem so long ago when the Egyptian boy conned his arithmetic lesson in the days of the shepherd kings. —Fred Myron Colby, in Zion's Herald.

DOING HARD THINGS.

The last things a Christian should wish to escape are those which have difficulty about them. First of all, the spirit of loyalty to Christ should make His disciple court as emphatic a way as possible of showing itself. Besides, obedience to Christ which involves no effort to overcome difficulty and no sacrifice of self is a very cheap kind of obedience.

Doing hard things, whether in the secular life or the spiritual life, is of value to the doer in the development which it gives him the better powers of his nature. Working along the lines of least resistance has no tendency to bring out the true powers of any life, but, on the contrary, by disuse causes them to shrivel. It is a well-known fact that unused faculties decay.

We value our possessions by what we have paid for them. Their cost determines our estimate and appreciation. Things costing nothing or easily replaced are always apt to be taken as matters of course, and little store is set by them. A mother's and father's love is much determined by the world of trouble they must take through years of self-denying ministration and watchful care over their little ones. And the sick or weak child, that has called for the most of those, is apt to be the most tenderly loved.

"There is no royal road to learning" was a great sage's remark to a king. The same is true in every walk and condition of life, and most of all in the development of that knowledge by which man is made wise unto eternal life and by which the graces of the new life are wrought out. Greatness was never developed, in worldly or religious things, except in the presence of difficulties and opposition. Without these the soul does not, first of all, feel its need and realize its dependence upon higher power. And a soul unconscious of its weakness and need is ever a feeble soul, wanting the first element of greatness.

Men come to know and judge of their fellow men by observing the more robust qualities in them, which the hard things bring out. Patience, constancy, steadfastness, courage, endurance, faith, are characteristics hardly possible or conceivable in connection with the doing of only the easy things of life. They belong only where the conditions have demanded them. And, after all, when one has got the knack of the movement, "it is easier to run over a hard packed road than over a bed of mud." A hard thing gives the doer many a time really much more pleasure than something that required no thought, exertion, or discipline of the powers.

The way to learn to do hard things is to do them, and to do cheerfully whatever is a duty. The disciplined soul finds it no task to attempt anything. And so he exclaims with Paul: "We glory in tribulation also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." "They can conquer who believe best they can." —Presbyterian of the South.

COMMUNION SERVICE AT LAHORE

The following account of a communion service held at Lahore, India, contributed to Woman's Work, is interesting because it shows how freely the native Christians give; not from their abundance, but from their penury. The writer of this article, M. J. R. McDonald, says:

It would have gladdened the hearts of readers of Woman's Work to have been with us at the communion service in Hira Mandi Church to-day (November 14, 1909). This is the church for Christians who have come out from the low-caste people, within the last few years. It was organized three years ago, when Dr. Chas. Cuthbert Hall was here.

Last year the people raised Rs. 111, which have just been laid out on putting their building in order. Walls have been repaired, the interior was whitewashed, a new brick floor laid with a fresh grass matting over it, and glass windows were put in. The people are all from the sweeper class and most of them are still earning their bread by the sweep of the broom, though a few have risen to the exalted position of cooks.

Here they were, about seventy of them, seated in rows on the floor, men, women and children, so clean, self-respecting and orderly that it made one's heart throb with pride to look at them. I made my way to the back right-hand corner, where about twenty women were seated, and sat down by them. A year ago, I sincerely deplored my forgetfulness, whenever I found myself there without a well-perfumed handkerchief, but this morning there was not the slightest need for such precaution. The woman in front of me was baptized only yesterday, yet even she and her little girl baby were immaculate.

The service proceeded with as much quiet dignity and order as any I have ever seen. After the usual hymns and prayers, we all stood and reverently repeated the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in Punjabi. Then came the sermon, followed by the simple sacrament, of which all present partook except the children. Our table cloth was a plain cotton sheet; our wine pitcher, a vinegar bottle; our goblets were two brass cups, the covering cloth was a coarse towel, but all were scrupulously clean. At the close of the service, Padri Takhur Dass rose and said that these things had been brought from his own house and were in common use every day; he felt it was not fitting that the Lord's Supper should be dispensed from vessels which were picked up from anywhere, but that every church should have its own vessels, be they ever so cheap, which should be kept sacred to this one use. He thought this church should purchase such a set as it can afford and asked for contributions. Immediately one after another began to call out, "Put me down for a rupee," "Put me down for two rupees," "Put me down for eight annas," and so on until, in about ten minutes, we had twenty-two rupees and eight annas, or $7.50, subscribed, and the promise made to pay in all before the end of November. Besides this, the general collection amounted to $1.07.

When I looked over the congregation and realized that the wealthiest of them was not earning more than five dollars a month while supporting a family of five, and that by far the greater number of them earn about two dollars a month, for themselves and their families, I assure you, a great feeling of hopefulness swept over me and I realized afresh that the religion of Jesus Christ not only gives hope for the soul, but also exalts and inspires the entire being of man.

M. J. R. McDonald.

TEACH ME THY WILL.

Teach me thy blessed will, dear Lorl,
  Reveal thyself to me;
And walking daily in thy steps,
  May I thy glory see.
My feeble footsteps falter, Lord,
  My heart is filled with fear,
And doubts arise on every side,
  And heavy is the cross I bear.
Conform my will with thine, dear Lorl,
  And make my will thine own;
O, lead me in the perfect way
  That leads me to thy throne.
So trusting thee from day to day,
  And loving thy blest will,
Bid these my sorrows flee away,
  This restless heart, be still.

Mrs. Robert C. Stevens.

"When friends are few or far away,
  Sing on, dear heart, sing on!
They rise to sing who kneel to pray—
  Sing on, dear heart, sing on!
  The songs of earth to heaven ascend,
  And with adoring angels blend,
Whose ringing echoes ne'er shall end—
  Sing on, dear heart, sing on!"

A WELL TAUGHT LESSON.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

(1) A well taught Sunday-school lesson is one that exhibits the same general characteristics as the one taught by the same teacher the week before, but yet has a distinction all its own. The fundamental principles, the necessary characteristics, of a properly taught Sunday-school lesson are ever the same, but the application of them differs. If the lesson is always taught in the same way, even tho it is sound as to the pedogogical principles underlying it, it is not properly taught. There must be variety from week to week. The consecrated teacher knows this and wisely governs himself accordingly.

But what are these fundamental principles of a well taught lesson? They are eight as follows:

Review:—No teacher who hopes to succeed permanently will fail to review his pupils from time to time on what they have previously studied. In this way alone will our pupils retain what they have passed over. In this way also the quarterly review will become the most interesting lesson of the quarter, as every harvest ought to be.

Connecting Links:—In some way we should bring to our pupils' attention what transpires between last Sunday's lesson and to-day's. This will give them systematic knowledge and incite their enthusiasm for Bible study.

Incidental Instruction:—In almost every lesson there are matters—geographical, historical, ritualistic, antiquarian, textual—which the average pupil will not have the opportunity to unravel for himself. The teacher may wisely give this information by way of incidental instruction, but will invent other ways also of getting it before them through assignments for home study. This is not to be confounded with the inexcusable lecturing which some teachers regard as a substitute for teaching.

Deduction of Truths:—Every lesson will have its guiding principles for life—its fundamental principles teaching conduct and right-living. By various methods the skillful teacher will develop these and get them clearly fixed in his pupils' minds. Unless this is done, we might just as well study Shakespeare as the Bible in our Sunday-schools.

Application of Truths:—But the value of the lesson is only half attained, if the deduction of the truths is the end of the teaching process. In order to full and complete results, these truths should be applied to modern day Christian life. This too may be done in various ways. It is the real test of the teacher's power. The teacher who succeeds here becomes the shepherd leading his pupils to Christ.

Bringing out the Facts:—The facts of the lesson must be elicited by the question or topic method or both. Do not fall into the bad habit of telling these facts to your class. Have them tell them to you. Insist on having your questions answered and the lessons prepared.

Assignments for Home Study:—In order to insure the home-study of the lesson, an excellent plan is to cultivate the habit by assigning to those who are lax in this regard topics to be studied specially and reported on next Sunday in the class. This will work like a charm, but only a working teacher, one who keeps at least a week ahead of his class, can use it successfully. Try it.

A Method of Approach:—The aim here is to connet the lesson directly with some well-known fact in experience to-day—something to fix attention and engage interest. For relatively immature pupils, an excellent method of approach is through a story. For adults, an often used method is to suggest a comparison between the lesson and some incident, person, or character of the modern world, or a contrast.

It must not be supposed that these items are to be taken up in the order given above I have had no such intention in the order of their treatment. Vary the manner of attaining these and the order of their attainment. Thus will you secure variety and larger success.

A Commendable Variation.

Prof. Lawrence, superintendent of the Elon College Sunday-school, has introduced a variation in the Sunday-school here recently that bids fair to yield results. So we give it to our readers. Instead of the talk on the lesson which is the inherited right of the superintendent, the previous Sunday's lesson is to be reviewed by classes, each of the thirteen classes taking its turn. The classes vary the manner of the review to suit their individual taste. We congratulate Prof. Lawrence and commend the variation to our other superintendents, with the suggestion that they try it, but change to something else before it loses its charm of novelty and so its power to interest more than some other method would.

C. E. TOPIC FOR FEB. 26—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Missions in the South—Isa. 55:1-13.

The Missionary Committee should lead. Have one member of the Committee lead th opening prayer, another read the Scripture, a third give the comment, a fourth announce the hymns, and the chairman make the leader's remarks.

The Leader:—The peculiar problems of the South—such problems as the world never seen before—call for statesmanship of a rare type in arriving at their solution. No other land has ever had such a problem as our negro problem, to mention only one of our problems. These negroes, only one generation removed from slavery, are making commendable progress, but they have a long way to go yet, and in their upward journey their Anglo-Saxon brothers must point the way. How to lead this inferior race to attain its best will require much thought, meditation, prayer, and consecrated effort. This does not call for social equality or manhood suffage, but for industrial efficiency and spiritual devotion. We should strive to do our part in this uplift of a race.

Written Work:—Have essays or talks of not more than five minutes on, "Franklinton Christian College;" "The Christian church in the South aomng the negroes;" "The mountain whites of the South;" "Prohibition and the Southern churches;" "The church and the Battle against disease in the South;" "Home Mission churches of the Southern Christian Convention;" "The Financing of our Home Mission Work."

Questions for Answer in the Meeting:

What is the great commission?

What is the greatest need of the South?

Who are our Southern Home Mission Pastors?

Whence comes the money to support our Home Mission enterprises?

What did our recent Southern Christian Convention do in regard to the Laymen's Missionary Movement?

What are our Sunday-schools doing for Home Missions?

What should our C. E. Societies undertake to do?

What is Franklin Christian College doing for the negroes of our Southern Church?

What is the negro's greatest need?

What elements must a comprehensive solution of the negro problem include? (To several.)

Who is the Southern negro's best friend?

Tell of the negro's progress during the past generation.

What are the peculiar problems of the Mountain whites of the South?

What means are being used for their solution?

How is Home-Mission work affected by the Saloon?

How does disease affect Home Mission work in the South?

What can our Society definitely undertake in the way of Home Mission work? (To the President or the Pastor.)

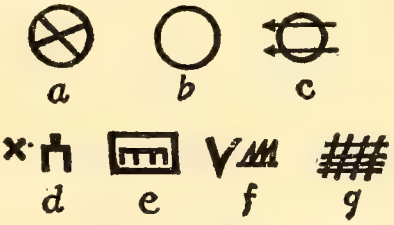
TRAMP CODE OF SIGNALS.

There is a secret code of signals understood by most of the tramps throughout the country. These signals are used to warn or encourage the members of the hobo profession, and are of great value to them as they go about from place to place. If a tramp calls at a house and is fed and well-treated there, he is pretty sure to leave a mark upon the fence or a tree nearby, which is notice to all tramps that follow him that the people who live in that house are kindly disposed toward tramps. You may be sure they will have an opportunity to befriend all the tramps that pass trough the neighborhood after that.

On the other hand, if a tramp suffers a severe rebuff and is driven out of the yard by a fierce bulldog, he will hardly fail to leave a sign in some conspicuous place which will be a warning to others of the fraternity that those who call in their professional hobo capacity may expect nothing but trouble.

Many people have known for a long time that tramps employed such a code of signals, but not until a few weeks ago was it possible to obtain the code. For the benefit of our readers who find the tramp problem a very vexatious one at certain seasons of the year, we have succeeded in obtaining the most important signs in the tramp code, and reproduce them here.



Tramp Signs.

This is the explanation: The figure A means, "You can get food." B means, "No use; requests for food or clothing are refused." C means "Get out of this town as quickly as possible; the people of the vicinity have no use for tramps and make it hot for them whenever they catch one." D means, "Work here; the people at the house where this signal is left will feed tramps, but the tramps are expected to work enough to pay for what they get." E is intended to give notice that there is a zealous watchdog on the premises. F in tramp language means, "Pick a yarn; there's a woman in the house," which signifies that there is a tender-hearted woman to whom a hard-luck story may be told with a fair prospect of securing food or money from her as a result. G means, "Handed over to the police." The people who live at a house that has been thus marked are supposed to get in speedy communication with some sheriff, constable or policeman just as soon as a tramp comes.

The value of knowing these signals rests in the fact that the house-owner or tenant may select the one which he thinks will most effectively protect him from hobo visitors, and chalk or paint it upon a fence post or tree near his house, being assured that the tramps who come that way will understand what it means and act accordingly.—Exchange.

—What do you think of this ? A man who does not work one bit harder than we do and who eats all he wants to eat, came into the our office last Friday and had the presumption to advise us no to eat too much! This was none othen than Rev. W. C. K——tt.

In Memory of Mr. C. H. Buchan.

After a long and painful illness the soul of this good man passed to its reward on Dec. 31, 1910. He was taken to Richmond about eight weeks before for an operation and was thought to be getting on all right until about a week before his death he began to grow weaker and continued to grow worse until the end came. I can truly say he was one of the best men I ever knew. I have known him from my early childhood and he was always ready and willing to lend a helping hand to those in trouble. He never spoke ill of any one. He will be missed in the community, and most of all, will he be missed in his home, which has been so saddened by his absence. There will be a vacant place that no other can fill. He was so unselfish, always doing something for some one else. While Mr. Buchan was not a member of our church it didn't have a warmer friend. His seat was never vacant unless he was providentially hindered and he enjoyed having our pastor visit him just as much as if he had been a member of our church. He was a kind neighbor and it is sad to think that we shall never again on earth see his welcome face. He leaves to mourn his loss a wife and nine children and a host of friends. To the bereaved ones I would say sorrow not as those who have no hopes. Your loss is his gain, for he has gone on before and is reaping his reward now. The world was richer for his presence, and is poorer now that he is gone, another strong link has been forged in the golden chain which binds us to heaven, but let us all hope to meet him again in that home when our life work is ended and our work on earth is done. His body was brought to Henderson Saturday night, and his funeral was held from the Presbyterian Church of which deceased was a loyal and consistent member, at 3:30 o'clock Sunday P. M., Rev. McClure, his pastor, conducting the service.

THE WORKING MAN'S MONEY.

In one of our large cities a laboring man, leaving a large saloon, saw a costly carriage and pair standing in front, occupied by two ladies elegantly attired, conversing with the proprietor.

"Whose establishment is that?" he said to the saloon-keeper as the carriage rolled away.

"It is mine," replied the dealer, proudly. "It cost thirty-five hundred dollars. My wife and daughter can not do without it."

The mechanic bowed his head a moment in deep thought; then, looking up, said with the energy of a man suddenly aroused by some startling flash, "I see it! I see it!"

"See what?" queried the saloon-keeper.

"See where, for years, my wages have gone. I helped pay for that carriage, for those horses and gold-mounted harness, and for the silks and laces for your family. The money that I have earned, that I should have given my wife and children a home of our own, and good clothing, I have spent at your bar. My wages, and the wages of others like me, have gone to support you and your family in luxury. Hereafter my wife and children shall have the benefit of my wages; and, by the help of God, I will never spend another dime for drink."

WASTE.

O the love in the world that is running to waste,
While there's many a heart would be glad of a share!
so high out of reach and so awkwardly placed
Is this love in the world that is running to waste

It is risking one's life to attempt but a taste;
While the doing without is slow death by despair
Of this love in the world that is running to waste,
While there's many a heart would be glad of a share.

PASTORS AND C. E. WORKERS, PLEASE NOTICE.

Rev. C. H. Hubbell, Secretary of Young People's work in the M. P. Church, will spend ten days, beginning March 22, in North Carolina. He comes at the call of the officers of the State C. E. Convention. They want him to spend the time in the way that will most advance the Christian Endeavor work, and think that he could best work among his own people (Methodist Protestants) in the days that precede the State Convention in Burlington (beginning Mar. 31). The matter of arranging an itinerary has been referred to the editor of the Herald, and in this he wishes the help of every pastor that has a church whose young people could be encouraged in the line of Christian Endeavor by a visit from Bro. Hubbell. His time is paid for by the State Convention, but a collection for traveling expenses should be taken wherever Bro. Hubbell speaks.

Bro. Hubbell suggests that at each place visited there be a conference or round table as well as the address.

The following points have already expressed a desire for a visit from Brother Hubbell: Greensboro, Asheboro, Elon College and Asheville.

Let us hear at once, please, from every pastor and C. E. worker in each of these for a meeting, stating the date you want the most. Please send answer at once.

THE [illegible] OF SIN.

Sin is not only an evil thing—it is a [illegible] thing. It may not seem so [illegible] its beginning. In its [illegible] it may [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] view. It [illegible] of the [illegible] ance. What it at length reveals itself, it is found to be a dreadful thing.

It matters [illegible] what kind of sin it may be. [illegible] what particular desire or appetite it may appeal to. There is but one spirit of all sin, and that spirit is exactly the same. The Scriptures use but one strong language in describing it.

[illegible] with [illegible] words [illegible] ing [illegible] replies. Into your people put all the dreadful things you can imagine, and you may take this picture as a symbol of the end to which sin leads.

[illegible] ways of sin and [illegible] to [illegible] less pit. [illegible] Every [illegible] leads thither.

Sin is [illegible] but also in [illegible] to hold its victims and [illegible] holds them in bondage and make them think they are free men. They think they could stop if they tried, whereas no sinner has ever yet escaped the thraldom of sin without divine assistance.

If it were not for the divine [illegible] given to the world in Christ, there would be no rift in the awful cloud of sin that hangs over our world. The terribly destructive evil of sin and its miserably [illegible] the grace of God in sending into our sin-cursed world a life and a light and a salvation such as appeared in Jesus Christ. Where sin did abound, grace did much more abound. When we contemplate sin, our hearts grow heavy and sad. When we think of Christ's salvation, our hearts grow light and joyful.

[illegible] that such [illegible] remains the fear that [illegible] of [illegible] and delusion will [illegible] this [illegible] and be saved.

Let Christ be preached and personally accepted as a perfect Savior from the [illegible] and sin and its ruinous consequences.

—[illegible] has gotten out an attractive [illegible] for the use of Methodist Protestant Sunday-schools this year. [illegible] Sunday-schools generally will avail themselves of this service in preparing for their Easter exercises. It [illegible] cost a good deal to have it prepared and printed, but it is free to [illegible] schools who will take a collection of free-will offerings for the Board of Home [illegible], one of the most important [illegible] of our church. The Board especially [illegible] as many new for its work. Let [illegible] a good year for home mission [illegible] and offerings. If you [illegible] Rev. [illegible], West Lafayette, O., telling him [illegible] and asking him how large your [illegible] is so that he will know how many copies to send you.

—The "Vance Methodist Protestant" has appeared. It is an eight-page monthly, devoted to the interests of the Methodist Protestant Church in Vance County. It is issued from Henderson, at the low price of 50cts. a year. Bros. We hope their people will support them in this endeavor and that the new paper may live and do its work.

TING GENERATION.

"One generation shall praise thy name to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts.—Psalm 145: 2."

The voice of God in His Word calls our minds from passing and changing phenomena to things that are unchanging and pass not away. Every generation has two characters; one as receiving from its predecessors the tidings of the divine power and grace, and another as transmitting the same tidings to its successor with increase.

I. The receiving generation. The ages can hand down nothing which did not come to them from without; the earliest was a receiving generation.

1. All the ages of time are, in their increasing flow, recipients of parcels and fragments of one great manifestation of God in the glory of His name, His works, and His redeeming grace. The earliest race heard of His first great disclosure of Himself in creation; long ages had gradually prepared the scene for the last creature in the image of his Creator. The manifestation of God in His dealing with a sinful race, take up the story, and are the threads that bind the leaves of history into one record, becoming as it grows, more luminous. There have been great critical periods in this general evolution of the majesty of God's revelation, and we inherit the last and best tradition. When Pentecost was fully come, time reached its fullness, time received its last birth from eternity. We throw all this into our Psalm, and then how it dialates and throbs and expands, rejoicing in the interpretation it waited for. Its majesty—is the triune glory of God; its works are redemption; its praises the Pentecostal Hymn; its proclamation the Gospel; its mercy over all His works redemption for every creature; its kingdom the kingdom that cannot bemoved. All this we have received from our ancestors. To us as a Methodist Protestant people the past generations have bequeathed a special heritage. We have an organization that has for its end the manifestation of God to all nations as the God of redemption. We have had a commission to proclaim distinctly the grace that is over all his works; to teach men how to receive the personal salvation and utter the personal testimony that glows through this ancient hymn to make emphatic some points of great doctrinal importance on which this testimony is based; and to fight the fight of faith against every form if infidelity without any unfaithfulness within, which would exclude God from His universe.

2. Look at the obligation the reception involves. The first obligation is to glorify God for the privilege received. Our duty is to make divine revelation the theme of our constant rejoicing. The history of the past is the material of the worship of the present. Every generation has a new song. The first Christian generation set the example on the forenoon of Pentecost. The note is always "Our fathers have declared unto us." How much reason have we to magnify the God of our fathers. But all this we cannot do unless we use these privileges aright.

The God of our fathers is our God. There was no work wrought in their day which is not wrought now. Say not "the former times were better than these," and let us not lose ourselves in this generation, for all this is an individual matter. "I will sing aloud to the Lord my strength."

II. The transmitting generation. Let us turn our thoughts to the future, the receiving generation is the transmitter also. Each is a link in the golden chain that eternity let down to time and which from time is ascending to eternity again.

1. It has pleased God to make every generation a trustee for the generation to come. Each generation impresses its own influence for good or evil on what it received and transmits it to the generation following with the impress if its own character. The impress each age stamps upon its own Christianity is of various kinds, for good or evil. The result of all influence of all generations is on our present religion. There is also a responsibility resting on each generation.

2. What is our duty as transmitters of this heritage? Our first obligation is to transmit undefiled the pure deposit of truth. The Head of the Church looks to us that we hand down His religion to our children unadulterated by the errors of the day. God holds us responsible that the Christian faith descends from us as good as we received it. The lax spirit of the age must be resisted. The sacred oracles are the great trust put into our hands to hold, and to transmit; this trust enfolds all other trusts. As a religious community we are bound to hand down our ancient, cherished institutions, and with this it is our duty to transmit our old literature, our missionary spirit, and our aim to penetrate every hole and corner of the land with which our testimonies; think of our fathers as Methodist Protestants and then look at ourselves as such. But is it enough that we simply transmit what we have received? Every age is expected to improve upon its tradition in some respects, and we must cherish the sacred ambition of doing what we can to improve upon our father's models. You are one by one concerned; nor is there any generation now living which does not look through your individual eyes, think in your minds, propose in your hearts, and work with your hands. Therefore we all, from the venerable few who connect us with a past generation down to the youngest convert who represents the generation which will carry on our labors when we are gone, must take a new the pledge of devotion to our work. Each feeling that he bears in himself, whether young or old, the burden of the responsibility of the present days. Each one must ask himself these two questions. Do I protest against tendencies I know to be wrong? Is my practice right? Let us for a moment raise our minds from this our generation to the eternal and steadfast future. The generation of witnesses and heralds and worshippers shall have exhausted their long tradition. Their generations of preaching shall cease eternally, their generation of praise shall close into one note for the end of time, and begin again with the infinite melody of eternal ages. The old proclamation of our Lord shall be done away; but there shall be a new song. May we be found in that eternal, and each add his strain to the universal harmony which will forever ascend to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit.

Application. Do you think, fellow Christians, that the church in our day has that clear consciousness that the early church had that she is here to transmit, yes, to give to the world, to bless the world, to help the world? Look into your own heart. What is your first thought about your church? Is it the outgo of service and of blessing, or of the income of money?

Is it of those whom it can heal, and cheer and make strong or of those who can make it strong? Do we maintain it just for ourselves and children, or do we in a large way, avail ourselves of its privileges in order that through us, and it, an ever increasing multitude may be blessed? It seems to me that right here is a pregnant secret of the Church's weakness. She has lost, to a large degree, the consciousness of her mission. She has come to exist for herself. She is looking to the world to bless her with its wealth instead of descending from her noble hight to bless the world with that which is better than silver and gold. The remaining thought is that of the individual Christian's willingness to give whatever he has to give, whatever that may be—silver and gold if he has it, social influence, if he has it, or lacking these and more distinguished endowments, the humblest gifts and graces, capacity for the lowliest service. Such as I have give I thee. Either consciously or unconsciously we are leaving our impress, both individually and collectively.

Speak the truth in love.

SUPPOSE.

Suppose.

Suppose someone were to offer me a thousand dollars for every soul that I might earnestly try to lead to Christ, would I endeavor to lead any more souls to Him than I am endeavoring to do now? Is it possible that I would attempt to do for money, even at the risk of blunders or ridicle, what I hesitate or shrink from doing now in obedience to God's command? Is my love of money stronger than my love of God or of souls? How feeble then my love of God! Perhaps this explains why I am nit a soul-winner.

Suppose.

Suppose I were to see a blind man unknowingly approaching the brink of a high precipice, and that I were to sit by without concern or any effort to warn or save him from certan death, would I not be as guilty of his death in God's sight as though I had murdered him outright? The death of the body, which might have been (but was not) prevented, is a terrible thing, but how about the preventable death of a human soul—perchance of many souls—for which God may hold me responible? If my murder of another's body by neglect is an unspeakable crime, what shall be said of my murder by neglect of another's soul?

Suppose.

Suppose that "when the roll is called up yonder," I am there myself, but that all through the eternal ages I am unable to find a single person who is there because of my having led him to Crrist—how much will heaven mean to me?

Suppose.

Suppose that as an employee I were spasmodic in the kind of service I rendered—zealous one week, lukewarm the second, and utterly indifferent the third; then zealous, and lukewarm and indifferent again, and so on—how long would my employer stand such service as that? But is not this the kind of soul-winning service I am giving God? Or it may be not even as good as this. If God's love for me were to be as spasmodically manifested as my love for Him, how would I fare?

Suppose.

Suppose that when the final reckoning comes, I should be found, not with ten talents, or even five, but with only one, and that one "hid in the earth" (Matt. 25: 14-30)—what then? Has not the soul-winning talent which God has given me fallen so into disuse that I even doubt its existence? And therefore have I not already "hid it in the earth?" Must I not bewars lest the fate of the unprofitable servant be my fate?

Suppose.

Suppose I were to be asked how many persons I had persistently tried to win to Christ during the past month, or even the past year, what would my answer be? How many have I spoken to? How many have I on my prayer list now? If I am not interested enough in the salvation of others even to have a daily prayer list, is it any wonder that I am not a soul-winner?

Suppose.

Suppose that every member of the church to which I belong were to dedicate himself or herself today to a life of full surrender to the will of God according to His Word (Rom. 12: 1, 2), and were to become henceforth a soul-winner as exemplified in the life of Paul (1 Cor. 9: 20-22), would not such a revival follow as this church and community have never seen? Am I not willing to say that by His grace I will give myself from this day forward to the definite business of saving the lost, that I will have a daily prayer list and will do what I can under the guidance of the Holy Spirit to help accomplish the supreme work for which my Lord and Master came into the world?

Yea, Lord, I gladly respond to Thy call (Mark 1: 17), and will do what I can from this day forward to help win the unsaved to Thee.

Signed .....

THE GREAT COMMISSION PRAYER LEAGUE.

The Great Commission Prayer League is a movement of prayer, among Christians of all denominations, for a world-wide revival revival. (John 4: 35; Luke 10: 2; Mark 16: 15).

There are no fees or dues of any kind.

Those into whose hand this leaflet falls may have their names enrolled if they so desire, or may request prayer for themselves or their unsaved friends.

All names enrolled as members will constitute a Special Prayer List, for whose equipment as soul-winners special prayer will be offered daily.

HOW TO START A WORLD-WIDE REVIVAL.

The best way to help start a world-wide revival, is—

1. By spending more time in the earnest and prayerful study of God's Word.

2. By seeking and obtaining the cleansing of the heart and the baptism of the Spirit, and this will be accompanied by the Spirit's passion for the salvation of the unsaved.

3. By making out a prayer list, as the Holy Spirit may lead, and praying definitely each day for the salvation of each whose name is written thereon.

4. By placing this and similar leaflets in the hands of your pastor and other workers, and asking them to join you in prayer and effort for the unsaved. (Could you not form a local Prayer Circle for this purpose?)

4. By sending this leaflet by mail to your friends in other places and calling their special attention to it. "By all means save some."

WHY NOT?

1. Become an intercessory Christian. Surely you can do this much—pray definitely and earnestly for the salvation of others. If you are not interested to at least this extent, you are in a deplorable state and need praying for yourself.

2. Become a soul-winner for life. You can do it, no matter what your "secular occupation." The latter may be used to "pay expenses"—(just as tent making was used in Paul's case). No other investment of time and effort will pay as large dividends all through eternity.

3. Obtain the soul-winner's qualifications. These may be easily possessed by any true Christian, no matter how humble in station or how limited in social or intellectual attainments. They are simply these: A heart cleansed and filled with the Holy Spirit, and an outward life that is entirely consistent and through which flows the convicting and drawing power of the Spirit. Then use the Word and go to work, as the Spirit may lead.

4. Begin now! Souls are perishing on every hand—do you realize this? Don't wait. A poor stammering Christian with Christ in his heart is of infinitely greater service to God, no matter how many blunders he makes, than the greatest pulpit orator that ever lived, without Christ.

In the actual work of soul-winning it is well to keep the following things in mind:

Be constantly in the spirit of prayer.

Approach the unsaved on common ground.

Use godly tact and wisdom.

Never argue or lose self-control.

Answer objections with Scripture if possible.

Avoid denominational differences.

Don't try to force your own views.

With love in your heart, give the Word and the Spirit the full right of way.

Be in earnest. The salvation of an immortal soul is at stake. Those who were intimately acquainted with D. L. Moody say that he was the most desperately in earnest man they ever knew.

Press for and expect an immediate decision. You may never have an opportunity to deal again with the one with whom you are now dealing; and, moreover, tomorrow may be for him too late.

Special Texts for Special Cases.

The following objections are among those most frequently met in dealing with the unsaved. The texts for Scripture indicated, as well as similar passages, may be used in such cases.

"Not today." 6. "Some other time." 2 Cor. 6: 2; Heb. 3: 5; Heb. 5: 15.

"Don't feel like it." Deut. 3: 3; Acts 4: 12; Acts 17: 30 and 31.

"Am too great a sinner." Isa. 1: 18; Matt. 9: 13; 1 Tim. 1: 15.

"Am good enough now," or "Am satisfied with my present experience." Jas. 2: 10; Rom. 6: 2; John 3: 3.

"Too many hypocrites in the church." Rom. 14: 12; 2 Cor. 5: 10.

"Couldn't hold out." I Cor. 10: 13; 2 Tim. 1: 12; 1 Pet. 1: 5; Jude 24.

It is said that a minister once discovered that he saw rows of beautiful diadems studded with precious jewels. "Is that big one for me?" said he, remembering that there had been many conversions in his church. "No, no, sir," the angel said, "that one is for the poor old deaf man who sat in the corner by your pulpit stairs and plead with God for souls in the congregation while you preached to them." —From "God's Plan for Soul-Winning."

We are told that those who go forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them. (Psa. 126:6.) Will those also come rejoicing who have no sheaves to bring?

This Leaflet.

Over 20,000 copies of the third edition of this leaflet were used by the Layman's Evangelistic Council of Chicago to help inaugurate the Chapman-Alexander campaign of October–November, 1910.

About 30,000 copies were distributed at the national convention of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) at Topeka, Kan., October, 1910.

Thousands of copies were used at Montrose, Pa., and other Bible conferences during the summer, and other thousands have been used since in various evangelistic campaigns throughout the country.

Tens of thousands of copies have gone into the hands of Christians everywhere. Will you, too, not help to pass the leaflet on, and report to us any definite results following its distribution?

The message of the leaflet has been published in full in "The Christian," of London, England, as well as in other papers of Great Britain and America, and is now being translated and circulated in several foreign countries. A MANCHURIAN IDEA.

Out in Kyodo, Manchuria, a great railroad tunnel is being built on the Antung-Mukden line. Here, where the tides of war ran red during the Russo-Japanese war, a peaceful army of Japanese laborers, three thousand strong, works away under the charge of an officer and several subalterns. Both the officer and his wife are Japanese Christians; so are the subalterns, and many of the laborers; and when they were sent to this new post they made a decision which shows what sort of Christians they were.

They needed houses. They needed a church. They needed a school. But their leaders saw that of the three the church was the most important. So they decided that before their own houses went up, the church must first be built. They went to work like beavers, and soon a neat little church, very plain and bare, but adequate for their needs, was completed. Then they built their own dwellings; and as for the school, they are holding that in the church on week days. Incidentally, the men in charge of the whole tunnel and railway work say that Kyodo is the quietest and best behaved town along the new line, and that the laborers there work better than anywhere else, fairly astonishing the managers by their progress.

It might be thought that men who built a church for themselves before taking care of their own need of shelter might be fanatical; but this last is what they are not. Men who work and pray are the best workers the world knows; men who fight as they pray are the best fighters. Manchuria is only repeating all the old experience of other lands, after all.—New Guide.

A fire last week destroyed the Joseph Whitlow, a fireman, was killed by a falling wall. The property loss will be $20,000 or more, half of which is insurance.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Tabernacle Ct.

Notice to Officials.—The 2nd quarterly conference is called to meet on Saturday before the 3rd Sunday in March, at 11 A. M., in Julian Church, and I insist that all the brethren and sisters who are members of the conference be present, provided you are not sick, or want to go to the city.

Our work is in fairly good condition; room for improvement in many respects, more of the members of the different churches when not sick ought to attend church, and not go visiting on their preaching day; have seen and heard much of this in all of the communities where I have traveled for several years.

Have filled all appointemnts since conference, and have had very good attendance when the weather was favorable. Have made several visits and find the people like to be called on by the pastor, and actually some of those visited will come to church a time or two after the visit, and some fail to come at all, except on Sunday of the special meeting, and if the pastor does not preach that day they grumble. Brother, sister, come out to church and help to make larger congregations and encourage both pastor and people, and when our special meetings come you will not feel like a stranger at church.

The Sunday-schools are doing very well except in attendance, and the superintendent and teachers as well as the pastor are trying to increase the attendance; hope to see results

Have had some sickness on the Ct. Mrs. Bettie Whitely, Mrs. Julius Coble, Mrs. John Coble, Mrs. Horney, of Tabernacle church, and Miss Lizzie Harden and Jesse Allred of Julian church, and Mrs. John and Mrs. Jule Sharp and Mr. Witty of Moriah church; all of these are better but Mrs. Jule Sharp and Mrs. Julius Coble when last heard from, and we hope they are improving. Mr. J. A. Sharp is improving since being at the hospital.

Have had several of my people to remember us in little donations, such as potatoes, canned fruit, butter, apples,, pears, turnips, peaches, a book, handkerchiefs and a necktie; for all of these we are thankful; but I do not publish the names of the donors, for some object, and for that reason I give no names.

The finance on the circuit is coming up rather slowly so far; but I am expecting better work by the stewards from now on, especially on the general interests.

Hope to have good reports from all at our next quarterly conference. Come one and all.

Would be glad to see reports in Herald more frequently from our local reporters.

Our rally conducted by W. E. Swain, D. D., at Friendship was a success indeed. Bro. Swain's series of sermons on practical Christianity was an eye-opener and soul-stirring. And I feel sure that the effects of this meeting will be seen in coming years. I am sure that Fallston has never before enjoyed such a feast of good things. Religion is not an impulse but a life. It is only to be regretted that all in the district could not attend.

Our special meeting at Lawndale will begin on Thursday night before 1st Sunday in April. Rev. E. G. Lowdermilk is the help.

W. D. Reed.

Our pastor was with last Sunday and filled his regular appointment, and in his usual good spirited way delivered an excellent sermon, using as a text Prov. 27: 19. As the day was very beautiful, quite a large congregation was present and I am sure the sermon was enjoyed by all. It was right encouraging to us to see so many of our members that had been absent so long to come out once more; we do hope they will come more often in the future than in the past.

The Secretary of Greenville County S. S., W. M. Powell, was with us last Sunday at 10:30 o'clock and gave quite a nice and interesting talk on Sunday-school. His talk was highly spoken of and enjoyed by all.

Our Sunday school has been working on through the winter. May God bless our Sunday school, for it points us to such a high standard in life.

There has been right much sickness and one death in our community for the past month.

Yours in Christ,

Nannie Massey.

Chatham Circuit.

Death again visited our community and claimed for its own Mrs. Elizabeth Siler, wife of J. R. Siler. She was born Sept. 24th, 1848; died Feb. 24, 1911. She professed faith in Christ Jesus in early girlhood and immediately joined Piney Grove Methodist Protestant Church of which she was a faithful member until the blessed Master said, "It is enough, come up higher." She was laid to rest in Piney Grove cemetery the 25 by six of her nephews, Messrs. William and James Vestal, Charlie, Franklin and Will Smith and James Cooper. As they bore the corpse down the aisle the choir sang softly, Nearer, My God, to Thee, after which the funeral services were conducted by her favorite pastor, Rev. W. C. Kennett, in his soul-stirring way. He read for the scripture lesson a part of the 14th chapter of St. John and then pointed out to the bereaved husband and entire congregation many comforting thoughts.

She was married to John R. Siler in 1865 and all through the 46 years of their married life it was one endless day of sunshine. They never had any children of their own but raised a niece and nephew who were still with her at her death. She was always as devoted to them as if they had been her very own. She leaves a heart-broken husband, one brother and sister, three half brothers and one half sister, a host of relatives and many friends to mourn her departure, but we do not mourn as those who have no hope; for we feel confident our loss is her eternal gain.

"Aunt Liz," as she was called by almost everyone, will be greatly missed, for she was always ready and willing to do what she could for all and most especially would she visit the sick far and near.

She was confined to her bed but a short while, but suffered untold pain. Everything that loving hands could do was done but to no avail. She bore her suffering with great patience.

Uncle Jack, weep not, for thy dear companion, for in a short while we shall meet her again around God's white throne where there will be no sad partings and where sickness and death never come. What a meeting that will be! May we all be prepared to meet her.

LaGrange.

Dear Herald:—As you have heard nothing from us for some time I will write to let you know that we are still breathing in eastern Carolina.

Some time ago the people of LaGrange gave the pastor a pounding consisting of many useful articles.

I spent a month at Matthews, my old home town, from 3rd Sunday in Jan. till 3rd Sunday in Feb. While there I met the new pastor on Mecklenburg Ciriuit, Rev. J. W. Self. The work seems to be moving off nicely under his care.

LaGrange charge is doing very well. Our first quarterly conference was held at Hickory Grove Saturday night, Feb. 25th. We had preaching yesterday at Hickory Grove. The church there has just bought a new supply of song books.

We will resume the prayer meeting work in LaGrange this week. We suspended this work while I was away.

Wishing all the pastors and churches success, I remain,

Very sincerely,
J. H. Abernathy.

One of our fine young men was converted at his boarding place the last of the week. We will begin a series of cottage meetings this Wednesday. We feel the need of a revival.

There were 136 in the main school, 58 at Woodfin Hill and 36 at Woolsey Hall. Woolsey Hall will give a cake and candy sale next week for the organ fund.

A St. Patrick's Social is the next affair on by our Ladies' Aid.

Our pastor filled his regular apppointment here Sunday morning, preached a very good and interesting sermon to a good and attentive congregation.

Mrs. Taylor made many friends here with us; glad to have her in our midst. Sunday was communion day with us; a good many partook of it. Bro. Taylor left appointment for the first Sunday evening as he couldn't be with us the second Sunday.

Mr. R. M. Shearin was born the 14th of Sept., 1846, and departed this life here Feb. 7, 1991. His sickness continued only 10 days. He bore his suffering patiently. He had pneumonia. He said he didn't fear dying and that we had done what we could for him. It was hard to give up Uncle Ransom, though the Lord knows best in all things. The Lord gives and the Lord takes away, so blessed be the name of the Lord.

He was a member of the Baptist church. He came from near Weldon one night up to Hawkins Chapel to conduct prayer-meeting; it was about eight or nine miles. He was a kind and loving neighbor. He will be badly missed. He was a soldier in the war. He was married to Mandy Jones, April 1, 1868. To this union was born one child. Apr. 6, 1871, he married Miss Laura Dickens; to this union were born four children.

He was buried near his home in the family burying ground. Mr. Lucas conducted the burial service.

The first quarterly conference appointed Rev. Eli. H. Mullis to preach at Moriah Church, and he is my father, and I love to hear my father preach. I am ten years old, but I take my sister Marcie, little Clarence and go to S. S. My father went to Mt. Holly last Saturday and they took him to the first Baptist church to preach and had a good meeting and they said if he would come to them they would give him a good church to preach in, but he would not go. He is an M. P. member. I hope the Lord will bless my father's preaching and his little boy, Raymond.

Dear Herald:—We had a very destructive fire in LaGrange Sunday night. Nearly all of one block was destroyed. A number of stores, offices, warehouses and one bank and one hotel were destroyed. The water supply was exhausted and the fire company could not extinguish the flames. Coals fell over town like hail, and several buildings began to burn from coals falling on roof. Our church and the Baptist church caught, but were put out before any serious damage was done. This shows how unwise to cover a church or any other building with a wooden roof. Metal of some kind ought to be used, or slate, or something that will not burn.

The damage to the burned district is heavy to owners but partly covered by insurance.

Flint Hill, Uwharrie Ct.

Dear Herald:—We had the pleasure of hearing our new pastor, Bro. Trogdon, last Sunday for the first time; he had been once before, but the weather was so bad that there were but few out to hear him.

He gave a very instructive sermon from Matt. 21: 27, to a very attentive congregation. We think we will like our pastor and hope he may, with the co-operation of the church do a good work on this circuit this year. He seems to be a man full of the Holy Spirit, able to do what the Lord wants him to do.

Our S. S. is very good, but not what it could and should be. Attendance very small last Sunday on account of fire in the community. Mr. B. N. Modlin's dwelling was burned to the ground, but very little property saved. A large crowd came for preaching.

We were pleased to see a report from our old pastor, Mr. Plyler. Glad to know he is getting along so well on his new circuit. Mr. Plyler is a good man who served us well; we always enjoyed his coming to our home so much. We ask him through the Herald to visit us again; come and see how we are getting along at Flint Hill.

With best wishes to Herald readers, I close

Since our last report, Bro. Casto has left us and Bro. A. H. Bryans has taken his place. We are very glad to have Bro. Bryans, while we were sorry to give Bro. Casto up. We trust both fields have been supplied as He that doeth all things well would have them. Our new pastor has been in our home and we feel highly pleased both with him and also his sermons; they have been excellent indeed. He also helps out in the music, both vocal and instrumental. We are using him in many ways and believe he will hold out faithfully.

We found the wife very pleasant and entertaining also.

We hope to have the interior of our church made more attractive this year and are glad to say that the barn is occupied by Maggie (the pastor's horse) and feed for her.

Mrs. D. R. Williams of Democrat is at home, spending some time with he mother and sister, who are very sick. Mrs. Williams is looking better since she has been living in the mountains.

Rev. J. D. Williams was down from Burlington on a business trip this week. He and Rev. Homer Casto spent the day around C. R. S.

Rev. Elmer W. Hoenshel of Dayton, Va., gave quite an interesting lecture at C. R. S. Feb. 20th. His subject was The Passion Play. We would say to those who were not there, you missed a treat.

I close with best wishes to all the Herald readers.

The Clark Chapel people are still in progress. The Sunday school is moving on nicely. We had 50 present Feb. 26.

In the afternoon Rev. D. R. Proffitt, of the M. E. Weaverville Circuit, preached for us. His text was found in Mark 10: 45: "For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and give his life a ransom for many." This was very good and helpful. His being with us was appreciated by a large and attentive congregation.

Rev. Mr. Williams filled his appointment the fifth Sunday in January at this place.

We are not having any Sunday school during the winter season. I am sorry to say, but think we will open up in the spring.

There is much sickness in this community and several deaths have occurred. Among those dead are Mr. J. L. Rich, of Egg Bend, Mr. Thomas Hauser of Shocks, N. C.

The resolutions in relation to the case of the Wills Brothers to erect a Philathea Class Room as an addition to Grace Church (which room has been built and is now in use, and a splendid room it is) were presented to and approved by the quarterly conference:

Resolved, That we tender our sincere thanks to the Messrs. Wills for their generous offer.

Resolved further, that we count this choice way of friends to give members whose devotion and loyalty to every interest of the church, and especially to those whose memory they love and cherish, should move them to erect, at their own expense, enlarged facilities for the development and training of the young men and women in our Sunday school work.

More examples of consecrated, intelligent Christian women—devoted members of Grace Church, could not be established. We rejoice that the good spirit in the one exemplified in the lives of Mrs. R. H. Wills and Miss Bettie Norman is to be perpetuated in the lives of young men and young women who go out from the Church and Sunday school they loved so much. We rejoice also that the noble sons and nephews who honored them while living, are now honoring their memory as well as their Church in the establishment of a fund from which Grace Church will be substantially benefited.

Resolved further, that a copy of these resolutions be furnished to each of the brothers.

Matthews Chapel, Greenville Ct.

We are glad to have Bro. Ashburn for our pastor this year, and he will be welcomed. He will fill the appointment the third Sunday morning. He always has a good congregation for us, and those who fail to come out do not know what they are missing. I hope as spring opens up the people will come out and show by their presence that they appreciate their pastor.

We hope to re-organize Sunday school the third Sunday in March.

Bro. Strain will not have the pleasure of being our president. Bro. Strain, while [illegible] We were always glad to have him come around, and our pastor. [illegible] the 30th has been appointed as Children's Day. We will have all our children present, and I am very sorry indeed we will not have our pastor on that day, as our pastor will have to fill his regular appointment at Dabney on that day. However, I hope as many of our members as possible will attend services at other churches, for it is very important that [illegible] should be represented. There is [illegible] in our community now. Miss E. Sanders, who has returned from the Memorial Hospital, Richmond, Va., where she went for treatment. We hope her health will be restored. [illegible] Miss Annie Peterson, who has been very sick for some time. We hope to remember [illegible]

With best wishes to the "Herald."

Dear Editor:—We are glad that our Lord is not dead at our church. [illegible] Pleasant last Saturday; preaching at 11 o'clock with good attendance, but not all of the members interested in conference. But the business was transacted in a spirit of love. Preaching at 7. I preached at Mt. Pleasant and Flat Hill at three; [illegible] Sunday school at Mt. Pleasant, and a [illegible] at Flat Hill. I do not know how many, but am sorry to say that some were kept away on account of fire that destroyed a dwelling house nearby.

Dear reader, pray for us. I have made my second round and I feel much encouraged because I feel that cord of divine love which the world can't break is binding pastor and people together. I feel that there are talents buried in this field of labor as well as elsewhere that are precious in the sight of our dear Lord than all the diamonds in the bottom of the deep, deep sea. Dear reader, won't you pray that the laborers in this field may be skilled by the divine Spirit that they may dig out the souls from under the covering of sin that they may be set as a diadem in a crown before this year ends. I never met a kinder people than this dear people and I feel like I will not be able to pay them this year for the hospitality they have already shown me; and pray don't forget my dear ones at home. Pray for them that they may be blessed of their creator to care for them with. I certainly appreciate the hearty co-operation of our sister churches. It seems that there is a spirit of unity and where there is unity there is strength. Dear brothers, let us go hand in hand looking to Jesus as our captain and the sword of faith for our weapon and believe the victory will be ours. And I believe that our dear Lord will give us not only a crown of life and a home in heaven with our loved ones for our reward. Praying God's blessing on all people, I am yours truly, for Christ,

Joel Trogdon.

I am sorry to say that I have not been preaching in three years. Three years ago last April I heard Bro. D. A. Highfill preach a very able sermon. I have been afflicted with heart trouble ever since. It does me a great deal of good to read the Herald and hear from the older ministers, such as J. H. Stowe, G. L. Reynolds and D. A. Highfill and others that I will not mention. I think the people all like Bro. Highfill as a preacher and I am sure I like him as a visitor. I hope he will call to see us often. This is the first time I ever wrote anything for our paper.

Dear readers, an interest in your prayers. I beg that we may meet beyond the grave.

Mrs. B. F. Green.

Present at Sunday school last Sunday,

241; collection, $4.16. We were glad to have a number of visitors with us.

Good congregations at both preaching services. A. M., the pastor spoke on "The Greatest Pearl," and at night service on "What is Man?" Both sermons were highly spoken of by many.

On account of the books, "Training for Service," not arriving, the Bible study class did not meet last Wednesday night, but will hold its first meeting tonight. We expect to have a large class.

Dr. W. S. Rankin, Sec. of the State Board of Health, spoke to a large audience at the Presbyterian church last night on the subject of "Health and Sanitation." His address was highly enjoyed.

Our sick are better at this writing, we are glad to say.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

On last Sunday the weather with us was ideal. Although every pulpit in Graham was occupied and with some there were special services, our congregations were as full as usual, having with us some new faces.

Graham Sunday-school organized Baraca and Philathea classes on last Sunday. Splendid work and results are expected from these classes.

Sunday school attendance at Graham was 67 and at Haw River, 70.

On Tuesday of this week we laid to rest in the Haw River cemetery the body of Sister Mary Bason, who died the day before. She was about 75 years old and had since childhood been a faithful member of the Christian Church. She leaves no children, but Bro. Jno. Bason, who is our faithful secretary of the Haw River Sunday-school, and his two sisters are her grandchildren. Sister Bason was a great suffer before she died.

Mrs. Hughes, the wife of the postmaster at Graham, has recently been taken to Asheville for her health. The prayers of godly people are asked that the health of this good woman be restored and that she may soon return to her husband and two dear little children.

Midway, Haw River Ct.

Bro. Bauer filled his regular appointment at this place last Sunday. He preached an able sermon from the text, Ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you. There was a large congregation out to hear him and I think all enjoyed his sermon. I don't think I ever heard a sermon complimented more. Bro. Bauer always comes with something good for us. Wish so much we could have him with us more than once a month. It seems so long from one appointment to the next.

Our Sunday school has gone into winter quarters, but spring will soon be here and we hope to open with more interest than ever, for we feel there ought to be more interest manifested in the Sunday-school work.

On last Sunday morning the death angel visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Dabbs and took from them little Minnie Stroup, age one year and one month. The funeral service was conducted on Monday afternoon by the pastor, after which the little body was laid to rest in Midway cemetery. Our sympathy goes out to the bereaved family.

Note of Thanks.

Dear Herald:—Will you kindly deliver this note of thanks to the following friends who joined me in celebrating my birthday on Feb. 22nd: Mesdames Welch, Moffitt, Burgess, Kivett, Picket, "M. S.," Mrs. Wilson, Miss Laud Dixie, High Point. Greensboro: Mds. Hunter, Harris, Stroup, Smith, Shields and Chas. Mendenhall, Misses McCulloch and Staley, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Hadley, Mr. and Mrs. B. W. Terrell and little Rea and "Lake" Worrell. Pelham: Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Hines with a fine photo of himself, Mrs. Hines, Miss Lee and Mrs. Willis Hines. Spent a while with Mrs. Dr. Jno. Lasley (a friend of my school days at Rutherford College in the year 1877). Norlina Point, Mrs. Durham: my mother, Mrs. R. R. Hamme and Miss Vera W. Hunter and little daughter, Hazel Hendricks, of Julian. Miss Rosa Hinkle, Yadkin College.

Since I can remember to have known that I had a real live uncle on each and every of Washington's birthday (and mine), somehow I always felt kind of blue and out of the ordinary on those days, and I don't so far as I can observe, beyond myself, but that when the post-man on 23rd simply stormed me with all this mail. I begin now in my bewildered mind trying to read between exclamations such as these "Well, did you ever!" and directly again, "Why Z. M., what do alls these cards mean?" Until very soon I found out that I was having a beautiful post card birthday party. Mr. Rea did not fail to join too. Many dear letters also accompanied them. You can never know how much our hearts went out to you in appreciation for this sympathetic little visit to me in this time of my long shut-in. May God, the author of all good, send a blessing to each with your loved ones. It is my desire for us all to meet beyond the sunset where the new day will be eternal youth.

A VISIT TO OUR ORPHAN'S HOME.

Would you come with me for a visit to our Orphan's Home in Denton? The Executive Committee of the N. C. Branch met there on Saturday, Feb. 18th. We found awaiting us in the grove surrounding the home a happy family of boys and girls who were eager to see "Mother Hammer," as the little ones call her. There are 13 boys and girls in the home—they are bright, happy and obedient children. A visitor cannot fail to be impressed with the love and helpfulness that is shown among the children, each of them willingly and gladly helping another with their tasks, etc. Such a spirit of good fellowship seems to exist.

It is touching to see them at their play, happy in spite of their troubles; more touching to gather with them around the table and see the thankfulness in each face for the simple meal; and the unconscious wistfulness of each childish face tells its own story of loss and loneliness.

We find wholesome food is prepared and served with careful hands. Miss Williams, the matron, looks after the two little ones at one end of the table while Miss Auman, asst. matron, is caring for the scarcely larger ones. And one must feel that each of these noble young women is doing her best to supply mother's and father's place to these helpless little ones.

The management of the Home invited the closest scrutiny of the details of life there and for the benefit of any interested reader we would say that the investigation showed very satisfactory results. Economy is used in all the affairs of the home and expenses are kept at minimum. A close financial report of receipts and expenditures is kept which is open to the inspection of the advisory committee appointed by the last annual conference at any time.

The liberality of the people throughout the conference has been encouraging and those in charge of the Home urge our M. P. people to visit the Home and know for themselves what their means have provided. The children come to the Home provided with clothing but they are needing new supplies now. We would urge that the different auxiliaries undertake to provide for one child. This has been done in two cases only thus far—both Henderson and Asheboro auxiliaries have taken the support of a little girl and how appreciative and proud they are to feel that someone has an especial interest in them. I would remind ourselves that there are 5 or 6 boys to be cared for and they are all needing new suits now. Perhaps some church or private individual will take the support of a child. The estimated cost for the care of a child is $5 monthly. Would not the children of our Sunday schools be interested and enjoy sending a box yearly to these less favored little ones?

Will not our ministers organize home mission societies or bands wherever possible? The funds from that source would help greatly and we are allowed by the Board to retain all dues for the support of our special work—the Orphan's Home.

We were interested to hear that the children were doing well at school, to see them industriously digging away at roots and rocks preparing flower beds in the yards and gardens in the rear of the house. They take much pride in the chickens and pigs but the quantity of both is pitifully small for such a growing, healthy family. The boys are manly fellows. It is ony necessary for a neighbor to tell them that they can have some wood by cutting the trees and they go bravely to the task.

Each one is doing his or her duty as best they can—what more could they do? What more could we do?

The Ex. Com. was much pleased and greatly encouraged by its visit. But the following wants did not escape our attention: one milch-cow, seed corn for planting, seed potatoes for planting, seed beans for planting, scales for weighing, 3 beds (complete).

He careth for them—shall not we?

H. Frances Sutton,
Cor. Sec. of Branch.

Orphan's Home.

We are now enjoying a bright light, a gas lamp, given us by the good people of Denton. It is really better than electric light and no more expense than an oil lamp. These people never tire of doing good.

Mr. J. R. Peace, who has almost supplied us with wood since our coming here has given us the wood from a lot adjoining ours, which will last us several months. Our boys are now busy clearing this off.

Center Church, Alamance Circuit, sent us a nice large box last week, filled with many of the necessaries of life.

We are now gardening and looking after our poultry business. Our hens are doing well, what few we have, but we need more, say about fifty. You have more than you need; won't you ship us a few, right away?

We were glad to have Mrs. W. C. Hammer and Miss Frances Sutton spend third Sunday with us. M. W.

Loved in Life, Remembered in Death.

Death again visited our home, February 8, 1911, and claimed for its own the priceless soul of a devoted daughter, sister and niece, Miss Indie T. Massey, aged 29 years, 10 months and three days. She had a complication of diseases and had been a great sufferer for the past three months, but bore it all patiently and was ready and waiting when the Lord said, It is enough, come up higher. The constant care of two doctors, a loving father, brothers, sister and a dear aunt was of no avail; her crown was waiting her. She leaves a father, two brothers, one sister, and a devoted aunt who stood by her so faithfully and took a mother's place, and a host of friends and relatives to mourn their loss. But we know she is asleep in the arms of Jesus, safe on his gentle breast.

She will be sadly missed in our home, community and church, but we hope so to live as to meet her where parting is no more. She professed faith in Christ during a meeting at Spring Church in 1894, held by Rev. W. F. Ashburn, and lived a faithful member until death. She was perfectly devoted to her church and was always present when able.

Oh, how lonely it is to think we can never look on her kind face again, and can never hear her gentle voice again in this life. Our family is now half divided, and no doubt it was a happy meeting when Indie met with mama, May and Willie, waiting for her on heaven's bright shore. It is so sad to give up our loved ones, but we know, "His will must be done, not ours." However, we must live the life they lived, and prepare to meet them in heaven, where happiness will know no end, and where death has no dominion. We know that Indie is in heaven rejoicing with mama, sister and brother, and is waiting and watching for papa, Jas. and Millard, Nannie and Aunt Rebecca, to come and be with them on that bright and celestial shore. Her funeral service was conducted at home by her pastor, Rev. W. F. Ashburn, and she was laid away in the family burying ground to await the resurrection morn.

No words will ever be so sweet
As the words she used to say;
No hour will ever be so sad
As the hour she passed away.
A precious one from us is gone,
A voice we loved is still;
A place is vacant in our home
Which never can be filled.

T. W. Massey and Children.

Feb. 12th, the daughter of Mrs. Julia Sykes was called away, Mrs. Henrietta Sykes. She leaves mother, brothers and sisters, to mourn their loss, but the saddest of all, she leaves four little children, the oldest about ten, without a mother. Mrs. Sykes was thirty years old, and had been a member of Chestnut Ridge M. P. Church since childhood. How good to know that she had lived a Christian so long. We can't understand why a mother is taken from her little babes when they so much need her. She is gone never to return to them; they will know no more the touch of that loving mother's hand, nor will they feel the kiss so often planted upon their brow by a mother's lips. It is sad for them to give her up, but she is far happier now than they. The funeral was conducted on the following day in a very impressive manner by Bro. Bryans assisted by Bro. Edwards from Mebane. The remains were laid away in the new made grave to await the resurrection.

A Friend.

THE OLD-TIME RELIGION.

I hope all read Bro. Andrews' Conference sermon and that they will take heed to it and let us preach and pray and sing with the spirit and the understanding also. "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His." Rom. 8:9. Reader, have you the Spirit of Christ? Instead of writing about union, let us write and work to get the churches to have the old-time religion our forefathers had and obey the good discipline they gave us and have class and prayer meetings and love feasts and the joy of His salvation, then we can teach transgressors His ways and sinners shall be converted unto Him. It does seem that we ought to have enough consecrated ministers in the Conference to require all to do their official duties. Many years ago when the circuits were so large the pastor did not have time to visit only to stay all night in going from church to church and the good old class leaders looked after their classes and helped them to grow in grace, etc. But how is it now? Many join the church without being born again and those that join and the church too seem to forget their vows and they have no good class leader to help them, so they soon grow cold and lose interest in the church.

I don't remember saying what my good Bro. Hunt says I did, but the mistakes of my life have been many and I acted very foolishly sometimes at Conference in trying to please some on my circuit, when I knew all delegates ought not to be selfish, but to try to send the ministers where they thought they would do the most good. I suppose some with less education would have done more at Wilmington and Fayetteville than those they did send there, for it is not the learned D. D. that have added most to the church, but the worker with the Holy Spirit. The greatest thing that was ever done for Roanoke circuit was when they sent Rev. T. H. Pegram here who had but little education, but most of the people heard him gladly and he had over 150 conversions the first year and nearly as many additions and the second year they paid him over $700, being more than they ever paid any minister before or since. I am sure Bro. Hunt is with me in wanting more of the true religion and less formality. I see from the Methodist Recorder that Maryland Conference had over twice as many conversions as North Carolina. Let us do better this year. T. L. Whitaker.

STRENGTH AMID WEAKNESS.

In several important respects there is a large difference between physical and spiritual experiences. There are also very marked differences between natural and supernatural forces and conditions. And this accounts for the fact that people in their natural state cannot see nor appreciate supernatural things. They cannot see why it is that when a Christian feels very weak in spirit he is in a better condition to receive and appreciate spiritual power and refreshment than he is when he feels spiritually strong. And many a professor of religion does not understand this fact. It is not so in physical relations. One who feels weak in body cannot be physically strong at the same time. But this truth is experienced in personal spirituality. It is when the Christian feels unutterably weak in spirit, and lifts his soul pleadingly toward God, that the power of the Holy Spirit comes to him with relieving and exalting might. It is then that the believer appreciates the refreshing power of God as he never can appreciate it when he thinks that he is very strong in spirit, and congratulates himself on the supposed largeness of his spiritual resources. This has long been my own experience. When I felt distressingly weak, even to despair, then there soon followed the in coming of supernatural strength, accompanied by a precious joy. I never had such an experience when I felt pleasingly strong. I never had it when I was in a somewhat satisfied condition. It was only when I felt miserable, weak, and greatly dissatisfied with myself that the heavenly refreshment came, melting my heart into unwonted tenderness, and causing me to respond to the Lord with praise and thanksgiving. I also felt my unworthiness to receive such precious treasure from God. How near God appeared to be! How solemn the hour! At such times, one is led to think of the words of Paul: "When I am weak, then am I strong." Amid weakness produced by the thorn in his flesh, holding him down in the valley of humility, he was made happily strong in the Lord. He was weak in himself, but strong in Christ. Henceforth he never gloried in his own strength, but he gloried in Him who gave him abundant power.

C. H. Wetherbe.

OUTPOURING OF THE SPIRIT.

The expression so often used in prayer and preaching and testimony, which represents the Holy Spirit as being poured out, has been often ridiculed by unbelievers and discarded by Christians. But it is scriptural. The prophet uses it and Peter repeats it. Why should anyone be ashamed of it? How could anything be more expressive?

President Finney, of Oberlin, used to say that the devil often pours out his spirit and revives his work. When we consider the multitude of evil spirits that infest the earth, we may readily look on them as being poured out in floods. The spirit of pride and vanity, the spirit of greed and selfishness, the spirit of lust and uncleanness, the spirit of ambition and covetousness, the spirit of riot and revelry, often come in like a flood. The devil pours out his spirit in the saloon, in the city slum, in the country slum, in the most aristocratic street and on the most costly and splendid mansions, in the market place and in the streets where trade and traffic abound. It is enough to humble us when we see the evil which sweeps like a destructive flood through the city and over the land.

But, thanks be to God, He is always pouring out His Spirit. As the sun pours down his rays in floods upon the earth, so the Lord God is pouring out His Spirit continually. We do not have to wait for an outpouring of the Spirit of God. It will never fall on the earth in richer abundance than it is falling today. We do not have to plead with God to pour out His Spirit. Many persons pray for the outpouring of the Spirit of God, and then mourn and lament that their prayers have not been answered. They have been disappointed. The Spirit has not been poured out. How blind we are. Men do not all receive the sunlight when it is poured out. One may shut himself in a dark cellar and exclude the light. He may shut his eyes. He may put out his eyes, so that he cannot see. He may walk in darkness while the light is being poured out in floods all about him. So men may shut out the Spirit of the Lord. Multitudes do shut out this light.

Pray not for the outpouring of the Spirit, but pray for an open eye, an open mind, an open heart. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in." As the king of day comes in when the doors and windows are wide open, so the King of Glory, the King of love, the King of righteousness, the King of truth, the King of peace shall come in, and cast out the darkness of sin and death.—N. Y. Christian Advocate.

DIRECT ELECTION OF SENATORS.

There is every prospect that the people of the United States will soon be permitted to do what the majority have long wanted to do—vote for an amendment of the Constitution taking the choice of United States Senators away from the legislatures and giving it to the people.

It is argued against that that the people choose the legislators, and that if the legislatures cannot be trusted the people cannot be trusted.

But the legislators are not—or ought not to be—elected upon the one issue of their preference for senator. Local and national politics should be separated as far as possible, and we never can separate them while the legislatures choose Senators.

Further, it is urged that, though the present method makes it easy for rich men to win election to the Senate by bribery, as we have recently seen shamefully proved, yet the proposed change would not do away with the power of wealth, since the State-wide campaign for the Senate would require so much money that only rich men could wage it.

We believe that the people are waking up to this evil, and that before long they will see to it that the use of money to win an election to the Senate—or to any other position—is not only unnecessary, but an actual hindrance. If publication of campaign expenses on the eve of election were made obligatory, we believe that extravagant use of money thus shown would seal the fate of any candidate.

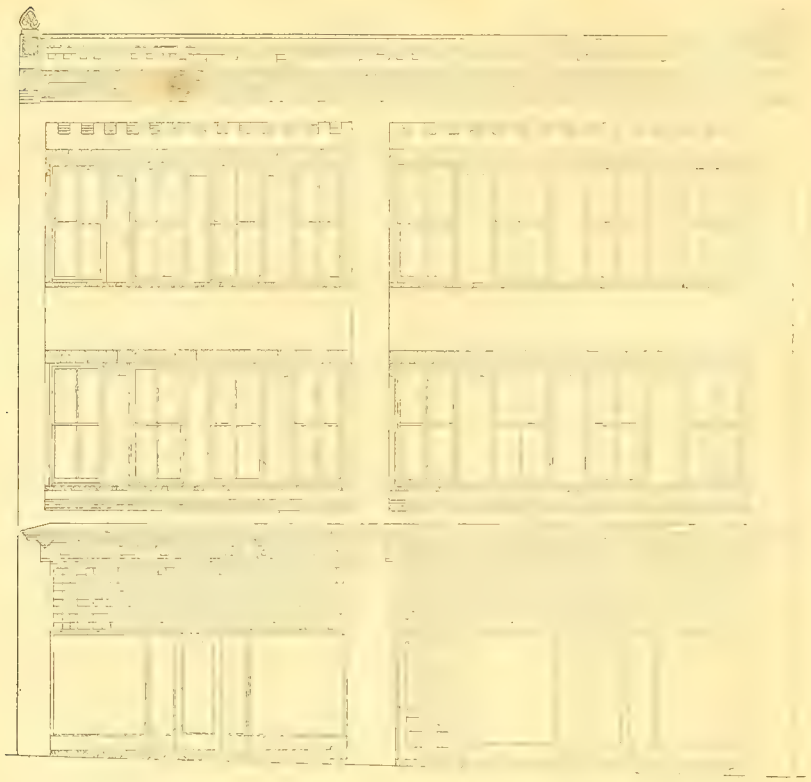
Indirect and round-about methods are harmful everywhere, and nowhere are they more harmful than in politics. Let us have direct election of Senators.—C. E. World.

PRAYER MEETING.

Why not have a live prayer service each week in our country churches. Spring will soon be here with good weather and roads, so let us get away from the old track and do something we haven't done before. A live prayer service means a live church and good church workers. Pray over the matter and I think you will decide to help in a movement of this kind

R. C. S.

A solemn and religious regard to spiritual and eternal things is an indispensable element of all true greatness.—Daniel Webster.



METHODIST PROTESTANT [illegible]

JUST A WORD.

Last year the ground for this building was purchased—an important corner lot, the most promising corner in Greensboro. It was bought for the erection of a splendid building for the endowment of a Methodist Protestant college, if built by the year 1920. Otherwise for whatever other church purpose the majority of contributors living at that time may decide.

Quite a number made pledges and paid them wholly or in part last year. (We will publish the list soon.) But so large [illegible]

WHOSE SERVANTS ARE YOU?

(Among manuscripts of N. Summerbell, unpublished, I find something like the following:)

Through all the world there are sorrow, suffering and ruin, as certainly as joy, development and success. On the one hand are churches, on the other saloons: on the one hand Sunday-schools, on the other prisons: on the one hand prayer-meetings, on the other gambling resorts: some are diligent in business, others are lazy; some are honest, others unreliable; some are sober, others are drunk: some are law-abiding, others are disorderly; some uphold religion, others cultivate unbelief and things that are carnal; some are constructive and build up the good, others are destructive and tear down the enterprises in their hands.

The effect of the works of these two [illegible] classes does not always [illegible] at once: just as the seeds of [illegible] wheat or weeds will not appear till the harvest. But the work of these is sure to bring results. Good character is [illegible] people, church members, Sunday-school teachers, self-sacrificing citizens and a larger community. Bad character produces [illegible] worldliness, profanity, pharisaism, sabbath-breaking, indebtedness, theft, imprisonment, sorrow and wasted lives.

The former class are laboring with God, the latter [illegible] with Satan.

Thus, some serve Satan unwittingly, and are not held responsible for their influence is on that side. Their motives are in the service of Jesus, but their work is for Satan, nevertheless. They disgrace religion by their acts. And there are [illegible] who do some good things, but refuse to be servants of God, or to obey him. They are unwilling to be on God's side. Whose servants are they? Some are servants of the evil one. Jesus teaches us that we are his slaves to whom we yield ourselves as servants to obey.

The servants of God obey him unto righteousness, whose end is life. The service of sin obeys by resistance to Christ; the way is sin, and the end is ruin and death. The followers of Christ walk in a narrow way, it is true, but it becomes easy to walk it: for the traveler becomes accustomed to the straight lines of narrow confines. The servants of Satan [illegible] the fields of Ireland free, and the Negro a slave, it is free: but the slaves of sin are so drunk [illegible] they [illegible] name of freedom, and [illegible] walk [illegible] appointed by the [illegible].

Which are you?

Consider the matters:

Jesus represents God, the right, salvation, heaven. Satan represents evil, falsehood, error, cruelty.

Which deals in virtue, love, peace, righteousness, happiness and truth.

Satan deals in error, falsehood, violence, injustice, remorse and destruction.

Which side are you on? Can you succeed in the wrong. If so what then? How can you make the wrong triumph in the end? Will not a temporary victory in it simply postpone the final defeat?

Do you know that if all served Christ the world would be wholly happy; but if all served Satan there would be universal carnage and death? That men would prey on each other, even kill each other, until there would be but one man left and he would commit suicide? Yes: the devil is blacker than he is painted and it is not certain that he ever did any good. The pay of his service is sorrow, weeping and lamentation: youth gone, principle gone, character gone, and opportunity gone. He asks for little at first but he never ceases asking. He will even promise you that you may have a better report, if you will sin a little now; and then he gets you to sin a little more. He will tell you that this little sin is not dangerous, or that you have already done as bad, already and [illegible] he will persuade you that you have gone too far to repent. He is certain to cheat you. He deceived Eve. He sold Judas. The end of Satan's service is seen sometimes even in this life: in the debauched body, the lost reputation, the visible degradation.

Do you say that there are some bad in the churches? Well, are there none bad on your side? Are the saloon-keepers in the churches? the gamblers? the prostitutes? criminals?

There is no sense in contending for it. There is no Satan. You waste your time and breath. He has tempted you. His work is seen daily in opposing the light. There is a heaven, and there is a hell. There is hell sometimes on earth. There is light, and there is darkness. There is truth, and there is error. There is sound, and there is blindness. There is health, and there is sickness. There is glory, and there is shame. There is life, and there is death.

What right have you to employ [illegible] whether there be a devil or not. What right have you to be a slave to sin, when Christ offers you the liberty of the gospel? If there be no devil, what right have you to make use of yourself? You may begin the service of evil, by entering among scenes on the broad way, as in [illegible] rhums, snakes, delirium tremens, thieves, [illegible], sorrow, shame, suffering, privation, and [illegible] death.

Serve God, and the end is joy and peace, and [illegible] day man is so happy as under the service of God is to be. And it is an eternal joy.

[illegible] are you. His servants ye are, to whom you yield yourselves servants to obey. [illegible] easily test yourself. Do you obey God? Be you.

J. J. Summerbell.

THE GREAT GUEST COMES.

While the cobbler mused, there passed by his place a beggar drenched by the driving rain; he called him in front of the stove, fed and gave him shoes for his bleeding feet. The beggar went, and there came a cripple her face with wrinkles of sorrow scrawled; a bundle of faggots bowed her back, and she was spent with the wrench and rack. He gave her his loaf and shouldered her load as she took her way in the weary road. Then to his door came a little child, lost and afraid in the world so wild, in the big dark world. Catching it up, he gave it back in the waiting cup, and led it home to its mother's arms, out of reach of the world's alarms. The day went down in the crimson west, and with it the hope of the blessed Guest; and Conrad sighed as the world turned gray: "Why is it, Lord, that your feet delay? Did you forget that this was the day?" Then, soft, in the silence a voice was heard: "I lifted up your heart, for I kept my word. Three times I came to your friendly door, three times my shadow was on your floor; I was the beggar with bruised feet; I was the woman you gave to eat; I was the child on the homeless street."

BETWEEN THE DAYS.

Between the days—the every days—
Where stumps the daily road and the dull ways;
Over tired eyes the hands he lays,
And strength and hope and life renews.
Thank God for Sundays on the days!

Else who could bear the battle stress
Or, who withstand the tempests' shock,
Who thread the very wilderness
Among the pitfalls and the rocks,
Come not the night with folded locks?

The white light scorches, and the plain
Stretches before us, parched with heat;
But, by and by, the fierce beams wane;
And lo! the nightfall, cool and sweet,
With dews to bathe the aching feet!

For he remembereth our frame!
Even for this I render praise.

The fiber in our path allays
And with his "Peace" cures the days!

C. E. TOPICS FOR MARCH 6.—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

Aid for the Tempted. Heb. 2:14-18.

The Pastor:—Have the pastor read the Scripture and give a five minute comment thereon. If your pastor cannot do this, get the president of the Society to do it.

The Leader:—Temptation is not sin, but yielding to temptation is. We are daily tempted, but we do not necessarily have to sin. We shall not be able of ourselves to meet and overcome temptation. We must look to God to help us. We must pray. We must know the promises of the Bible. We must be able to trust ourselves in His hands. Otherwise we shall fail and miserably fail. We sometimes sin because we are not sure the devil is tempting us. This enemy of our souls has varied and sundry ways of approach. He sometimes tempts us in the person of our dearest friends, sometimes in our own desires. We must pray not only then for power to resist and overcome his evils, but also for power to see and discern him when he approaches. Some such message as this the leader will give in his five minutes.

Thought Provoking Questions for Voluntary Answer:

What is a temptation?

What is the source of all temptation?

How can we overcome temptation?

How can we know when a thing is wrong?

How was Christ an example to us in temptation?

How was Peter a warning to us in temptation?

How was John?

How was David?

How was Moses?

How was Joseph an example to us in temptation?

What is the value of temptation??

Give a Bible instance of how to resist temptation. (To several).

Give a Bible instance warning us against yielding. (To several).

How does temptation come to us?

How does prayer help us in temptation?

How does faith help us?

What is the end of yielding to temptation?

Why is it wrong to tempt our fellows?

What is the reward of always resisting temptation?

How have I been able to overcome temptation?

How do Scripture verses help us in times of temptation?

How do we sometimes tempt ourselves?

Questions on the Topic.

One of the very best ways of drawing out the younger and less experienced members of the society is to ask questions on the topics of the meetings.

These should not be questions that can be answered by yes or no, and they should not be leading questions. They should be queries that really test the mind.

The questions should be given out a week in advance, or at least several days ahead of the meeting. It is better to send them by mail than not to use them at all.

Never let it be known that you have been asked to answer a question. Answer it as if the answer just occurred to you.

A Word for the Society.

The Christian Endeavor Society progresses, like any other good cause, through the praise of those that have got good from it.

Speaking to others about the good points of the society will help you to see more of them.

Praising the society in the presence of those that believe in it is well, but it is even more helpful to praise is to those that do not understand its advantages or believe in it. Give them facts.

Invite the doubting ones and give them a good time. What we see, we believe.

At His Right Hand.

The true Christian Endeavor Society will stand at its pastor's right hand, a useful tool ready for any service.

Arrange instrumentalities for this purpose. For instance, appoint a pastor's aid committee, whose entire duty it is to place itself at the disposal of the pastor to do any work he may desire done.

Make it perfectly plain to the pastor that you want him to use the society, in all its parts. Get him to be present at the meetings of the executive committee whenever it is convenient for him, and there let the chairman of every committee ask him what that committee can do to further his work. Make your society indispensable to the pastor.

Set Up a Standard.

A pledge is simply setting up a standard of purpose and accomplishment. No growth in mind or spirit is possible without ideals. Those that decry pledges in our societies are decrying standards and ideals.

No one wants to set up your standards for you. The four pledges suggested by the United Society of Christian Endeavor are the standards found commonly acceptable and useful, but if they are not acceptable to you or likely to be useful, there is every reason why you should set up your own standards, make your own pledge.

Only, do not rest satisfied without the formation and expression of ideals. Do not try to get along without the equivalent of the Christian Endeavor pledge.

A pledge is not a creed, but a covenant. Your pledge is to Christ, not to the Society.

GONE HOME.

Gone Home! there is a sound of resting
As weary lips pronounce the word,
Forever shielded from earth's tumult,
Forever "present with the Lord."

Gone Home! the battle strife is ended,
The arms are grounded at His feet;
Another victor waits the morning
When God's great host shall be complete.

Gone Home! while still we watch and wonder,
So prompt the message sent for thee;
We had no time to learn its meaning,
Ere thy bright spirit was set free.

Gone Home! while yet fond hearts are waiting
To hear more words of life and love
From lips that often told the story
Of Jesus and His home above.

New Way With Stumps.—The last mode of disposing of stumps is to burn them in the ground. The process is described in the March number of Popular Mechanics magazine.

Income Tax.—To date, 19 States have taken action. Twelve have voted to ratify the proposed law. They are Alabama, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, Montana, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Carolina and Texas. The following have refused to ratify: Lousiana, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Vermont, Virginia and West Virginia. Twelve States can defeat the amendment.

—By the reapportionment, three North Carolina counties will have three members in the lower house of the legislature. These are Guilford, Mecklenburg and Wake. Fourteen counties will have two representatives, the rest one each.

—A landslide carried 550,000 cubic feet of earth into Panama Canal on Feb. 9. Such occurrences were counted on and provided for in the estimate of expenses.

—The newest post-office on our mailing list is Charley Hope, Va.

—Bro. Spoon, of Alamance County, the apostle of good roads, spoke in Greensboro recently before a good roads convention, and showed how to use a split drag in road advancement. He is the State's road engineer, and is said to be doing more good than half a dozen ordinary "statesmen."

—One day last week, two dogs were seen trotting leisurely about our streets with advertising sheets printed in large letters over their backs. One of the dogs wore spectacles and carried a tobacco pipe in his mouth. When any one took the pipe out of his mouth and laid it on the ground he would put his foot on the bowl and turn up the handle so that he could take it into his mouth. Some one asked the man in charge why he did not light the pipe. He said: "'Twould make my dog sick."

—North Carolina has 100 counties now, the legislature having just added one.

—Rev. H. L. Powell's little son is at last up from his attack of fever and Bro. Powell is beginning his work in earnest again. He has had a trying time, but his people have been kind and considerate.

—Rev. C. A. Cecil and wife were invited to a Jewish wedding in their neighborhood on Tuesday night. Bro. Cecil had visited the man in sickness, and he appreciated it.

—Mr. H. G. Braxton is to be business manager of The Greensboro Telegram, associated with Mr. J. T. Fain, editor. They have made a good beginning in the conduct of the paper, and hope greatly to improve the paper in the future. We wish them success.

—Our young brother, Ira M. Petree, surprises us by getting married. We did not know he had even thought of such a thing. Bro. Ogburn officiated in the marriage, Miss Mabel Leigh being the other party. Our best wishes.

—Mr. Raleigh Hunter is now serving as linotype operator in the Christian Advocate office. A partial failure of health caused him to withdraw from college for the remainder of this year.

—Leon McCulloch has been taking a course in mumps. He did not enjoy the experience.

—Rev. J. H. Stowe moves to the parsonage of Why Not Ct., and changes his post-office to Seagrove, N. C.

The world has no room for cowards. We must all be ready somehow to toil, to suffer, to die.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

The passion of love is the master passion of the human race, and, at its best, is the purest and divinest human passion. —Lyman Abbott.

RUSKIN AS A WRITER.

Raskin's style we might say is a charming mixture of sublimity, enthusiasm and good English commonsense. Raskin does not have much reserve either in his writing or thinking, but he has just about every thing else. He has purity, elasticity, dramatic force, wit, passion, imagination and nobility. He writes about art, history, science, theology, education, economy, poetry, agriculture and many other subjects.

Raskin is a musical, eloquent prose writer. He plays the prose lyre and strikes every infinite note with power and melody, that inspires the very musical soul of man. His writing is art expressed in words.

Alliteration and assonance, adjectives in description, antithesis in argument, and climax with dramatic force he used with very much power.

His sentences are rhythmical and full of music, his thoughts excellent, his style unsurpassed. He is clear, simple and charming in his manner of expression.

His prose is marked by two styles, a dramatic style, vehement, rhetorical, and full of imagery such as we find in "Modern Painters," and "Seven Lamps." Then, too, he has a more melodious sort, found in "Fors Clavigera." Melody and rhythm, strength and earnestness characterize his writing. There is symmetry and rhythm in his sentence structure. One only has to read the beautiful lines found in the preface to "The Crown of Wild Olive" to understand something of the beauty of this great writer.

"No clearer or diviner waters ever sang with constant lips of the hand which giveth rain from heaven; no pastures ever lightened in springtime with more passionate blossoming etc."

Musical, sublime, eloquent and full of inspiration. Art in words.

THOUGHTS BY THE WAY.

Instead of saying I am glad and happy, many meet you with complaining, and hasten to tell you how unwell they are and have been all the time since they last saw you. Those you meet have almost as many burdens, afflictions and troubles to take along with them as you have, and they do not want to be bothered and hindered with yours. So it would be so much better not to mention them when you meet, but just try hard to feel happy and good as you can. Be cheerful and see how contagious the influence. Do not think of the unpleasant things so much, but tell your neighbors and friends of their own they will be glad to see you next time when you are looking well and feeling better. It is natural to desire sympathy but it is often hard to get, and yet it is nice to have help sometimes, but when one helps himself he appreciates it more. When meeting friends if they appear to be in bad health or seem depressed do not discourage them by telling them how bad they look. If they realy look so try to help them cheer them by earnest words of encouragement. Discretion is a good thing to take with you through life. Send a thrill of joy to their hearts instead of discouraging cares.

MOSES' NARROW ESCAPE.

In Exodus, fourth chapter, 24th verse, we read a strange and startling thing about Moses. He was then on his way to Egypt, though perhaps reluctantly, to carry out a commission from God. We might expect to read that God appeared to him, and encouraged him, as He appeared to Abraham in former times. But we read that the Lord met him and sought to kill him! What? kill his own messenger and appointee? So we read.

The explanation is not far to seek. Moses had failed to honor the covenant made with Abraham by observing the rite of circumcision. Possibly he had been deterred by the opposition of his wife. At any rate, he had failed, and God will not permit him to go on and assume the position already assigned to him unless he will conform fully to the will of God. God meets him and makes it plain to him that he has come to the point at which he must yield obedience or yield up his life. Some think that Moses was seized with an illness which would have terminated fatally if he had not consented even against the opposition of his wife, to insist on the circumcision of his sons. The wife yields, though with poor grace, and Moses is saved.

The necessity for strict obedience to the divine will is enforced by the incident. Moses was a very great man, and God had chosen him for a great work. But still God was not dependent on him. Another could be found to take his place, and he must fully honor God as a condition of going on in the work to which God had called him.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN THE COUNTRY?

We had a suspicion that the Christian Endeavor movement was debarred from the country by the nature of the case. The people are scattered and it takes much time and travel to meet together.

But while these are real difficulties, yet we believe they are not insuperable. They don't stand in the way of other things country people wish to do. Why should they be allowed to stand in the way of the best religious development?

That is what Christian Endeavor aims at—the best religious development. It aims to make wholehearted Christians out of half-hearted ones. It aims to make satisfied, joyful Christians out of discontented, gloomy Christians. It aims to make active, efficient Christians out of inactive, inefficient ones.

Why not do this with country people? Surely they are as much entitled to it as any. Surely they are as capable of it as any.

The Christian Endeavor idea is very adaptable. Wherever there are two or three young Christians (or older Christians) that can be gotten together once in a while, there is material for a Christian Endeavor Society. And in a Christian Endeavor Society these two or three Christians will be worth more to themselves and more to their community and more to the cause of Christianity than they will be dissociated. They can help each other. Unitedly they can do more than they can separately.

To be sure regular meetings are better than irregular ones, and weekly meetings are better than monthly meetings, but a Christian Endeavor Society permanently organized with meetings only on special occasions would be much better than no organization at all. Learn wisdom from the political parties. They are constantly organized, though they hold meetings only on special occasions. They know their men. They know on whom they can rely when the time comes for action.

Ought not pastors to labor to bring about a like state of readiness for Christian service? We believe they ought. What a church our church would be if every member of it were brought up to that attitude to the work of the church that he would be eager to lay hold and do his part whenever there is any new work to do.

We need to develop the feeling that Christians are servants of Christ. (Paul called himself a slave of Christ). With the desire to do Christ's will should be developed the ability to do good in some real and effective way. Young People need to be developed in religious expression. They feel a religious life stirring in them. This life should be given free and proper play. The religious life tends to express itself in praise and prayer, in study of God's word, and in kindness to men.

The meeting for praise and prayer and Bible study and testimony and exhortation is needed. Let the young people have it. Encourage them to have it. Make provision for them to have it. Meet with them, pastor, and help them to have it. Then encourage them in works of mercy and kindness. Tell them of opportunities to do good; of sick ones they may relieve or cheer; of orphans they may help to care for; of lonely ones they may bring to a happier life.

Don't be afraid of the Christian Endeavor movement because of the complexity of the organizations in other places. It can be and should be made to conform to the situation in hand. It is simple or complex as the case may require. Don't try to imitate any body else, but fashion the tool for the work you have to do.

The work is wherever there are people. God is calling on every one to rise up to the dignity and value of true, wholehearted Christian service. Christ is calling on every pastor and leader in the church to devise means to bring those under his care to the best of which they are capable. It is a great thing to be a pastor—to have the care of immortal souls; to be responsible for their guidance or misguidance; for their training or their neglect.

May God help every one of our pastors to see and do the very best for those he is trying to serve.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

Mr. Editor and Readers: It may seem queer such a subject as this and the view that I have taken of it, but it came to my mind to write it. Having seen it so plain I decided to write something on alcohol and its wonderful effects. Some, it's true, may think that I am just a "hot-headed prohibitionist," but that is not it whatever. I will say that I do not drink whiskey and thank God for it, thank Him that I am man enough to resist it and may God help me to continue so. My friends, have you ever stopped to consider the wonderful power of alcohol? I hope this will not be considered as trash. I want each one that reads it to take it deep into his thoughts and give it full consideration.

First, consider the physiological effect. The unfortunate man takes the first drink. It makes him "feel good," as he calls it. He takes another, and another until it begins affectingg the spinal cord; it gradually gets control of the muscles. It gets control of the lower lip, then of the lower limbs; it becomes difficult for him to walk, (isn't it awful?) the steps are uncertain. He continues taking another "sip" until it gets further control of the muscles. It becomes dangerous for him to get about, as he cannot control himself. By this time it is having great affect npon the cerebrum or the brain which gives us knowledge; which gives us forethought; which gives us pride; (hasn't he lost this part?) and the brain which manages business. This organ absorbs more of the alcohol than any other of the human body. The cerebellum or the lower brain is of course important because we are taught that it controls the voluntary muscles and perhaps makes it really more important than the cerebrum because if you were to lose your knowledge you could live though a lunatic. But the cerebrum, the brain of knowledge, as has been explained is the brain which conducts business; which rules the world and should we have little thought enough to destroy the power of this? This man now becomes unfit to attend business; to give any evidence; to handle money or to even leave home alone. Think of this seriously. It's not foolishness, it's not "hot-headedness," it's truth, it's common sense. He continues drinking until he finally enters the stage of unconsciousness. He is not dead, it is true, but what is the difference? If the house in which he resided were on fire and you tell him of it, could he help himself? If someone take a thousand dollars from his pocket could he help himself or would he even know it? If some one came to slay him, could he help himself? If a great opportunity came by him, could he make good of it or would he even know it? If some one came to talk business would he be in shape to do so? In fact what is he more than an infant? Well, there is one marked difference; that is, if the infant die there is no doubt where its soul would land and if this man die in this shape where would he land? where would he land? Isn't it sad? His dear wife looks after him and tries to smuggle it up and gets him going again. And, my dear sir, consider this part seriously. After he is going again of course his brain is injured some, he has thoroughly experienced the effects of this awful master, alcohol. He can see where he has lost time and money. He can see where he has damaged himself physically, morally and worst of all, spiritually. And is he going to try the very same thing over? Some might cowardly call drinking whiskey liberty and pleasure. Mr. Man of intelligence, would you call this an illustration of liberty or pleasure either? This unfortunate man leaves home to attend to business. He designates the time for his return. He comes in contact with some "good dram." He begins tasting, his friend "sets up," then he "sets up." He continues in this manner until he becomes fully intoxicated. The time for his return passes, his wife becomes uneasy, of course. She doesn't know where he is and probably he doesn't know himself. She looks for him, he doesn't come. She looks again, he doesn't come. After awhile it's getting dark. She looks the last time she can see, he doesn't come. Where is he, what's the reason he doesn't come? It becomes dark. She goes, listens, no sound. Her heart beats fast, her throat becomes full, every thing seems sad. She listens again and again and he doesn't come. The clock strikes 7, 8, and 9. She goes, listens again, what now? The doleful cluck! cluck! of a vehicle. Who is it? Some one bringing her husband home. In what condition? Not dead but what's the difference? The gentleman gets him in and puts him to bed. There he lies, completely helpless. The dear wife sits there lonely, no one to speak to, looking on him, the pitiful subject, the same fellow that once promised to comfort and cherish her. Is he doing it? My intelligent friend, isn't this awful? Should this be called liberty or pleasure? Wouldn't it be cowardly to do so? Suppose it were a little pleasure to him, should he to please himself a little disgrace his moral character and make his dear wife's life a burden to her? This is a serious subject, it needs much consideration. And, my dear sir, if you are a drinking man, quit it! You might say that you "just can't stop it," but pardon me for expressing it in this manner, but it is not true, you can stop it. Knowing that it will destroy you physically, morally, and spiritually if you haven't tried to stop it try now for your own good now and eternally. If this custom was carried on to an excess in some heathen land as it is here it would be different, but here in an intelligent land, in a Christian land and in a time of rushing business how can an intelligent American afford to keep up such? Some may say that this is just one of the regular tales, but if it is, it is true. The part is plain talk but it is true and the truth is what hurts. Understand that the youngster and the illiterate man are not all that do this, but sad to say that some of the deep drinkers are the "short bench" members of the church. Doesn't this make it worse? Pretending to be leaders. My dear sir, sit down and study your own case. If you do not drink whiskey, why ask God to help you continue so and if you are a drinking man why, you have something to consider. Think of men that do not drink and see if it has ever proved detrimental to them in any way. In fact what good does drinking whiskey do? So where there is no good there is very apt to be some harm. So just quit it entirely, don't stop at the idea that you "can take a drink and not get drunk," but let it be entirely out of your line of thoughts and desires. So, my reasonable friends, take these few remarks that I have made and magnify them and consider them seriously and let your thoughts be noble ones and free from the thoughts of this awful power.

WORK.

The industrious world is progressing by work. The human family are destined for work—and, if in place, are "elected" to work. We ascribe a great deal to talent, as we have the liberty to do, because talent is a fine thing in place—one of the finest. He (or she) is "cut out for a certain place, and just fitted for their work"—and too they arrived at their fitness by work. The Editor of the "Herald" has reached his place of trust by work—hard work. The successful workers have reached their various places of trust by work, the most of them by the hardest of hard work. The question of work is one to be thought about. God has a high regard for work, and even hard work; and we see this, by so many of the great representative characters of ancient and modern times having to endure through exceedingly hard work in order to accomplish their task in life. The hard worked people live longer than the idle, indolent class. Numbers of our aged men and women who are living today well and hearty are "much alive" and happy, and are enjoying their ripe age by their regular work. An active professional man, a physician while encouraging an 80 year old man to work (much as he well could) said, "after my father quit his work, his health failed, he did not live long." The safe class of people, the useful class are, "the working class"—but thousands of these hard workers belong to the professional world. The thing to do is for old and young to have work fitting to their several ability, to be sure that they be engaged in some helpful work.

IS PROHIBITION A SUCCESS IN NORTH CAROLINA?

We herewith submit the testimony of some of our state officers on this subject, and then allow you to draw your own conclusions.

Witness No. 1. Hon. W. W. Kitchen, governor of North Carolina, in his message to this legislature says "Prohibition has now been in force throughout the state for two years. This is a short period with which to measure the effects of a reform movement. We have done little more than planted the seed whose full fruitage will be gathered by coming generations. And yet, already the results fully justify its adoption. There has been, as appears from the attorney general's report based upon superior court statistics, a marked diminution in crime, even in the crime of violating the prohibition law. Business has experienced increased rather than diminished prosperity. Morality, industry and frugality have increased, and politics and government have been to a great extent relieved of one of their most corrupting influences."

Witness No. 2. Mr. T. W. Bickett, attorney general, in his biennial report submitted to the legislature, says: "The law requires every criminal case tried or in any way disposed of in the superior courts of the state to be reported to this office. The report for the year ending July 1, 1909, shows a grand total of 12,149 cases; for the year ending July 1, 1910, a grand total of 9,505 cases, a decreas of 2,644 cases. This must be gratifying to every citizen of the state."

Witness No. 3. Chief Justice Walter Clark, of the state supreme court, gives this information: "Since the law went into effect two years ago, crime has been reduced 50 per cent; murder in the first degree has declined 32 per cent; burglary, 20 per cent; attacks with deadly weapons, 30 per cent; larceny, 40 percent; manslaughter, 35 per cent; murder in second degree, 21 per cent; minor crimes from 25 to 55 per cent; and a decrease of the violations of the anti-liquor laws of 15 per cent."

Witness No. 4. The state corporation commission, which was created a state tax commission by the legislature of 1901, just ten years ago, in its report for 1901 gives the valuation of all property in the state at $300,709,300, and in its report for 1910 for all property a valuation of $613,000,000. (These ten years have been years of temperance reform and prohibition in this state. The Watt's Act, which prohibited distilleries and saloons in the rural districts, was enacted in 1903—the state prohibition act in 1908.)

Witness No. 5. The internal revenue department of the United States shows that the number of retail liquor dealers in North Carolina in 1908 was 817; 1909, 656; and 1910, 411.

Gentlemen, take the case.—The American Issue.

RESTORING EDEN'S GARDEN.

By Rev. William Durban, London.

By far the most interesting of all coming events, so far as international relationships are concerned, is the projected resurrecting, by plans already defined and organized, of the glories not only of Mesopotamia, wherein the Paradise of Genesis was located, but of Parapotamia. Mesopotamia is a term meaning "between the rivers," the streams embracing the territory being the Euphrates and the Tigris. Parapotamia is the equally important region outside each of the rivers. Mesopotamia and Parapotamia (the latter signifies "beyond the rivers") together cover the whole area of what is often denominated "Abraham's Land." This is the cradle of the human race.

A momentous negotiation has just been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Sir John Jackson, a noted member of Parliament in England, and head of one of the world's greatest engineering firms, has recently signed with Nazim Pasha at Bagdad a contract for the erection of an immense dam at the head of the Hindieh branch of the Euphrates. This vast work is to executed in connection with the Mesopotamia irrigation proposals. The scheme will before many years are past exercise effects reaching far beyond anything dreamed of by the world at large.

For about five eyars the eminent British surveyor, Sir William Willcocks, has been engaged in the difficult work of examining Mesopotamian and Parapotamian conditions. His report has just been sent in. In this document he says:

The deserts of Mesopotamia are not as arid and barren as those of Egypt; when rains are abundant the plains are covered with rich grass, on which thousands of sheep feed. But the dangers of drought are terrible for the tillers of the soil. According to statistics the inhabitants of the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates calculate that they lose their crops and even seeds once in three years.

By a brilliant scheme which he now suggests Sir William Willcocks is confident that this deplorable state of things can be absolutely remedied, and the wilderness can once more be made as in ancient days to blossom as the rose. The waters of the Euphrates are to be turned from their source when the river is at its highest. The enterprise would be accomplished at a cost of $17,500,000, and it would be completed in three years. This interesting report proceeds:

On the northwest of Bagdad, between the Tigris and Euphrates, there is some low water known by the name of Lake Akkur Kuf. It has a surface of 10,000 square yards when the waters are low and of 300,000 square yards when they are high. Its level is 35 feet below the Tigris. It is in this lake that, in former times, a branch of the Euphrates known as the Sakhlawa had its outlet.

Sir William Willcocks now proposes to supply the Sakhlawa with two powerful sluices at the place where it leaves the Euphrates so as to regulate the quantity of water. On the Euphrates itself, below the divarication, would be a dam to control the river itself. These two great works would be sufficient for the regulation of the Euphrates. On the other historic stream, the Tigris, it is proposed to construct an enormous dam at Beled above the rapids, and below the dam to cut a canal which shall irrigate the rich plains north of Bagdad and empty itself into the lake. To the southeast of this lake, near Bagdad, another canal would start, following the right bank of the Tigris and ending in the Chatt el Hai, a tributary of the old Tigris. This canal alone would efficiently irrigate six million acres of ground. The extra oozy mud, which for a fortnight is very considerable, and is sufficient to ruin everything, would be deposited in the like; the latter would regulate not only the efflux of waters, but also their muddy contents. The execution of the entire project will occupy six years.—Christian Herald.

DO FIGURES LIE?

The journals of Methodist Protestant Conferences have for years been of interest to me, especially my home Conference.

I have been for a few days looking over the journal of 1910. Some things done I like very much and some I think might have been better done.

I am interested in everything that pertains to the Methodist Protestant Church.

I turned to the statistical table of last year to see how the increase compared with the decrease.

No. members last report	20320
No. Accessions	1183
Total	21503
No. Members died	179
No. Members dropped	389
No. Members withdrawn ..	388
Total loss	956
No. Members now on list	20547
No. Members increase	227
The Journal says	535

I commenced to look about me to see what was the matter. I start down the line and this is what I find:

("Fault Finder" here names three charges and points out errors in the reports. We omit that part of the article, as seeming to be too personal.—Editor.)

I call attention to these mistakes from these few fields, from what I heard, they are served by our very best preachers, and if they make such mistakes, we can hardly hope to get a correct report from the field.

I turn to statictical table No. 1 and start down the line and I did not go very far until I found that some preacher had made figures lie. Fault Finder.

QUARTERLY MEETING OF THE BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS.

The third quarterly meeting for the fiscal year of the Board was held in Columbus, Ohio, on Wednesday, Feb. 22. The members of the Board were all present except Mr. Hunter of North Carolina, and Dr. J. W. Gray, of Adrian, Mich.

The report of the Secretary showed all the missions under the care of the Board making satisfactory progress, except the work in Oklahoma and one or two of the Missions in Texas. These will do better we think with a more clearly defined policy along certain lines.

New buildings are under way in two places in Columbus, and a third building has been dedicated and is in regular service. Our work in that city is only a little more than two years old, but we have three well organized churches. The congregations are active and aggressive, the pastors are very efficient, and the organizer, Rev. C. O. Harvey, is tireless in his effort to advance the interest of our work in that city.

Plans are being made to rebuild at Ravenna, Seattle, immediately. Readers of this paper will remember that this church was completely destroyed by fire on the night of Feb. 2, 1911. It is possible that a new location will be chosen, but this has not been fully determined upon as yet.

New buildings will probably be erected during the summer at Asheville, N. C., and Frankfort, Ind. The church at Asheville will cost complete about $20,000; the one at Frankfort will cost about $10,000; and both will be well suited to the places which they are to fill in these growing cities.

At Langley Avenue, Chicago, it is expected that a basement Sunday-school will be built during the year, roofed over, and used as a chapel until the complete church can be erected.

At Clarksburg, W. Va., a good building has been erected to be used as a chapel until the congregation can see its way to build the church in this growing city of the Little Mountain State, when this building will be finished for a parsonage. We have a fine outlook in Clarksburg.

There were several applications for assistance to build, and to rebuild churches, but none of these were granted because the work already begun will tax the resources of the Board to the utmost. Some of these will probably come up for further consideration at the Annual meeting to be held in May.

After very careful consideration, it was decided to not continue the publication of the Bulletin, but to make use of the official papers of the church as a medium of communication with the membership concerning the work of the Board of Home Missions. The Editors of all the papers have very kindly invited the Secretary to take possession of as much space as he can use, and he has announced his intention to accept the invitation.

The Easter service was ready for distribution at the time of the meeting of the Board.

The one thing needed to make this Board of very much greater value to the church is money. We have the machinery, and double the amount of work could be done with but little additional administration expense. And the funds must be increased very largely if the Board is able to do all the work which the church expects it to do. Nearly every Conference is asking for assistance somewhere, in some form, and many of these requests ought to be granted. The frontier work in Texas and Oklahoma must have better support to make it as successful as it might be made. But this Board can only direct the expenditure of the funds which are placed in its hands for distribution.

The Mountain Mission work was referred to the Woman's Board for its final decision, and direction. We were very sorry indeed to be unable to assist so worthy an enterprise, but the pressure of the work already begun will not allow us to assume any new responsibilities at this time.

Better support of our Home Mission work means more churches to help to send missionaries abroad, and a larger constituency from which to draw financial and other support for our Educational Institutions. Let us not give less to these great enterprises of the church, but more. But let us remember that Home Missions means America for Jesus Christ.

Charles H. Beck, Sec.

That Second Letter.

Did you get one? That was because the Secretary of the Board of Home Missions was very anxious to have the name and the address of the Superintendent of your Sunday-school, and his first letter had not secured the desired information. Please reply to the second "quick" if you have not already done so.

Notice to Bulletin Subscribers.

The Board of Home Missions has decided to discontinue the publication of The Home Mission Bulletin. Frequent reports of the work will appear in the Official papers of the church, and we hope to reach a larger constituency than we have been reaching with the Bulletin.

We are instructed to say to those whose subscriptions have not expired, that the subscriptions were all turned into the General Fund as collected, and unless a request for return payment is sent to this office previous to April 1st, will be considered as a part of that fund and disbursed accordingly. However if any are unwilling to accept the service which we are to give through the church papers in lieu of the Bulletin subscription we will very cheerfully refund whatever part of the subscription was unearned up to Dec. 1, 1910. Send your requests for refund to the Secretary Treasurer of the Board, Rev. Charles H. Beck, West Lafayette, Ohio, at once.

Ravenna Church, Seattle.

Plans are being made to rebuild this church, the old one having been destroyed by fire Feb. 2, 1911, either on the old or a new location immediately. It may be of interest to the church at large to know that the Ravenna mission has had a very good year under the administration of its efficient pastor, Rev. S. C. Benninger, a member of the Pittsburg Conference. Twenty-eight new members have been received, and the membership

REPORT OF GRACE AUXILIARY, GREENSBORO.

Monday, March 6, the auxiliary of the W. F. M. S. of Grace Methodist Protestant Church, Greensboro, held its annual meeting in the church. This was also the day for the annual mite-box opening. The attendance was not quite as good as on former occasions of this kind, but yet was very good. The election of officers for the year was as follows: Mrs. J. Norman Wills president; Mrs. A. B. Kimball, Vice President; Mrs. Dr. Johnson, secretary; Mrs. H. A. Garrett, treasurer. These ladies are most excellent workers, and will make efficient officers. Something over thirty dollars was received from the mite-boxes, with more to come in. This, with what we now have in the bank, will no doubt bring the amount up to fifty dollars, the sum needed to meet our pledge for Miss Mallett's salary.

On February 19 we held our annual Thank-offering service, our pastor, Rev. T. J. Ogburn, very kindly giving the ladies the morning hour. The program prepared by the committee was carried out, and we hope much good was done. The offering received amounted to $23.41.

BRINGING OUT THE GOLD.

A speaker said in an address to a congregation on the subject of missions that the reason why there were so many pennies put in the collection plates for missions was because there were no smaller coins. It was reported afterwards that there were not many pennies in the plate that day.

In the following item we learn how an Indian orator adressing some people in England on the subject of missions brought out the gold. He said:

"There is a gentleman now in this house, a very fine gentleman, but he does not like to show himself. I 'fraid he sleeps lots of time. Name Mr. Gold. Mr. Gold, you here tonight? Come out and help us do great work to preach the gospel. Mr. Gold, you ought to be ashamed to sleep so much in your iron chest. Look at Mr. Silver! Come out, fly around like him. He do much good while you sleep. Then, see your little brother, Mr. Copper. Why, he fly around all the time, do all the good he can, Mr. Gold! Come out and help us! Do come, Mr. Gold! And if you really can't come yourself, do the next best thing, send us your shirt, that is, a banknote."

—Within an hour after the 61st Congress adjourned March 4, President Taft had issued a call for an extraordinary session to convene April 4. The object is to have the Congress deal with the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada.

—The State Sunday-school Convention for North Carolina is to be held at High Point Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, April 26-28. Mr. Charles Butler is to be in charge of the singing and Marian Lawrence, General Secretary of the International Association of Chicago is to be present and make several addresses. The railroads are to give special rates.

—Speakor Cannon delivered his valedictory as Speaker of the House March 4th after serving as Speaker for eight years. People would have put up with Cannon in better grace had he not been so profane in speech, and because he swears so readily many are glad that he is to occupy a position not so conspicous as that heretofore ocupied by him. We have outlived the day of the profane man in high places, be his brain ever so big and brilliant.

—A motion is shortly to be submitted to the Convocation of Canterbury, the high court of the Church of England, to abridge the second, fourth and tenth Commandments. Some are too long to suit the moderns and the tenth puts a man's wife and his ox in the same category. What modern critics of the Bible cannot think of to wrangle over seems not worth thinking of at all. Still the Commandments stand and the Bible goes on in its glorious work of converting fallen men to better lives.

—The Legislature of North Carolina in its recent session made appropriations of $1,607,000 to its various institutions and enterprises, for the next two years. The Jackson Training School, Lexington, our "Reformatory" gets $25,000.00; the University of the State gets $87,000.0 annually for two years and $50,000.00 annually for four years for permanent improvements. The State Normal at Greensboro gets $87,000.00 annually for two years for maintenance, and $25,000.00 for four years for permanent improvements: the A. and M. at Raleigh gets $80,000.00 for maintenance annually for two years and $15.000.00 for four years annually for permanent improvements.

OBITUARY.

Martha Frances Leonard.

(1850-1911.)

Martha Frances Wagner-Leonard was born Feb. 5, 1850, died Feb. 24, 1911, aged 61 years and 19 days. She was married to David S. Leonard Feb. 17, 1870. She leaves at home the husband and two sons, Fred and Duke. The other children are: R. E. Leonard of the Bethesda community; G. F. Leonard, a medical student in the George Washington University; S. E. Leonard, a student in the University of North Carolina; Mrs. Dr. R. U. Zimmerman of Enterprise; and Mrs. B. C. Lambeth of High point.

In early girlhood she professed Christ and connected herself with the Midway M. E. Church but later moved her membership to Bethesda M. P. Church (Yadkin College ct.) where she remained an active and influential member till her death. She was always seen in her place in church and Sunday-school, and was an active member of the Ladies' Aid Society. She lived a quiet, unassuming life always doing her part in the work of the community. She fell asleep without a murmur, thus ending her life as peaceably as she had lived it.

Gratitude.

In this hour of sadness, dear father, brothers, sisters, can we not look on the brighter side and see the many family blessings that have come to us. First our family has been an unbroken circle for more than forty years during which time the five boys and the two girls have grown to man-hood and woman-hood. One of the boys, the oldest, and the two girls have established homes of their own. Secondly, through the teachings and the examples of Christian parents, every one of the children accepted Christ at an early age and are now active members of the Bethesda church. Thirdly, brothers, sisters, we still have father left to counsel and advise us, and father, you have all of your children yet, every one of whom will do every thing in his and her power to comfort you and make your life pleasant and happy. And fourthly, our home is still preserved. Alta Leonard, our oldest brother's daughter, is staying with father and the two brothers at home. Surely these facts are a great comfort to us who are left behind and for which we are indeed grateful.

Sorrow.

Why do we weep, dear father, brothers, sisters? It is not because Mamma was a Christian woman and has gone to rest. But there is a missing link in the family circle which so recently was unbroken. It is the "smpty chair," the "lonely home," this is why our eyes fill with tears. Although we are grateful that mamma was spared to us until we are all grown, yet the sudden separation causes sadness. We had all been together so long that we did not seem to realize that separation was possible until we were face to face with it.

And now since we are left motherless and our home does not beam with the sunshine of a mother's smile, a mother's care, a mother's love, let us brothers, sisters, by our words and deeds make the home as bright and happy as possible for our dear father the rest of his life. We are young and strong and are better able to bear these sorrows than he. Let us earnestly pray our Heavenly Father, who can bear all our burdens for us, that He may heal our poor broken hearts and that our father may be spared to us yet many years as our counsel and our guide.

A Devoted Son.

Died at Her Home.

Sister Julia Briggs died Feb. 24, 1911. She had been afflicted for five years; had not been able to attend church during these years. She lived and died in the faith. She was one of the charter members of Tabernacle M. P. Church. She was 65 year, 10 months and 8 days old. Was married to Mr. Edward Briggs August 8th, 1869. To them 8 children were born, of which 5 are living to mourn their loss. I always found her cheerful, though afflicted and on crutches. She was a faithful wife and a good mother. She has gone where she will not need any crutches. Her body was laid to rest in the cemetery at Tabernacle to await the resurrection morn.

There shall peace abide;
There shall be thy rest,
And every longing satisfied;
With full salvation blest.

T. A. Williams.

Died at Her Brother's.

Miss Margaret Reed, after a few days' illness, departed this life at Mr. Harrison Reed's at Donnaha, Feb. 26, 1911, aged 72 years, 4 months and 29 days. She had been a professor of religion for several years, and was one of the charter members of Tabernacle M. P. Church. She lived a consistent member until the summons came from on high. She had every attention that physicians and loving ones and friends could give. She was loved by all who knew her.

She bore her sickness with meekness, and said if she was called home, she was willing to die, and ready to meet Jesus.

She leaves three brothers and one sister, and a large number of friends and relatives to mourn their loss. Her body was laid to rest in the cemetery at Mt. Pleasant M. E. Church.

When the world has passed away,
When arrives the Judgment day,
When the awful trump shall sound,
Where, O where, wilt thou be found?

T. A. Williams.

Mrs. Mattie Cecil Swain, daughter of J. F. Cecil, died at his home near High Point, N. C., March 3rd, 1911, in the 24th year of age, of consumption.

She was married to Homer Swaim last November. Her mother died about 6 years ago and Mattie had done very faithfully in house keeping and took good care of her young brothers. She was always kind to every body. She joined the Pleasant Grove M. P. Church at an early age and remained a member till her death. Her desire was to "Be right with God" and we hope this desire was fully realized by her.

The funeral services were conducted by her beloved Uncle Charles Cecil. He spoke very tenderly and lovingly of Mattie. She was buried at her church near her mother, brother and sister.

Her loving cousin.

Resolutions by the pupils of the Sandy Ridge Sunday-school for our friend and teacher Tillman Pegg:

Although death found him far from parents and schoolmates, we trust that in the loving care and kindness of his friend, Mrs. Hutchings, he did not so sadly miss the mother's love, the sister's care, or the tender sympathy of his many friends.

Although Tillman was not a member of our Sunday-school when he died all cherished a warm hope in their hearts that he would soon return and take up his life work in the place where he had attended Sunday-school first as a pupil, teacher, and last as superintendent.

But whereas God that knoweth and doeth all things right, has called him away from our midst, and taken him in the height of his noble work to dwell among the blest,

Be it resolved that we as classmates, and pupils, be more earnest and consistent in our Sunday-school that we may learn to be faithful and enjoy the work as he did.

In the latter years of his life he won many friends by his consistent Christian life and earnest work in the Sunday-school.

—Bro. Edgar Dabbs and wife lost their baby girl last Sunday morning. Whooping cough and pneumonia of only a few days. It was about 1 year and 6 months old. We buried her at Midway on Monday evening. It was sad to see them linger over the cold form. If only in this life we have hope we would be miserable, but the little one is beckoning, come, "She is not dead, but sleepeth." They have our heartfelt sympathy and we commend them to our blessed Savior, who did not forbid the children to come while He was on earth and we know heaven is all the more h aven because of the children there.

March 2, 1911.

We buried Mr. J. T. Jones of the Primitive Baptist faith, at Fair View Missionary Baptist Church last Friday at 3:30 P. M. He was nearly 82 years old. He leaves one son at home and one married daughter, the rest of the family having died in the last few years.

On Saturday at 3:30 P. M. we buried Mr. James D. Rudd at Mispah Church. He was 63 years, 2 months and 7 days old; he leaves a wife and six children. One by one we are going to our long home. O! to be ready for the call is wisdom.

OUR ANTI-NEAR BEER LAW.

We give below the full text of the near beer law, which has just been passed by the present legislature. In the house, there were only six votes recorded against it, and in the senate, only three. This bill was introduced by Dr. A. A. Kent, of Caldwell county, and we believe will accomplish the desired effect:

A Bill to Be Entitlel, "An Act to Prohibit the Sale of Near-Beer, Beerine and Other Like Drinks.

The General Assembly of North Carolina do Enact:

Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, firm or corporation to sell or dispose of for gain, near-beer, beerine, or other spiritous, vinous or malt liquors on mixtures of any kind, and under whatsoever name called, that shall contain alcohol, or cocaine, or morphine or other opium derivative, except as herein provided.

Section 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, firm or corporation, who is engaged in the sale of any kind of drinks, to refuse to allow any person to carry away from the place where said drinks are being sold or offerel for sale, any package or quantity of any size of said drink which has been bought and paid for; and if any person, firm or corporation shall refuse to allow said package or quantity of said drink to be carried away from the place of sale, it shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of this act.

Section 3. That any person or persons, firm or corporation, violating the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a mislemeanor, and fined or imprisoned, or both, for each and every offense, in the discretion of the court: Provided, that this act shall not be construed to forbid the sale of spirituous, vinous, fermented or malt liquors or intoxicating bitters by a legalized medical depository, or by any licensed and registered pharmacist, for sickness, upon the written prescription of a regularly licensed and actively practicing physician or surgeon having the person for whom said prescription is made under his charge, which said prescription shall specify the amount of spirits required; and that this act shall not be construed to prevent the sale of any alcoholic liquon to any legalized medical depository or to any licensed and registered pharmacist, or any cocaine or morphine or other opium derivative to any registered pharmacist; and that this act shall not be construed to forbid the sale of cocaine, morphine or other opium derivative by a licensed pharmacist upon a written prescription by a regular licensed physician or surgeon: Provided further, that this act shall not apply to the sale of domestic wines when sold in quanity of not less than two and one half gallons in sealed package or crated, on the premises where manufactured, or to the sale of cider in any quantity by the manufacturer from fruits grown on his land within the state of North Carolina, or to the sale of wine to any minister of religion or other officer of a church when said wine is bought for religious or sacramental purposes, or to the sale of flavoring extracts or essences when sold as such, or to the sale of medical preparations manufactured in accordance with formulas prescribed by the United States Pharmacopoeia and National Formulary which contain no more alcohol than is necessary to extract the medical properties of the drug contained in preparations, and no more alcohol than is necessary to hold the medical agents in solution, and which are manufactured and sold as medicines and not as beverages, or to the sale of any medical preparation which is manufactured, sold and used as a medicine and not as a beverage, or to the sale of carbonated drinks that contain no more than one-tenth of one per cent of alcohol, and in which drinks a flavoring agent is used, in the manufacture of which flavoring agent alcohol is used to dissolve and hold in solution or to extract from the crude material said flavoring agent.

Section 4. That this act shall be in force and effect from and after the first day of July, one Thousand nine hundred and eleven.

GREAT OLD FOLKS' BIBLE CLASS.

There is in the Sunday-school of the Baptist church in Marlboro, Mass., a Bible class so unique in some respects that it is doubtful if it can be duplicated anywhere. The most interesting thing about the class is that its teacher, Mrs. Nancy Leland, is a woman eighty-six years of age, and yet she did not miss but one Sunday with her class last year. The class has eighteen members, many of whom are grandmothers, and none are too young to enjoy that distinction. The aggregate ages of the members of the class make a total of 1,170 years. The youngest member of the class is fifty-two. The prize for unfailing attendance belongs to Mrs. S. A. Carpenter, who is sixty-two. She has for four successive years won the badge given annually to the member most constant in attendance. Regarding her Sunday-school atendance Mrs. Carpenter says: "When I was a child up in New Hampshire, I used to walk four miles to Sunday-school, when it was not convenient for my father to hitch up his horses and carry me to the village. It seemed to me that a person should not always ask the easiest way to go to divine service. That is just the way I feel now, and I wish that young folks all felt the same, and were not so often willing to make a rain-storm or a heavy snow an excuse for not attending church and Sunday-school."

The old ladies of this remarkable Bible class evidently do not allow any ordinary rain or snow-storm to keep them away from the class, and when a woman now in her eighty-sixth year is in her place as teacher of a Bible class every Sunday but one for a year, it argues well for her good health and her fidelity to duty.—J. L. H. in Christian Herald.

Married.—Mr. Clarkson S. Julian and Miss Elsie Z. Hays came to the editor's residence last Friday evening and took upon themselves matrimonial vows in the presence of a few neighbors. They came from Millboro, Randolph Co. They are young people of character, and we hope for them a happy life together.

A CANARY'S LIFE IN A LONDON SLUM.

A Prose Poem.

To and fro, wires to perch and back,
For six long years a weary prison-house,
Pining for Sun and Air and Love. Yet ever
Bravely seeming to be gay, with piteous
Chirp at careless eyes that looked through bars.
At night, a ball of feathers swaying slightly
To and fro till dawn, but to repeat through Long hours the same, one weary hop. Years passed Spring—Summer—Autumn—Winter. Till
One grey dawn upon the dirty sand she lay,
Claw-clenched, and stiff and still. The seed box
Empty—the cracked saucer dry. For five days
Weakening—Neglected and forgotten—Then sank
Lower and lower on her one perch. Still lower Crouched—till at last the little heart stopped Beating, and she fell. And passed from cruel man
To God's great rest.

E. Barton, in Animals' Guardian.

A LESSON IN MECHANICS.

Having a knowledge of structural work one soon learns not only to respect that kind of work, but also the men who do it; and following on this, and by a natural precess, one gains a respect for life as the higest form of structural work. When I first went to Australia I thought I knew a great deal, for the university can certainly turn out men who can pass examinations; but it was not till I had put up a workshop in my home and made myself familiar with one or two trades that I felt that I had completed my apprenticeship to life. I learned to respect the work and the workman, and more especially the beautiful work of the Creator. When I gained proficiency at the bench I had to give up shooting, because of the great respect I had developed for that wonderful piece of machinery—a bird on the wing. My feelings of pride at my skill in shooting a flying bird were changed into feelings of shame as the little creature lay at my feet—the work of its Creator ruthlessly destroyed. I felt that I had no right to destroy what I could not put together again.—Sir John Cockburn.

PRACTICING THE GOLDEN RULE.

"Harvey, dear, I wonder whether you could wash this floor for me?"

Mamma's face was white, and one hand was pressed against her aching head.

Harvey was getting ready to go out coasting, and was just pulling on his mittens. He was about to say, "Can't Alice do it?" when he remembered that his sister had gone to her room with toothache right after dinner.

What a nice chance this would be to practice the "Golden Rule" Miss Archibald had been talking to them about in Sunday school for the past few weeks! "Do unto others" what you'd like to have them "do unto you."

Harvey stood tugging at his mittens with a frown on his brow. Willie Christmas had tied his sled string together for him the other day, because he had hurt his finger, and could not manage the rope. Willie didn't want to stop, because Joe Gooding and the other boys of his class were having a race; and Harvey was only one of the fourth-grade boys—"kids," Willie and his gang liked to call them!

"But he did it," reasoned Harvey as one hand crept slowly out of its mitten; "he did it even though he lost his place in the line of sleds, when he might easily have been first, if it hadn't been for me. He didn't call on another boy to help do the job either, as I wanted Alice to do," Harvey kept on assuring himself, until at last the other hand got out of its mitten, and a cheerful voice said: "Yes, mamma, I can wash the floor for you."

Then came a knock at the back door which Harvey answered.

Ray Newton and Joe Gooding had got tired waiting, and had called for him.

"I can't go coasting this afternoon; I've got to help my fother," Harvey announced.

"Why can't your sister help her? It isn't a boy's place to do work around the house. I never have to," argued Joe Gooding with something like a sneer on his face.

Harvey did not stop to explain that his mother was sick, and that his sister had the toothache—he did not think it necessary.

"Come on, fellows; let the baby help his mother if he wants to. We don't have to do girl's work," sang out Ray Newton jeeringly as he hurried out of the yard.

A spot of red glowed on Harvey's cheek as he shut the door quietly, so as not to disturb the white-faced mother, who flashed him a grateful glance as she slowly crept up stairs to her room.

Two hours later, refreshed and eased of her pain, Mrs. Crafts entered her kitchen again, to find the floor sweet and clean from a soap-suds bath, the sink tidied up, and everything in order, while a bright-eyed little boy stood where he had stood earlier in the afternoon again drawing on his mittens, with not a suspicion of a frown upon his happy face.

"If yon don't need be any longer, mamma, I'll go out coasting now," he said pleasantly.

"If my little son only knew how much he has helped his mother this afternoon, I think he would not regret having his coasting trip delayed a while," his mother answered as she kissed the rosy cheek of her little son.

Harvey's heart sang a happy coasting song as he sped downhill on his sled, "Racer." And not a boy ventured to say a word to him about the work which had delayed him—somehow they did not feel like doing it.—Helen M. Richardson.

WHAT MAKES A GREAT LIFE.

Do not try to do a great thing; you may waste all your life waiting for the opportunity which may never come. But since little things are always claiming your attention, do them as they come, from a great motive, for the glory of God, to win a smile of approval; do good to men. It is harder to plod on in obscurity, acting thus, than to stand on the high places of the field, within the view of all, and do deeds of valor at which rival armies stand still to gaze. But no such act goes without the swift recognition and the ultimate recompense of Christ. To fulfil faithfully the duties of your station; to use to the uttermost the gifts of your ministry; to bear chaffing and trivial irritations as martyrs bore the pillory and stake; to find the one noble trait in people who try to molest you; to put the kindest construction on unkind acts and words; to love with the love of God even the unthankful and evil; to be content to be a fountain in the midst of a wild valley of stones, nourishing a few lichens and wild flowers, or now and again a thirsty sheep; and to do this always, and not for the praise of man, but for the sake of God—this makes a great life.—F. B. Meyer.

THOUGHT PEARLS.

O ye who taste that love is sweet
Set waymarks for the doubtful feet
That stumble on in search of it
Sing notes of love, that some who hear
Far off, inert, may lend an ear,
Rise up and wonder and draw near.
Lead lives of love, that others who
Behold your lives may kindle, too
With love, and cast their lots with you.

Christina Rossetti.

"Be true to self, be kind to all,
Be true always to the God above you;
And after death, you'll have a home
In heaven and in the hearts that love you."

FAMINE IN CHINA.

Sufferers Selling Their Children.

The Rev. E. C. Lobenstine (A. B. C. F. M.), of Hwai Yuen, writes: "I personally am of the opinion that money spent on relief will be of direct service to the church. Two cents gold will keep a person alive a day. Two dollars will save one from now till the wheat harvest. Ten dollars will save a family from starvation. I am advocating the purchase of bean cake and millet in Manchuria. These can be shipped directly to Nanking in a short time and from there the new railroad can carry the grain and cake to a point thirty miles from here, from whence it can be distributed. The magistracy of Hwai Yuen has an estimated population of approximately 300,000 persons. The number of 'famine sufferers' (in Hwai Yuen), those who must be relieved or die, is approximately 175,000 persons. Reports come in daily of people dying of starvation. The poor who have children are trying to sell them, but even they will not sell for a pittance. Help is needed at once. As soon as the real cold and wet weather sets in the death rate will increase greatly. I have gone over my estimate of a few weeks ago, that, in all, 1,000,000 people would be dependent on outside relief or probably die of starvation. The missionaries in this section are ready to distribute relief."

TO HELP THE STARVING CHINESE.

We will be glad to acknowledge and forward any amounts sent us for this purpose. We will send through the Christian Herald, of New York. What thou doest, do quickly. People in China are hungry now, and soon will be dead, if not relieved.

NOTICE.

Please see announcement regarding Rev. C. H. Hubbell's coming (last week's Herald, 1st page) and let me know at once what I shall do. We have heard from several brethren, but think it possible to put in one or two more appointments. The places ripe for organization have first claim, but if there are not enough of these, then places where in a year or two C. E. Societies (Junior or Young People's) may be organized may be visited by Bro. Hubbell with profit to the work. I want to publish list of appointments next week. J. F. McCulloch.

Answers to Assigned Questions.

20. The term God almighty implies Creator and Ruler. Prior to this time God had appeared to his people as an all-powerful God. But now he appears unto the Jews as their covenant-God on Sovereign Ruler of the Theocracy.

Jehovah (from Hebrew letters Yhvh) was considered too sacred a word for the Jews to utter. Adonai was used in its stead.

Yours truly,
Mrs. R. A. Swaringen.

24. I think "borrow" in Ex. 3:22 means request or demand.

Mrs. W. J. Mason.

(Yes, it means simply to ask. It is unfortunate that the word was ever translated "borrow", as this implies dishonesty on the part of the Israelites, since they did not expect to return the things asked for.)

Questions.

26. Did God know whether Adam and Eve would obey the Divine Command? Or, in other words, does God know what course man will pursue, or does he withhold His omniscience? I believe, certainly, that God has power to know the future of man, but may He not choose to withhold his omniscient power in this respect as Christ did His concerning the time of the final judgment?

Yours truly,
R. A. Swaringen.

27. When did God first call Israel "my people?"

28. How can we reconcile God's conduct in hardening Pharoah's heart with our conception of God's character as a being of perfect goodness?

Question 26 is referred to Mrs. Curry; 27 to Mrs. Reynolds; 28 to Mrs. Kennett.

Lesson for Next Week.

Leviticus, first 14 chapters.

—The growth of our High Point church and Sunday school is gratifying. A similar growth might be realized at some other points if the right effort were made. Are we risking enough in planting churches? Once in a while a mistake may be made in planting a church where it cannot live and grow; but is there not more danger of failing to plant where splendid life and growth could be realized?

—An aviator recently flew across the Mediterranean Sea, a distance of 124 miles.

CHURCH COLLEGES.

If people could appreciate the natural obligation of church membership to the church college, it would make raising money for the college more of a pleasure and less of a task. The public school can no more meet the requirements of education than public roads can meet all the requirements of travel and traffic. States need state institutions and churches need church institutions. These institutions represent the ideas, tenets, character, purposes of their constituencies, and create sentiments, centers, influences that maintain and advance the interests of such bodies. The great daily papers cannot meet the moral and spiritual needs of a denomination. There must be a church paper—an organ as the mouthpiece of the organization; so the church college is the expression of the educational aspiration and endeavor of the denomination. It challenges the confidence and support of the membership of the church.

In reading the history of the United States I find that most of the generals in her armies were graduates of West Point. That simply illustrates the fact that most of the ministers come from church colleges. What would the nation be without ministers? What would the church be without ministers? When the question is followed to its ultimate there is no standing ground for the objector or the indifferent.

It may be illustrated in another way. There is county tax or city tax and then there is state tax. The payment of local taxes does not exempt the citizen from the State tax though he has never been to the Capitol of his state, and receives no direct benefit from the State. His county or city could not exist without the state and all his local pride and support are linked with the state; so local church pride and support are only partial in their demands, and members who go no further are not feeling all the obligations of church membership. An adequate distribution of benevolences and support from church members always includes the denominational college. It is the center, the heart of the denomination, receiving its vital force from the churches and then sending this force back through the body, purified and ready to vitalize the whole sy tem.

—Secretary Ballinger has resigned. Ill health the cause. President Taft expresses the highest confidence in Mr. Ballinger, and asserts that he has been made the victim of a conspiracy of which the ultimate object is the president himself. We wonder what can have provoked so strong an expression from Mr. Taft.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

FROM PRESIDENT SWAIN.

Feb. 16-18 was spent at Fallston with Bro. W. D. Reed in a circuit rally for Cleveland circuit. The weather was somewhat unfavorable which no doubt kept some away who would have been present. Then, too, there was much sickness in the community. I very much regretted that I could not visit brother Luther Lutz, who, I am sorry to say, is in poor health. Notwithstanding the causes above mentioned there was a fairly good congregation at each service. There were three services each day except Sat. On that day there were but two.

Besides the pastor, Rev. W. D. Reed, brother H. W. Braswell of the Caroleen charge was there at all the meetings. Brother T. F. McCulloch and wife were there Thursday and Sat. Brother Bert Ivester of Kistler's church was with us on Sunday. It was refreshing to meet with all these good brother preachers. Their very presence was an inspiration.

Cleveland circuit is in fine condition. The pastor is justly popular. He is tireless in his efforts to minister to his people and has the happy faculty of winning their implicit confidence.

On Monday, Feb. 20, Brother Reed took me to Shelby to Brother H. W. Braswell's. The afternoon was very disagreeable. At night we held a service in the graded school auditorium. Very few present. During the afternoon Brother Braswell took me to see the corner lot purchased for the contemplated church in Shelby. We have some excellent people here who have been too long without a church home. The lot purchased is somewhat removed from all the other churches in town and is near the center of our members. Our people there are enthusiastic over the prospect of a church and some of the children have begun to save their pennies and nickels and seem glad of the opportunity to give. Lumber is remarkably cheap and our people can build now much cheaper than if they wait a year or two. I consider the prospect good and believe with the proper management, a strong church can be built here. Caroleen is moving up well, and the pastor also preaches in Lincolnton. Here, also, we have quite a number of members who are also anxious for a church. Many, who having grown tired waiting for us to come, have gone into other churches, but say they are coming back when there is anything to come to.

These people need help from the Board of Church Extension, but they decline to ask it now. They propose to make good and reach their limit before they ask for any thing. The charge is weak as yet and unless the pastor can get as much as one hundred and fifty dollars from the Board of Church Extension it is feared he will be greatly embarrassed. This last named matter should be considered as early as possible. Next week some about Lebanon, Lebanon circuit.

Very truly,

W. E. Swain.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

Fifty-three M. P. Hymnals have been ordered for our Graham church. Others have been ordered for private use. These added to the number we already have on hand will make quite an improvement in our services. The amount necessary to pay for these books have been raised by voluntary contributions. In all probability, the Sunday-school will soon make a purchase of some new Sunday-school song books.

The Baraca and Philathea classes are doing their work in a very encouraging and satisfactory manner.

On last Friday we laid to rest in Mt. Zion cemetery the body of our departed friend Daniel Lineberry, who was 59 years old. For a number of years he was a consistent member of Mt. Zion Baptist Church.

On last Sunday afternoon we buried the body of Mary Wood who was 49 years old.

These were both great sufferers but bore their suffering very patiently.

Sunday-school attendance last Sunday at Graham was 71.

Geo. L. Curry.

Concord.

The services at Fair View church on last Sunday at 11 o'clock were well attended. The church has been completed, except some work at the windows; weight are yet to be put in.

Several dollars were raised toward painting the church on the outside. We trust that it will soon be put on.

At night the attendance was better than usual, as there was no service at the Baptist church near us.

An offering was taken for the Denton Orphanage. A fair collection was received at both churches.

We wish to acknowledge the following for our new church in Albemarle:

Mrs. A. S. Pickett, $2.00; Board of Church Extension, $65.00; Rev. J. F. McCulloch, $2.00.

We thank the Board of Church Extension for the above allowance, and assure that the gift of each contributor is much appreciated. Such enables us to go forward and that is what we wish to do, and as there is room for others to encourage and help us we are asking that you still remember us and help us a little while longer, so that the last cent of our church obligations be paid.

We now want to begin seating the church. An estimated cost of each bench is $2.00.

How many among our people would like to put a bench in our new church? Every one that will let me hear from you at once, enclosing $2.00 for that purpose.

On the 4th Sunday in April we want to begin a special meeting at this place. Rev. J. D. Williams of Burlington is to be with us in the meeting. So we ask that every body that can with your prayers and with your means help us get ready for a great meeting.

It Got Out.

A chicken thief entered Rev. C. E. M. Raper's henhouse and stole 9 nice hens, leaving 6 half grown, one hen and one rooster. It seemed laughable to some—the idea of stealing chickens from a preacher. Sister Mary Hopkins, of Midway, feeling for the preacher, sent him a nice hen and Bro. Fletcher Stallings of Mispah did likewise. We have been kindly remembered by Sister Sallie Cummings, Bro. and Sister Kennodle, Bro. Fletcher Stallings—eggs, butter, dried fruits, preserves. Bro. Levi Dixon, milk several times; Bro. and Sister Jack Porter, potatoes; Bro. Walter Maxwell, sausage. We simply can't express our thanks.

We are hoping, working and praying for a good year.

Fraternally,

Pastor.

High Point.

Some days ago, in looking over some old copies of Our Church Record, I came a cross this little bit of interesting history: interesting because of the progress made by the Sunday-school in seven years' time. The bit of history that I found was written in 1904 and was as follows: "The Secretary of the Sunday school reports an average attendance of 100 3-4 for February. March opened up with 113 in attendance."

This year the average attendance in the Sunday-school for February was 206, and March opened up with 220 in attendance. So you see the average attendance for February was more than doubled, and the attendance for the first Sunday in March would have been more than doubled had there not been a falling off in the Old Men's Class, and in the Baraca Class last Sunday. Seven years ago the Sunday-school classes all met in one room and was a perfect babel of voices. Today each class has its own class room except the Old Men's Class. A few months ago the Philathea's gave up their individual class room because of our growing need for more class rooms. They went into the church auditorium with the understanding that in the near future they would have a new and larger room of their own into which to go. The spirit of giving up and of waiting on the part of that one class is very commendable. I think there is not another class in the school that would have done as they have done.

We hope the day is not far distant when they will have a splendid room in which to meet.

All departments of the church work seem to be doing well.

I feel it my duty to write a few lines in regard to our church and new pastor, Rev. J. W. Self. He preached an able sermon Feb. 19.; enjoyed by all, though, the weather being threatening, there were not very many out.

We have not yet a Sunday school, but are talking of organizing one and hope to succeed.

Our pastor will preach for us again the third Sunday in March.

With best wishes,

Bethel, Alamance Circuit.

Rev. W. M. Pike filled his regular appointment at Bethel last third Sunday and preached an excellent sermon as he always does.

Rev. G. W. Holmes preached an interesting and instructive sermon on missions last fifth Sunday.

Misses Lalah Stallings and Arka Zackary closed a very successuf school last Friday. As they go to their respective homes the best wishes of their many friends around Bethel go with them.

Our Sunday-school is progressing nicely and as spring is about here; we hope to increase our attendance and interest.

N. C. Branch, Bethel Auxiliary.

We held our annual thank offering service the 5th Sunday in Jan. Instead of our usual program, Rev. G. W. Holmes preached an excellent sermon on missions, which was very interesting and instructive. We trust our auxiliary received a lasting good. Collection was $5.42. Total amount raised during year nearly $22.00.

We are going to try calendar plan. Hope to do our best yet.

Present at S. S. last Sunday, 245; collection, $4.46. A good attendance and a beautiful day. The Baptist S. S. here had 327 and the M. E.'s. 277. For a long time we led in attendance every week, but these two Sunday-schools have gone to work, and they are leading at present. It seems that none of our people are working now. But we are getting aroused again, and are expecting our school to again come up with these.

The pastor preached Sunday morning on "The Seven Abominations," and at night on "How to be Saved." Two good sermons. A large number communed at the morning service.

More visitors out to hear Bro. Taylor yesterday. After his discourse, he told the congregation of our little debt on church and asked if there were any who wanted to help us get this debt off. That semed sufficient. One after another contributed, so wilingly, so freely they gave, apparently, we were out of debt in five minutes. Out of debt with half of the pews paid for. These were placed in church Saturday.

Other half of pews are to be bought, church to be painted and pulpit to be furnished before the church can be dedicated. A chance for any one who hasn't helped us to do so now. Don't you want to help us?

Having had so much to do, re-election of S. S. officers was deferred until last Sunday.

Same officers were re-elected. Mr. M. J. Morris, Supt.; A. E. Carter, Asst. Supt.; Miss Lena Carter, Sec.; Miss Julia Carter, organist. Mr. Morris resigned, then Mr. Clarence Carter was elected. Sunday school believes he can fill this place is why they elected him.

In our last Ladies' Aid meeting, Miss Mary and Lizzie Robertinson, Eula and Nora Morris, Hattie and Lizzie Brown, and Lessie Parks joined us. With seven new members we are encouraged to renew our energy. There are others who are willing to help us but can't attend our meetings.

Miss Irene Walker has returned home from a visit among relatives in Martin Co.

Mr. Geo. S. Barnes of Newport News visited his parents Mr. and Mrs. Geo. L. Barnes, since I last reported.

Miss Eva Glasglow is visiting friends now in and near Halifax town.

There was no preaching service at this place yesterday on account of the illness of the pastor. Bro. Millaway has been confined to his room with lagrippe in the most malignant form for four weeks or more, but is improving slowly. Mrs. Millaway has been indisposed for more than a week also, but is better at this time.

During these weeks Bro. Millaway's pulpit has been filled by good men of this and other denominations, several times. Mr. O. W. Hanner who was elected Supt. of the Sunday-school but because of various reasons could not take charge the first of the year, has been with us the past two Sundays, and will continue during the year. We think he is the right man in the right place and see no reason why this Sunday-school should not be one of the best in the city.

Dear Editor:

Today was class meeting day and we had a very good attendance, and much interest was manifested in the meeting. The Holy Spirit made us feel that it was good for us to be there. Our Sunday-school was well attended, though some a little late. Our school is not as large as some others, and not as large as it should be. There is yet much work to be done to get others interested. Our Bible Class is generally well represented. Fathers and mothers that have been coming here a long time, never too tired to say no, when the Spirit says go. Oh! what a great encouragement their presence is to their unworthy Superintendent. It makes him feel that life is worth living, and that there is great joy in a life devoted to the service of God. It makes me work harder, pray more, for the Spirit's power. May the Lord help me to do my full duty. I cannot forget the young people that so faithfully attend the school and church services. Some of them not missed a Sunday in over a year and others only when sick. They too are of much value. Words fails me when I try to express my appreciation for their encouragement. Notwithstanding the opposition the ungodly will give us, let us work together with God for the salvation of souls, always looking to Jesus for the reward he is waiting to give us when our work here is done. I earnestly ask the prayers of all Christian people, that God may use me for good. This is my first letter to the Herald, and if it escapes the waste basket I may write again.

Success to the Herald and its readers.

Sincerely,

J. C. Allred.

Tabernacle, Tabernacle Ct.

Our Sunday School has recently been much interested and benefited, too, by a study and discussion of the question: What was the greatest miracle performed by Christ?

The second quarterly conference for this circuit will be held in the Julian Church, March 18, at 11 A. M. On the Sunday following Pastor Cecil will be in Julian at the eleven o'clock service and with Tabernacle congregation in the afternoon. Sunday school at 2 P. M. on this day.

The Clay Township Sunday school Convention will be held at Coble's Church Saturday, March 18. A good representation from the various Sunday schools in the Township is desired and a pleasant and profitable time is expected.

The Tabernacle public school taught by Mr. R. M. Gladstone and Miss May Coble will close next Friday, March 10. The Greensboro J. O. U. M. will present the school with a flag and Bible at this time.

Dear Editor:

Please allow space in the record for a few notes from Canaan, a new church. We have been holding services in a school house ever since we organized.

Bro. T. A. Plyer was with us the fourth Sunday evening in Feb. and preached an able sermon. The house was full and running over. The interest seems to be great. We all love Bro. Plyer and believe through his hands the Lord will do great work at this place. We are expecting to hold the next service in the new building which will be the fourth Sunday evening in March at 3 o'clock.

With best wishes to paper and its readers, I remain your brother.

Albemarle.

We have been keeping the "even tenor of our way," since Conference. Nothing "new, strange nor startling"—as Prof. Yerexs used to say—has occurred. The appointments have been filled. We have an evergreen Sunday school at Creswell. It is not large, but does not "quit." The Sunday school at Rehobeth continues, under adverse circumstances. The children were given a Christmas tree at Rehoboth, after Christmas, as it was not practicable at Christmas. The Creswell Sunday-school had an entertainment, and "presents," or a "treat," for the children at Christmas. It has not been found practicable to have regular Sunday school at other points on the work. Sunday schools are badly needed, but persons to conduct them have not been found. Real missionary work is needed at some of our churches. Work after the ordinary method does not meet the need or condition. Real primary, fundamental teaching of the first principles of religion is needed. The "made to order" things in the Sunday school literature does not meet the case. The young need not to be taught, simply, but untaught many things. And this requires something more than the ordinary equipment. It requires much patience, prayer, faith and earnest, persistent work. It requires a knowledge of the Bible, of human nature and of God, to meet the need. But the souls of the people here are as dear to God as any where. But what are we to do? Give up? Quit? Because it do not seem to "pay?" Cut down "appropriations" and leave the pastor to "pick up" his living as best he can? The work is too far from the ocean to gather clams and oysters for a living, and fish do not come up into the houses here, as the frogs did in the land of Egypt, to be scaled. They have to be bought, for cash at about the same figures as 200 miles west of here. This, as a number of other places, is a case of a "country preacher" living in town, and having to pay town prices for what he eats—40 cts. per lb for butter and other things in proportion. Wood and coal have to be bought at a healthy price—not "donated."

We have a number of good, self-denying, self-sacrificing persons here who need encouraging. We could gives names if it were necessary.

We want to say, that since Conference we have received quite a number of gifts from our own people and some from M. E. and Baptists, in the way of fresh meat, potatoes, vegetables, etc.

A new organ has been placed in the church at Creswell, and gasoline lights are being put in on trial.

Small-pox near Rehoboth has hindered somewhat in the work there, but we trust that the worst is past.

If a man will travel here a while, and observe and think—see beyond the end of his nose—he will be convinced that Bro. Hicks is not so far off the track—if off at all—as some seem to think. We should be a Christian first, a Methodist second—if a Methodist at all—and a Methodist Protestant third. Not first, a Methodist Protestant, second a Methodist, and third and last a Christian.

We surely enjoy reading the communications of Bro. Wm. M. Stevenson, of Giles Chapel. I have never met Bro Stevenson, but heard my old class-leader, Bro. G. M. Lamb, speak of Bro. Stevenson a third of a century ago, as being an excellent school teacher. Bro. Stevenson, we love to hear from you, and though I know you not "by face," I hope to see you in the great wonder-disclosing hereafter.

Though living on the low coastal plain, but a few feet above ocean level, we often think of, and long for, our native hills—like to hear from them. But God is here, God of the plains, as well as God of the hills.

J. F. Dosier.

Dear Herald:—We had the pleasure of hearing our pastor, Bro. W. F. Ashburn, fill his regular appointment here last Sunday morning at his regular hour. He preached an excellent sermon to a large and attentive congregation, using as a text Prov. 27:19.

Our S. S. is very good but can still be improved. We are hoping to have an Easter service here this time and would be glad to have all who will take a part to join us. I always think they are nice to have in all churches. We also hope it will be so that our president, Dr. Swain, can visit our church this year. We are always delighted to have him with us. I am glad to report that Mr. Willie Bowen, one of our young members who has been very low, has returned home from Memorial Hospital in Richmond and to say he is improving very much.

We hope he may soon be restored to perfect health and usefulness.

I will close with the very best wishes to the many Herald readers.

THE GIFT OF FAITH AND THE GRACE OF FAITH.

In the interest of clear thought and Scriptural truth, the distinction between these two kinds of faith should be ever kept in mind. In 1 Cor. 12: 9, faith is one of the nine charisms, or extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, not bestowed upon all Christians alike, but severally, as the Spirit wills. It is defined by Wesley as "the inwrought assurance that God in answer to prayer will grant this or that petition." There is no need of saying, "If it be Thy will." Of course this gift is supernatural. Theologians call it fides miraculosa, miraculous or mountain-removing faith. It is so far from being a grace that Paul teaches that it may exist separate from love. This is not so clearly seen in the English as it is in the original: "Though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing." The Greek of this sentence denotes that the condition, faith without love, is quite possible, wholly unlike that in which there is no expectation that the condition will be realized, such as: "If the sky should fall, we would catch larks." An instance of this gift of faith is found in James 5: 17, where Elijah prayed for a drought of three years and six months long. The faith that asks a curse like a distressing famine, cannot be a grace; it must be a divine gift that gave pain to the receiver. This is quoted as descriptive of the gift of faith, not the grace of faith, required for healing the sick through the elders of the church. This knocks the bottom out of that doctrine of divine healing which requires its missionaries to go into malarious climes without a medicine chest, presuming on the gift of faith, which is not promised to all Christians. Paul did not have it at all times, for, though in great need of preachers, he says: "Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick." As for himself, while sick in Asia Minor, Dr. Luke came to him, and accompanied him on most of his subsequent journeys for the care of his health, I doubt not. Anothdifference is that no one is culpable for the absence of the gift of faith, while the absenceof the grace of faith is the root of all sin. This is because every one under the Atonement has the ability to repent and believe. "He that believeth not is condemned already."

Again, the gift of faith is not saving, but the grace of faith is. If it should be asserted that this, too, is the gift of God, we reply that the capacity to believe, the object of faith, the Lord Jesus, and the grounds of faith, the Holy Scriptures, are the gifts of God, but the exercise of that capacity in appropriating that object is my own act.

If Eph. 2: 8 is quoted against this doctrine, "By grace have ye been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God," the Greek student will tell you that the word "that" does not refer to faith, but to salvation. This is confirmed by the answer to the question: "What is not of works?" We must reply, "Salvation." If we say "Faith," it would make Paul utter truism. Some of my readers may hold up their hands in holy horror that there is a faith in Christ that does not change the character, that does not work by love, purify the heart, and overcome the world. Wesley's notes on Matt. 7: 22 and 17: 20 are: "So that the working of miracles is no proof that a man has saving faith;" and: "Many have had it (faith to remove mountains) who thereby cast out devils, and yet will at last have their portion with them." For the encouragment and comfort of every humble lover of Christ, I affirm that simple, sanctifying trust in Christ is to be preferred to the showy, wonderful works wrought by the perilous gift of faith. I do not wonder that Paul closes his description of the nine charisms in 1 Cor. 12 with these words: "But I show unto you a more excellent way," and then opens his magnificant eulogy on love, called by Drummond "the greatest thing in the world." The Corinthian church gave Paston Paul far more trouble than any other because of its abuse of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit bestowed more bountifully upon them. They were carnal, wrangling about preachers, divided into cliques, full of strife, envious, running after false teachers, turning the Lord's Supper into a feast of appetite and drunkenness, while their Sabbath assemblies were disorderly, several speaking at the same time, some in unknown tongues, pell mell. I have never offered a prayer for the restoration of the nine charisms, and I am thankful that none of my fifteen pastorates were as troublesome as Paul's was at Corinth.

Once I was called to visit a venerable saint on his sick bed. I found his class-leader there, who strongly believed in faith-healing. I prayed for healing, if it was in God's will. The wife and the class leader objected to the "if" in my prayer and said that they would pray that "he might be healed any way." Being regarded as a sort of unbeliever, I left the room. They continued in prayer. In a few hours the old saint died in peace. I asked the class-leader why the unconditional prayer of the two had failed. He answered: "The faith of the old woman at last broke down." Often the sick man in such failures is accused of unbelief. This was thus sarcastically and ironically criticised by Dr. Samuel Johnson of England: "The sick man is a rascal."

In the summer of 1881 the following colloquy of two young girls was overheard: "So many millions are praying for President Garfield I am sure he will get well." "I doubt it." "Then you don't believe God answers prayer?" "Yes, I do. Sometimes He answers 'Yes,' and sometimes, 'No.'"—Daniel Steele in Zion's Herald.

FUTURE PUNISHMENT.

How timid we preachers are becoming about future punishment! Seldom do we hear allusion to judgment after death. And yet there is no better proved fact by the present experiences of mankind, than that suffering follows transgression of law —civil, sanitary, financial, social or domestic.

It is plainly contrary to the Bible and to ordinary philosophy to suppose a time when there will be no bad persons in the universe, unless they have been destroyed.

A prison is needed. The existence in hell is not to prepare for heaven. There must be an "end of sin," and an end of trial and probation, in order that sinners may not entice others to sin.

Eternal judgment is a phrase consistent with the infinity of God, appropriate to the evil of sin, and is an explanation of the anxiety of angels about sinners , and their "joy in heaven when one repenteth."

The sugar-coated namby-pamby of superficial thinkers, doing away with the punishment of sin because of the love of God, should not have influence with solid men; for criminals are not proper judges of law, or penalty, since crime blunts the moral sense. We must accept the sentence of the judge. The executive only can pardon. And he has plainly stated the terms.

Vice is only in part its own penalty; for the conscience may become seared by being disregarded and ignored; so that the sinner takes delight in his wickedness, and seems to prefer to "believe a lie and be damned."

Preachers, you cannot convert the world while ignoring the penalties for sin.—J. J. Summerbell, in Christian Vanguard.

THE ORGANIZED CLASS—ITS PRINCIPLES.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

The Organized Class Movement will soon be 21 years old. In 1890 Marshall A. Hudson originated the idea in Syracuse, N. Y., calling his class the Baraca Class. Since then the Organized Class or Adult Bible Class Movement under various names has spread around the world. What does this movement stand for? What are its cardinal principles?

The fundamental principles underlying the movement are four-fold—organic connection with Sunday school, loyalty to the Church, devotion to Bible study, and Christian service. The Organized Class is an organic part of the Sunday school, reports to it, contributes to its expenses, is subject to it, and counsels for its welfare and development. This, however, does not preclude the right of such a class to carry on enterprises of its own distinct from the activities of the whole school. Many such classes make large contributions to Missions, home or foreign or both, to the Christian Orphanage, to any enterprise worthy as it appears to them. The class should have a separate room of its own for recitation purposes.

The Organized Class is also loyal to the Church. It must tolerate nothing which the local church with which it is connected does not endorse or approve. Further than this it is an organization tending to build up the Church in membership, in efficiency, in spiritual life and influence, in every way possible adding to its prestige and power.

The Organized Class is in the third place devoted to Bible study. The teacher of such a class should be skilled in getting his pupils to study the Bible. No study is so interesting as Bible study and none yields so large returns in life and character development. If your pupils do not study the Bible, something is fundamentally wrong. If you can't right it, you had better resign. I would not tolerate in a Sunday School of mine one of these so-called Organized Classes which study at the regular Sunday school hour courses in Social Science, Health Culture, Farm Life, etc. If the class desires to investigate such themes, let it be at another than the regular meeting hour of the Sunday school. At this hour there should be Bible study.

Then the Organized Bible Class stands for Christian Service. This it accomplishes by its Committe organization. There are membership committees, social committees, sick and visiting and flower committees, music and missionary and publicity committees—committees on any and every conceivable line of Church work, not in any one class however. Through these the members are enabled to get good training in Christian Service. And such service is necessary for the growth and fruition of the Christian life. The lack of the opportunity to do such work has led to the dwarfing of many promising young Christians and to the back-sliding of many times more. The successful Church not only converts the sinner and enrolls him in its record book, but supplies him work to do. Such work the Organized Class provides.

C. E. TOPIC FOR MARCH 19—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

The Right Use of Money: Prov. 14: 24; 1 Tim. 6: 17-19.

A Leaderless Meeting.—The Topic Committee of the United Society has provided for variety's sake that this should be a leaderless meeting. This does not fean that the meeting is not to be planned for. On the other hand it will mean more careful planning than a meeting with a leader. When the Society has met, let the one designated to look after the prayer-part of the service request some one to lead in prayer. Later on in the meeting he will call for further prayers and for the concluding prayer. There will be another to look after the music in a similar way. A third will voluntarily so far as the Society is concerned, but by prearrangement read the Scripture and comment. Another will make a talk that would admirably take the place of the leader's talk and there will be voluntarily answers given to questions that have been haunded out and voluntary giving of Scripture verses that have been arranged for beforehand and brief comment thereon. Such a meeting ought to be most interesting.

A Suggestive Talk:—Ours is a money-making age and our land pre-eminently a money-making land. What shall be done with the money we make? There has been a tendency to condemn money-making. This is wrong. Wealthy men are necessary. It is as much the duty of some men to make money as of others to preach the gospel or edit newspapers Money-making is a good gift and not to be despised. If money is honestly and honorably made and used and dedicated to the uses of God and our fellow-men, it is all right. We can serve God with mammon, but we cannot serve God and mammon. Do not stop with making money but regard its use as Christian stewardship.

Questions for Voluntary Answer:

Why is money necessary to business?

Why to the Church?

Why for missions?

What is the right use of money?

What does the Bible say about rich men?

What does it say about poor men?

What is the true riches?

Why is miserliness wrong?

Name some wrong uses of money. (To several).

Name some proper uses of money. (To several.)

What is tainted money?

What is real charity?

What do you think of church fairs to raise money?

How may we learn the true use of money?

When is giving not charity?

How may there be charity in not giving?

Scripture Verses:—Take your concordance and from it find such verses as you deem appropriate under the following heads: Avarice, Pride, Merchandise, Benevolence, charity, helpfulness, money, silver and gold and price.

C. E. CONVENTION MAY 25-28, 1911.

One of the most important announcements that comes to us at this time each year is that of the meeting of our Denominational C. E. Convention. Some of these gatherings have been largely attended, and some have not received the support that is due them, but whatever the support has been, the fact remains that there is nothing more important to any church than the conserving and directing its young life.

Expecting and soliciting the fullest support of our great body of Endeavorers representing every conference of our church, we are glad to announce the Denominational C. E. Convention of the Methodist Protestant Church for May 25-28 in the city of Columbus, Ohio.

We believe that this convention will be largely attended, and we promise that it will be representative in many ways. We are planning a strong program that will include a number of the best known men of our church. One of the features will be,

An Afternoon With Our Ex-Presidents.

We are sure that it will be a treat to many of our workers to meet and hear the men who have been leading in this work for a number of years; men whose faces and voices are already familiar to many. At this time we wish to bring one special request to our workers, and this is that you Plan Now for Your Representation.

We have now less than three months until our convention, and this means that there is no time to idle. We ask that our local officers and that our conference union officers also begin work at once. We trust that there will be many of our members and friends who will plan to come on their own account, for we are sure that the trip will be worth while. We have received copies of conference minutes from five conferences; we would very much appreciate copies of minutes from other secretaries as this will help us in our work.

Expecting the help of all our workers, and looking forward to a glad and gracious season of fellowship, I am, Your Fellow Worker,

I also think Little Ruth Vuncanon has set a good example for the little folks. She writes that she has two hens and she sells the eggs and sends the money to the little orphans. I hope some of the little folks will ask their Mammas to let them have some hens and will do as well as Ruth has done.

A Large Family.

Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Vickrey, of Level Cross on the Randleman charge, are the parents of 13 children, 12 of whom lived to be grown up and married, one having died in infancy. They have 80 grandchildren and 27 great grandchildren and they are both living and well for people of their age. Mr. Vickrey is 78 and Mrs. Vickrey is 76. They are M. P's. and trained their children that way and their nine girls all joined the M. P. Church at Level Cross, but since they married and moved off some of them have moved their membership to other churches. Truly this is a large and interesting family, and includes some of our most loyal church members.

A Strange Delusion.—Mr. W. D. Pace, of Vance Co., took his own life in a state of mental unbalance. He had the delusion that he owed large sums which his creditors would not permit him to pay.

UNFAIR JUDGMENTS.

All of us need to be exceedingly careful in our judgments of other people. Oftentimes we are too hasty, and hence we misjudge people, and perhaps to their decided injury. Even when we feel disposed to be very charitable toward our fellows, we may wrongfully judge certain ones, because we are governed by appearances which deceive us. Circumstantial evidence is not always reliable, for some circumstances do not have such a connection with certain ones as we thought they had. I have sometimes found that I was decidedly mistaken in any judgment of certain ones, for I depended on some circumstances which, though appearing to be against those persons, were really not so. There was ground for suspicion, but it was not sufficient to make out a case of just condemnation. A great many wealthy men have been very unfairly judged by many critics and carpers. Mr. Rockefeller is one example. Even his motives for giving large sums of money for purely benevolent and philanthropic purposes, have been most unfairly judged. His good character, from youth to old age, has availed nothing with his censorious judges. Several years ago I read of a young man who worked very hard, at moderate wages, and under close limitations. He was exceedingly saving, and economized in every possible way. Many who knew him, in a general way, called him miserly and very selfish; but in the course of time, it was learned that he was saving his money to provide a home for his poor and aged parents. Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London, says: "It is a sad and miserable condition of mind to have no eyes but for wounds and bruises and putrefying sores, and to find these beneath the surface, when they do not appear in the eyes of others. Our ignorance of many of the facts should make us pause. A merchant, considered to be wealthy, was judged to be penurious, because he gave so little to missionary societies. After his death, it was discovered that he had educated a whole family of poor relatives, but had kept it an absolute secret." Be cautious and fair about your judgments of other people.

—The great fight against tuberculosis spreads over all the earth and becomes more aggressive and determined. Associations for the prevention of tuberculosis have been formed in Cuba, Porto Rico and Trinidad. In Cuba there are over 40,000 deaths from tuberculosis every year and the death rate from this disease is nearly three times as high as in the United States. In Porto Rico there are over 6,000 deaths every year out of 1,000,000 inhabitants. Trinidad, the death rate from tuberculosis in Port-of-Spain, the only place where figures are available, was 4.75 per 1000 in 1909, nearly three times the rate in New York City. Conditions in the other islands of the West Indies, where no active campaign against tuberculosis has been undertaken, are even worse. The chief reason for this high mortality is found in the unsanitary, dark, and poorly ventilated houses of the natives of the islands.

THE HARDENING OF PHARAOH'S HEART.

Probably no statement of Scripture has excited fiercer criticism, more exultation of enemies and perplexity of friends, than that the Lord said, "I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and he shall not let the people go," and that in consequence of this Divine act Pharoh sinned and suffered. Just because the words are startling, it is unjust to quote them without careful examination of the context, both in the prediction and the fulfilment. When all is weighed, compared, and harmonized, it will at last be possible to draw a just conclusion. And although it may happen long before then, that the objector will charge us with special pleading, yet he will be the special pleader himself, if he seeks to hurry us, by prejudice or passion, to give a verdict which is based upon less than all the evidence, patiently weighed.

Let us in the first place find out how soon this dreadful process began; when was it that God fulfilled His threat, and hardened, in any sense whatever, the heart of Pharaoh? Did He step in at the beginning, and render the unhappy king incapable of weighing the remonstrances which he then performed the cruel mockery of addressing to him? Were these as insincere and futile as if one bade the avalanche to pause which his own act had started down the icy slopes? Was Pharaoh as little responsible for his pursuit of Israel as his horses were—being, like them, the blind agents of a superior force? We do not find it so. In the fifth chapter, when a demand is made, without any sustaining miracle, simply appealing to the conscience of the ruler, there is no mention of any such process, despite the insults with which Pharaoh then assails both the messengers and Jehovah Himself, Whom he knew not. In the seventh chapter there is clear evidence that the process is yet unaccomplished; for, speaking of an act still future, it declares, "I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and multiply My signs and My wonders in the land of Egypt" (VII. 3.) And this terrible act is not connected with the remonstrances and warnings of God, but entirely with the increasing pressure of the miracles.

The exact period is marked when the hand of doom closed upon the tyrant. It is not where the Authorized Version places it. When the magicians imitated the earlier signs of Moses, "his heart was strong," but the original does not bear out the assertion that at this time the Lord made it so by any judicial act of His (VII. 13.) That only comes with the sixth plague; and the course of events may be traced, fairly well, by the help of the margin of the Revised Version.

After the plague of blood "Pharaoh"s heart was strong" ("hardened"), and this is distinctly ascribed to his own action, because "he set his heart even to this " (VII. 22, 23.)

After the second plague, it was still he himself who "made his heart heavy" (VIII. 15.)

After the third plague the magicians warned him that the very finger of some god was upon him indeed: their rivalry, which hitherto might have been somewhat of a palliation for his obstinacy, was now ended; but yet "his heart was strong" (VIII. 19.)

Again, after the fourth plague he "made his heart heavy;" and it "was heavy" after the fifth plague, (VIII. 32, IX. 7.)

Only thenceforward comes the judicial infatuation upon him who has resolutely infatuated himself hitherto.

But when five warnings and penalties have spent their force in vain, when personal agony is inflicted in the plague of boils, and the magicians in particular cannot stand before him through their pain, would it have been proof of virtuous contrition if he had yielded then? If he had needed evidence, it was given to him long before. Submission now would have meant prudence, not penitence; and it was against prudence, not penitence, that he was hardened. Because he had resisted evidence, experience, and even the testimony of his own magicians, he was therefore stiffened against the grudging and unworthy concessions which must otherwise have been wrested from him, as a wild beast will turn and fly from fire. He was henceforth himself to become an evidence and a portent; and so "The Lord made strong the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkened not unto them" (IX. 12.) It was an awful doom, but it is not open to the attacks so often made upon it. It only means that for him the last five plagues were not disciplinary, but wholly penal.

Nay, it stops short of asserting even this: they might still have appealed to his reason; they were only not allowed to crush him by the agency of terror. Not once is it asserted that God hardened his heart against any nobler impulse than alarm, and desire to evade danger and death. We see clearly this meaning in the phrase, when it is applied to his army entering the Red Sea: "I will make strong the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall go in" (XIV. 17.) It needed no greater moral turpitude to pursue the Hebrews over the sands than on the shore, but it certainly required more hardihood. But the unpursued departure which the good-will of Egypt refused, their common sense was not allowed to grant. Callousness was followed by infatuation, as even the pagans felt that whom God wills to ruin He first drives mad.

This explanation implies that to harden Pharaoh's heart was to inspire him, not with wickedness, but with nerve.

And as far as the original language helps us at all, it decidedly supports this view. Three different expressions have been unhappily rendered by the same English word, to harden; but they may be discriminated throughout the narrative in Exodus, by the margin of the Revised Version.

One word, which commonly appears without any marginal explanation, is the same which is employed elsewhere about "the cause which is too hard for" minor judges (Deut. I. 17, cf. XV. 18, etc.) Now, this word is found (VII. 13) in the second threat that "I will harden Pharaoh's heart," and in the account which was to be given to posterity of how "Pharaoh hardened himself to let us go" (XIII. 15.) And it is said likewise of Sihon, king of Heshbon, that he "would not let us pass by him, for the Lord thy God hardened his spirit and made his heart strong" (Deut. II. 30.) But since it does not occur anywhere in all the narrative of what God actually did with Pharaoh, it is only just to interpret this phrase in the prediction by what we read elsewhere of the manner of its fulfilment.

The second word is explained in the margin as meaning to make strong. Already God had employed it when He said "I will make strong his heart" (IV. 21,) and this is the term used of the first fulfilment of the menace, after the sixth plague (IX. 12.) God is not said to interfere again after the seventh, which had few special terrors for Pharaoh himself; but from henceforth the expression "to make strong" alternates with the phrase "to make heavy." "Go in unto Pharaoh, for I have made heavy his heart and the heart of his servants, that I might show these My signs in the midst of them" (X. 1.)

It may be safely assumed that these two expressions cover between them all that is asserted of the judicial action of God in preventing a recoil of Pharaoh from his calamities. Now, the strengthening of a heart, however punitive and disastrous when a man's will is evil (just as the strengthening of his arm is disastrous then,) has in itself no immorality inherent. It is a thing as often good as bad,—as when Israel and Joshua are exhorted to "be strong and of a good courage" (Deut. XXXI. 6, 7, 23,) and when the angel laid his hand upon Daniel and said, "Be strong, yea, be strong" (Dan. X. 19.) In these passages the phrase is identical with that which describes the process by which Pharaoh was prevented from cowering under the tremendous blows he had provoked.

The other expression is to make heavy or dull. Thus "the eyes of Israel were heavy with age" (Gen. XLVIII. 10,) and as we speak of a weight of honour, equally with the heaviness of a dull man, so we are twice commanded, "Make heavy (honour) thy father and thy mother"; and the Lord declares, "I will make Myself heavy (get Me honour) upon Pharaoh" (Deut. V. 16, Exod. XX. 12, XIV. 4, 17, 18.) In these latter references it will be observed that the making "strong" the heart of Pharaoh, and the making "Myself heavy" are so connected as almost to show a design of indicating how far is either expression from conveying the notion of immortality, infused into a human heart by God. For one of the two phrases which have been thus interpreted is still applied to Pharaoh; but the other (and the more sinister, as we should think, when thus applied) is appropriated by God to Himself: He makes Himself heavy.

It is also a curious and significant coincidence that the same word was used of the burdens that were made heavy when first they claimed their freedom, which is now used of the treatment of the heart of their oppressor (V. 9.)

It appears, then, that the Lord is never said to debauch Pharaoh's heart, but only to strengthen it against prudence and to make it dull; that the words used do not express the infusion of evil passion, but the animation of a resolute courage, and the overclouding of a natural discernment; and, above all, that every one of the three words, to make hard, to make strong, and to make heavy, is employed to express Pharaoh's own treatment or himself, before it is applied to any work of God, as actually taking place already.

Nevertheless, there is a solemn warning for all time, in the assertion that what he at first chose, the vengeance of God afterward chose for him. For indeed the same process, working more slowly but on identical lines, is constantly seen in the hardening effect of vicious habit. The gambler did not mean to stake all his fortune upon one chance, when first he timidly laid down a paltry stake; nor has he changed his mind since then as to the imprudence of such a hazard. The drunkard, the murderer himself, is a man who at first did evil as far as he dared, and afterwards dared to do evil which he would once have shuddered at.

Let no man assume that prudence will always save him from ruinous excess, if respect for righteousness cannot withhold him from those first compliances which sap the will, destroy the restraint of self-respect, wear away the horror of great wickedness by familiarity with the same guilt in its lesser phases. and, above all, forfeit the enlightenment and calmness of judgment which come from the Holy Spirit of God, Who is the Spirit of wisdom and of counsel, and makes men to be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord.—G. A. Chadwick in Expositor's Bible.

THE PRAYERS OF THE BIBLE.

Those who have left the deepest impression on this sin-cursed earth have been men and women of prayer. You will find that prayer has been the mighty power that has moved not only God but man. Abraham was a man of prayer and angels came down from heaven to converse with him. Jacob's prayer was answered in the wonderful interview at Peniel that resulted in his having such a mighty blessing and in softening the heart of his brother, Esau. Elijah's prayer closed up the Heavens for three years and six months, and he prayed again and the heavens gave rain. The apostle James tells us that the prophet Elijah was a man subject to like passions as we are. I am thankful that those men and women who were so mighty in prayer were just like ourselves. We are apt to think that those prophets and mighty men and women of old time were different from what we are; to be sure they lived in a much darker age but they were of like passions with ourselves. We read that on another occasion Elijah brought down fire on Mount Carmel. The prophets of Baal cried long and loud but no answer came. The God of Elijah heard and answered his prayer. Let us remember that the God of Elijah still lives. The prophet was translated and went up to heaven, but his God still lives and we have the same access to Him that Elijah had. Elijah prayed and life came back to a dead child. Manasseh the King was a wicked man and had done everything he could against the God of his father; yet in Babylon when he cried to God his cry was heard and he was taken out of prison and put on the throne at Jerusalem. Surely if God gave heed to the prayer of wicked Manasseh he will hear ours in the time of our distress. As we go to the throne of grace let us remember that God answers prayer. Look again at Samson; he prayed and his strength came back so that he slew more at his death than during his life. He was a restored back-slider and he had power with God. If those who have been back-sliders will but return to God they will see how quickly God will answer prayer Job prayed and his captivity was turned. Light came in the place of darkness and God lifted him up above the height of his former prosperity in answer to prayer. Daniel prayed to God and Gabriel came to tell him that he was a man greatly beloved of God. Three times that message came to him from heaven in answer to prayer. The secrets of heaven were imparted to him and he was told that God's Son was going to be cut off for the sins of his people. We find also that Cornelius prayed and Peter was sent to tell him words whereby he and his should be saved. In answer to prayer this great blessing came upon him and his household. Peter had gone up to the house top to pray when the sheet was let down from heaven. It was when prayer was made without ceasing unto God for Peter that the angel was sent to deliver him. So all through the Scriptures you will find that when believing prayer went up to God the answer came down. I think it would be a very interesting study to go right through the Bible and see what has happened while God's people have been on their knees calling upon him. Certainly the study would greatly strengthen our faith, showing as it would how wonderfully God has heard and delivered when the cry has gone up to him for help. Look at Paul and Silas in the prison at Philippi. As they prayed and sang praises the place was shaken and the jailor was converted. Probably that one conversion has done more than any recorded in the Bible to bring people into the kingdom of God. How many have been blessed in seeking to answer the question what must I do to be saved? It was the prayer of those two godly men that brought the jailor to his knees and that brought blessing to him and his family. You remember how Stephen as he prayed and looked up saw the heavens opened and the Son of man at the right hand of God. I want to call special attention to Christ as an example for us in all things, in nothing more than in prayer. We read that Christ prayed to his Father for everything. Every great crisis in his life was preceded by prayer. Let me quote a few passages, I never noticed till a few years ago that Christ was praying at his baptism. As he prayed the heavens was opened and the Holy Ghost descended on him. Another great event in his life was his transfiguration. As he prayed the fashion of his countenance was altered and his raiment was white and glistening. We read again: It came to pass in those days, that he went out into a mountain to pray and continued all night in prayer to God. This is the only place where it is recorded that the Savior spent a whole night in prayer. In the Gospel of John we read that Jesus, at the grave of Lazarus lifted up his eyes to heaven and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me, and I know that thou hearest me always; but because of the people which stand by said he, that they may believe that thou hast sent me. Notice that before he spoke the dead to life he spoke to his Father. We read again in the twelfth of John that He prayed to the Father. I think this is one of the saddest chapters in the whole Bible. Another memorable prayer of our Lord was in the Garden of Gethsemane. We read that his disciples came to him and said, Lord, teach us to pray. The prayer our Lord taught his disciples is commonly called the Lord's prayer. I think that the Lord's prayer more properly is that in the seventeenth of John. That is the longest prayer on record that Jesus made. You can read it slowly and carefully in about four or five minutes. I think we may learn a lesson here. How short the publican's prayer was: God be merciful to me a sinner. The Syrophenician woman's was shorter still: Lord, help me. The prayer of the thief on the cross was a short one—Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. Peter's prayer was, Lord, save me or I perish. So if you go through the Scriptures you will find that the prayers that brought immediate answer were generally brief. Christ's last prayer on the cross was a short one: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. Let our prayers be to the point, just telling God what we want. Prayer was appointed to convey the blessings God designs to give. Long as they live should Christians pray, for only while they pray they live.

THE CITY PASTOR'S DREAM.

A city pastor recently had this dream. St. Peter stood at heaven's gate. A company of self-complacent men and women come smiling up to the beautiful gate. "And who are you?" said St. Peter. "Church members, every one of us," replied the spokesman of the party.

"Indeed?"

Yes, here are our letters, Peter. "We kept them stored away in our trunks, and specially requested that they might be placed within our hands when we should lie in our caskets. We knew you would be asking for them."

"Let me see the dates" said Peter. Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine, h'm, nineteen years ago. Here is another—1884-1889, well, that is a trifle better. Eighteen hundred and ninety-two, can it be that all these years you have failed to identify yourselves with any church of Jesus?"

"Well, Peter, you see we were moving so often, when we were down below, and then the ties to the dear old home church were so sacred, we did not wish to hurt the feelings of our dear old pastors. So we have simply gone from church to church, but, oh, Peter, we have become wonderful 'sermon tasters.' But they lost their smiles when St. Peter closed the gate in their faces, saying, "I fear you would not be happy in the upper temple."

—There is a dreadful plague prevailing in Asia. In Harbin, a city of 30,000, 150 people are dying each day. There is fear of the spread of the disease through Europe and America. It is said that German agents are buying the hair of the dead to sell to European and American ladies of fashion!

—The refusal of the Federal Government's Commission to permit the railroads to raise rates is variously commented on. Some see in it the beginning of government ownership, and others regard it as only a reasonable regulation which it is the duty of government to enforce. This last view seems to us the right view.

THE FAMINE IN CHINA.

Dear Readers:—I have tried for several days to get a letter written for you but just now, I am overwhelmed with efforts to help the poor who are perishing around us. Now, as I begin to write there is simply a multitude of faces around my front gate pleading for something to eat, for the word has gotten out that we are going to help them, even though we have taken every precaution to keep them from thinking that it is to be had here, for we know that if the word should be substantiated with any giving, there would be an over-running of us which would mean no rest and maybe no life for us. How I do wish you could get a full conception of the real situation that is on all around us. It is estimated that 3,000,000 of people are in great need in this famine-stricken district, and that at least 1,000,000 will likely perish before the wheat is garnered if they do not receive help. Help is now coming in, but as yet, it is as a drop in the bucket to what is needed, and the needs will grow worse as the time drags along till wheat harvest.

I never bow my head to say grace now nor raise my heart in prayer that my mind's eye does not go out to the multitude of needy and my sympathy is so touched for them that I feel now that I will give to the very bottom of my pocketbook if there is not a great deal of giving from the outside. I often pray that the hearts of many people will be touched and that liberal giving will be the result.

I had known all the fall that the needs were great and that many were suffering, but the real state of affairs has during this last half month been revealed to me. With some money that was to pass through my hands, I decided to do some work on some badly destroyed roads, getting the needy to do it. I mentioned that I would give three cents a day for laborers, but was told by everyone to whom I mentioned it that that was not enough to feed them (and I saw that it was less than I could feed them with even the coarsest diet.) But when the work was begun I at once had to begin to refuse men, able-bodied men, who were accustomed to work and who were willing to use their strength. Morning after morning when I would come down-stairs there was a multitude of faces at my door waiting to plead with me to use them in this work, I having decided to use only two hundred.

This is telling you of the general condition, but I could use a whole day telling you of individual cases of needs, which are pitiful beyond description. One woman told us that she had six sons and had given away three and was hunting for someone who wanted the others, not being able to feed them. Another man who has eighty acres of land, but the crop all being destroyed last summer, was trying to sell his only child baby of eight months. To stick a straw up on anything that is placed on the street is a sign that it is for sale. Children are thus to be seen advertised now. Think of a parent carrying a child in the arms with this sign attached to it and another child following with the same sign! Is it not enough to touch every heart? One baby was buried in the manure of a loaded wagon one night and was soon found and kept over the night, and was sold for one pound of bread the next day. One old person told of having given away four of his six children and said that the other two were so hungry that they could not walk.

One man who is carrying dirt for me for three cents a day says that his whole family of seven are now subsisting on that, having nothing else to depend on. I am told by one neighbor that another neighbor family of eight are making sixteen ounces of meal per day into soup, and that is all they have. One neighbor family of three pass the day eating only one-half cent's worth of wheat bran for the three.

A few days ago a man with nothing whatever on him was sitting out by the side of a house while the wind whistled against him and the snow peppered down on him. One morning when I arose I found a fifteen-year-old boy just outside of my gate, having crouched there all night when the temperature was ten degrees below freezing. I inquired about him and found that his father, mother and his whole family had perished and that he had been out begging without anything to eat. He was in the poorest rags. I found him a boy of good manners and was willing to carry dirt. But when he got up it was shown that his feet had frozen and his toes already in a rotten condition. Again, when the temperature was below freezing I saw a half-grown boy on the street, stark barefooted, crying like a babe with cold hunger. I am not telling isolated cases; there are just such as I have told above to be found by the thousands.

There is now a committee in Shanghai who are doing what they can to solicit help from foreign countries, missionaries and business men. Any help that you want to send should be sent through them. They send to points where most all passes through the hands of missionaries, so you may feel assured that the greatest care will be taken to get it to the most needy. A gold dollar would save the life of a hungry person for the next few months, till wheat is gathered, when they will then be able to get along. What will you do? Is there one who reads this who is not willing to give that much? And if you give more, it can be well used. I am,

Sincerely,
Wade D. Bostick.

THAT EASTER ORDER.

We do not refer to the order of your Easter suit or bonnet—you would not forget that, nor delay it so long as to make it impossible for your dressmaker, milliner, tailor, or haberdasher to meet your desires.

But we do refer to the order for the Easter service which every Sunday school in the Methodist Protestant Church should hold on this joyous anniversary day. The service has been prepared by your direction of the Central Conference, and the Board of Home Missions, and awaits your order for distribution.

Many Pastors, Superintendents, and Choristers, have not waited for this reminder, and the orders are coming by every mail. We are able now to make prompt shipment in every case, but this will not be true if all who have not already reported wait until the latest possible moment to send in their orders.

The service speaks for itself. Favorable comments are reaching us from every part of the church, and we are sure if the service is used, it will result in an increased missionary spirit in the Sunday schools, and add largely to the income of the Board of Home Missions.

We are shipping "The Easter Message" from New England to Seattle, and from West Texas to the Gulf. Kindly let us have your order by the next mail, and help to make this the greatest service in the history of our Church. Our Board of Home Missions needs your co-operation.

Answers to Assigned Questions.

28. Cruden says: "When God is said to harden the heart, it is not to be understood, as if God did properly and positively make men's hearts hard, but only privately, either by denying to them, or withdrawing from them that grace which alone can make the hearts of men soft, flexible and pliable to the divine will."

Dr. R. A. Torrey says: Pharaoh "by willingly and wilfully taking the wrong attitute toward them, (i. e. God's judgments) was hardened by them. There is nothing that God sends us which is more merciful than the judgments which he sends upon our sins. If we take these judgments aright they will soften our hearts and lead us to repentance and entire surrender to God, and thus bring us salvation. But if we rebel against them, they will harden our hearts and bring us eternal ruin. The fault is not with God, and the fault is not with His judgments: the fault is with ourselves and the attitude we take toward his judgments and toward the truth of God itself."

Matthew Henry says, "That Pharaoh's obstinacy might be no surprise or discouragement to him" (Moses) "God tells him before, that he would harden his heart. Pharaoh had hardened his own heart against the groans and cries of the oppressed Israelites, and shut up the bowels of compassion from them; and now God in a way of righteous judgment, hardens his heart against the conviction of the miracles, and the terror of the plagues."

I believe Dr. Torrey's view is the correct one.

Mrs. W. F. Kennett.

(We give an extended comment by Dean Chadwick, beginning on page 1, who seems to have gone into the subject more carefully than most commentators.)

29. What provision was made for the support of the Israelites during the year of jubile?

30. Where in Leviticus do we find indication that material blessing is conditioned on man's spirituality?

Question 29 is assigned to Miss Bertha Smith; 30 to Miss Ruth Chavis.

We still expect answers to some of the unanswered questions.

Lesson for Next Week.

Leviticus, chapters 15 to 27 inclusive.

CHINESE HOLD MASS MEETING.

Peking, Jan. 9.

A mass meeting was held in the Hukuang Club(in Lo-Ma-Shin-Ta-Chia, yesterday at 1 p. m. The object of the meeting was to secure the co-operation of the officials and the people in the anti-opium crusade. There were present more than a thousand persons, among whom were many Europeans. The meeting was presided over by Mr. Lin Pinchang, President of the National Anti-Opium Society.

Prince Karachin, who was also present, delivered a lengthy speech emphasizing the necessity of official co-operation in the present campaign against the evil of opium smoking.

A feature of the meeting was the presence of many Chinese orators. Speaking on behalf of the gentle sex Madame Feng, President of the Women's Society, described the misery and degradation brought upon many families for which the introduction of opium into China was directly responsible, and laid stress on many points bearing on the opium question. Other lady speakers dwelt upon the subject in similar strain.

Mr. Wong Chi-peng representing the Students' Federation drew attention to the mis-representation of the opium question in England in the London Times as quoted not long ago by the Peking Daily News. He repudiated most strongly the statement that Chinese officials were not in earnest in the present Anti-Opium campaign and that they, (the officials) were still enjoying the "luxury." He pointed out the great wrong done to China by mis-statements of the kind indicated and would ask the writer to compare the present day Chinese officials with those of a few years ago. That the disappearance of opium smoking officials in Chinese officialdom was remarkable there was ample proof.

Dr. Martin was another foreful speaker on the evil of opium in China. His description of the evil for the past half a century and the great progress which the people had made in fighting against it was especially interesting and instructive.

H. E. Ex. Viveroy Tuan Fang, who has taken an active part in the anti-opium movement, was not present, but he sent his views on the question which were read before the meeting.

Among the other speakers were Yu Peng hua, member of the Tzucheng Yuan; Col. L. Chang, of the General Staff; and others.

At the conclusion a resolution"that the Waiwu Pu be urged to take a firm and decisive step in regard to the opium question!" was unanimously passed.

It is understood that the resolution will be telegraphed to the anti-opium societies throughout the Empire and to those in Europe and America.—"Peking Daily News."

THE LITTLE LOAF.

Many years ago there was a great famine in Germany, and the poor people suffered from hunger. A rich man who loved children sent for twenty of them and said to them: "In this basket there is a loaf of bread for each of you. Take and come back again every day till the famine is over. I will give you a loaf each day."

The children were very hungry. They seized the basket and struggled to get at the largest loaf. They even forgot to thank the man who had been kind to them. After a few minutes of quarreling and snatching for bread, every one ran away with his loaf except one little girl, named Gretchen. She stood there alone at a little distance from the gentleman. Then, smiling, she took up the last loaf, the smallest of all, and thanked him with all her heart.

Next day the children came again, and they behaved as badly as ever. Gretchen, who would not push with the rest, received only a tiny loaf scarcely half the size of the others. But, when she came home, and her mother began to cut the loaf, ut dropped six shining coins of silver.

"O Gretchen!" exclaimed her mother, "this must be a mistake. The money does not belong to us. Run as quick as you can and take it back to the gentleman."

So Gretchen carried it back; but, when she gave the gentleman her mother's message, he said: "No, no, it was not a mistake. I had the silver baked into the smallest loaf in order to reward you. Remember that the person who is contented to have a small loaf rather than quarrel for a larger one will find blessings that are better than money baked in the bread. Adapted from "Cowdery's Moral Lessons" by Ella Lyman Cabot, in "Ethics for Children."

A PRAYER.

"Lord, keep me still;
Though stormy winds may blow,
And waves my little bark may overflow,
Or even if in darkness I must go,
Yet keep me still.

"Lord, keep me still;
The waves are in Thy hand,
The roughest winds subside at Thy command,
Steer Thou my bark in safety to the land,
And keep me still.

"Lord, keep me still;
And may I ever hear
Thy still small voice to comfort and to cheer;
So shall I know and feel Thee ever near,
When I am still."

"Lie still, "Be strong," to day; but Lord, tomorrow.
What of tomorrow, Lord?
Shall there be rest from toil, be truce from sorrow,
Be living green upon the sward
Now but a barren grave to me,
Be joy for sorrow?
"Did I not die for thee?
Do I not live for thee? Leave me tomorrow."

A CONVERSATION WITH TOLSTOI ON PERSONAL RELIGION.

In a recent book on the evangelical movement in Russia a conversation with Tolstoi is reported which gives a sufficiently definite idea of Tolstoi's understanding of Christian truth. William Fettler, a young Russian evangelist of twenty-seven, who has been having great blessing in his meetings for the working people of Petersburg in the last two years, called upon the novelist some time before his death. Tolstoi, who had just given some kopecks to a pair of mendicant pilgrims, opened up the subject of religion by remarking:

"If I were younger I would live a pilgrim life myself. Jesus was a pilgrim. To that life He called His disciples."

"We may be His disciples without going on pilgrimages," replied the evangelist.

A warm discussion ensued. Tolstoi denounced the doctrine of the atonement by the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus as "crude and coarse." When Mr. Fettler appealed to the New Testament on the subject, the novelist cut him short with:

"My New Testament is much smaller than yours. I reject a great deal that you accept."

"By what authority?" demanded Mr. Fettler.

"Ah!" replied Tolstoi, "my own opinion, of course."

"That authority may satisfy you, but it cannot affect anyone else. But what parts of the New Testament do you reject?"

"All the miracle-stories, for example."

"You surely accept the resurrection of our Lord?"

"No, I do not. I see no necessity for it. He said, 'It is finished.' His life-work was done when He was put to death. Why should He rise again?"

"But we believe in a living Savior. 'He ever liveth.' We look for His appearing. It is the hope of all true Christians. 'This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go.'"

"I have no such expectation. If some one were to come here to us now, and tell us that the risen Christ had arrived in Yassnaya Polyana, and was walking in the garden over there, I would not care to go to have a look at Him. It is mere superstition. He has been dead for nearly two millenniums."

"Paul bases the whole Christian religion on the fact of the resurrection of our Lord. 'If Christ be not risen, your faith is vain.'"

"Do not quote Paul to me. I do not believe in Paul."

"Do you reject his writings also, as inspired?"

"Inspired? Yes. How can they be inspired? Does he not command you to be obedient to governments? Paul has been the sure prop of every atrocious tyranny that has masqueraded under the guise of authority."

"There you greviously misrepresent not only Paul, but also the whole of the Scripture teaching respecting civil obligations."

"How so? It is plain enough: 'Let everybody be obedient to the authorities.' They are his words."

"If you will read the passage in full you will see that Paul was developing, to these early believers, the rules of peace, and unselfishness, and love, and humility. Such rules obviously forbid setting oneself up against governments; and particularly that ideal government that 'encourages good works and is the terror of evildoers,' to which Paul especially refers. You must also remember, Count, that the Scriptures and Paul do not command an indiscriminate obedience to whatever the rulers of this world may ordain. This is clearly seen from the example of the apostles themselves, who, when charged by those in authority with disobedience, replied, 'We ought to obey God rather than man.'"

"Count Tolstoy, forgive me for asking you a very personal question."

"What is it?" he inquired.

"You have held and circulated your views of religion and God and man for many years."

"Not 'circulated,'" he interrupted. "That is not my affair. Other people are responsible for that."

"Do your views content you? Do they prepare you for death and for eternity?"

"They satisfy me now. What may be afterward I do not know."

"Those parts of the Bible that you reject speak of a judgment to come."

"I know—I know."

"And of a Savior of sinners, Who through His death prepares us to face that judgment."

"I cannot listen to you," he cried impatiently. "Much better is it for us to walk in silence than to speak so unprofitably."

"I did not mean to offend you," said Mr. Fettler. "I felt compelled to speak thus."

"I do not see how you could be compelled. What compelled you?"

"Like yourself I have discovered certain truths that satisfy my own soul—give me peace and joy, and hope for the great hereafter. But, unlike you, who disclaim all responsibility for the opinions and lives of other people, I am under my Master's command to tell 'every creature' what I know, and to urge them to repent of sin and believe in the Lord Jesus. I should be disobedient if I were silent."

"Each man's duty is to discover truth for himself," he retorted. "My views are sufficient for myself."

"How, then, is that consistent with loving one's neighbor as oneself?"

To this there was no answer, and the conversation as far as it touched on religious matters ceased. "With Christian Russia."

THANKS TO BRO T. L. WHITAKER.

My Dear Bro: I have read and reread your letter in Methodist Protestant Herald, of March 2, 1911, headed "The Old Time Religion." When my eyes fell on the heading, and then your signature at the bottom, I at once expected something good and I was not disappointed. You and myself are of that age, that we can see the many great changes, that have taken place in the church, in the last sixty years, that younger brethren, do not see! It is said, my Bro., as you know, that we are living in a "progressive age," and that is true in many things; but not in all things. I do not believe that the present plan of stationing the preachers, is as good as the old plan. Under the old plan, when the stationing committee was composed of one delegate from each field of labor, with the president added, I do not remember of any field being left unsupplied, as long as there were any preachers without work and who wanted work. It is not so now! Fields are left unsupplied, and preachers who want work, are left without work. This is detrimental to the church and to the preachers! Paul said, "All are yours." viz., ministers of different gifts and qualifications and God is a better judge of what the church needs, than any man, or set of men, and for the church to refuse to accept those whom God has called and sent is in my judgment rebellion.

I prefer a committee composed of a delegate from every field of labor, because it is not reasonable to suppose that 60 or 70 men will be prejudiced against any one man without a cause! But it is quite easy for two men to be so prejudiced as not to do justice! And there is not likely to be so much favoritism in a large committee. I have heard of, and may I not say, I have known a small committee of two, to do things in stationing the preachers that they were ashamed of and say, "If I do this, I cannot tell that Bro." This was one of the two; and the other one afterwards said, "Do not mention that, for it is too bad to talk about." The M. P. Church, is not building up in N. C. as rapidly as she ought to! You know this, Bro. Whitaker, as well as I do, and you and I both know that it is mainly for the want of more old time religion, and because we have left the old land-marks. You speak of the good work of the old "Class leader" etc. Yes, but where are our class leaders now? We only have them in name! They hold no class-meetings. I doubt whether you can find 25 in the state that are discharging the duties of a class-leader, as laid down in our book of discipline.

I see in the Herald of March 2, that one who signs himself R. C. S. says "Let us get away from the old track and do something we haven't done before." My dear Bro., you should say, let us get back to the old track and do as we have not been doing. Christ says, "As I have loved you, so ought ye to love one another." If we would all, preachers and members, in the M. P. Church in N. C., measure up to the pattern given us by Christ, would we not be a power for good? I believe we would have 10 conversions and accessions to church to where we have one now! You speak of the great work done on Roanoke circuit, by Bro. T. H. Pegram. Yes, I shall always love him, for I was converted under his ministry, and I want to say here that he was one of the most successful ministers in N. C. in getting souls saved, adding to the church. And he was very popular anywhere you sent him! Why was he so popular? He was very zealous and was naturally gifted; but as you say, he had but little education. I do not suppose that we have three men in our ference now but what are better educated than Bro. Pegram was.

Yet I repeat he was remarkably popular; and it was mainly because of the great number of conversions under his ministry! At that day the preacher that had the most converts under his ministry, was the man called for by nearly every charge. You know this, Bro. Whitaker. Is it so now? No, a thousand times no! There is something terribly wrong now, and it is high time the church was looking out for the cause and its remedy.

I joined the Conference in 1866, and while I cannot speak from my own personal knowledge, yet I was told by some of the older members of Conference, that our net increase that year was 1600. Suppose our net increase had been that much every year until now, what would be our numbers today in N. C.?

My Dear Bro., I wish you and I could be close together, so we could start up a good old fashioned prayer-meeting. We all need more old time religion and less formality.

Geo. E. Hunt.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Notice.

The second quarterly conference of Randolph circuit will be held at Bethel Sat. before the 3rd Sunday in this month.

W. C. L.

Pensacola.

Rev. D. R. Williams preached at the Pensacola church on Ivy circuit on the 4th Saturday and Sunday in February. Both sermons were good. On Sunday his text was, How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?

After an excellent discourse he administered the Lord's Supper. He preached again at a school house in afternoon about 3 miles from our church having good congregations all the while. So we are hoping for a prosperous year. May the blessings of the Eternal Father be with the pastor and his work.

R. R. Ray.

Moriah Church.

Mr. Cecil filled his regular appointment the second Sunday. He preached from Romans, 12th chapter and 11th verse, "Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

There was a larger congregation present than had been present for some time for both the Sunday-school and preaching services.

The interest in the Sunday-school is increasing with each service. There has been an improvement in both attendance and the study of the lessons. The campaign for members has resulted in securing several new members of the Sunday-school. There are some new names added to the roll almost every Sunday.

The people have decided to repair and repaint the church. There will be given a box party at Buffalo School House next Friday night, March 17, the proceeds of which will go toward defraying the expenses of repairing and repainting the church. Of course the public is cordially invited to attend and take part in this party.

Reporter.

St. Paul's Church.

Rev. J. R. Hutton, Conference Evangelist, has been preaching here very acceptably once a Sunday for some time, but last Sunday he announced that on account of calls elsewhere for his services he must discontinue his weekly visits to St. Paul. This announcement threw the church into a state of anxiety. A meeting of the church was called for Sunday night, and while it was not largely attended, it was characterized by great earnestness on the part of most of those present. A number made pledges of semi-monthly contributions, and the stewards promised to make a general canvass of the membership to see whether the problem of pastoral support can be solved.

This church had the misfortune to be left without a pastor by the last annual Conference. We don't know whose fault it was. Possibly it was nobody's, but simply a misfortune that God permitted to befall this church for the trial of its faith and loyalty. We hope the day is not far distant when they will have a pastor resident among them. There are good people here and others that could be brought in with them.

J. F. McC.

Mt. Moriah, Cleveland Circuit.

Brother W. D. Reed filled his regular appointment here the second Sunday in March. He preached a good sermon. He never fails to do that. We are always glad to have him with us.

We are going to meet next Sunday to organize our Sunday-school. We hope to have a good S. S. this year.

We are building a new church. We have the frame up, and most of the lumber cut to finish the building. We hope to have a nice church up soon.

I will close with best wishes to the Herald and its many readers.

Janie Sisk.

Rose Hill, Monroe Circuit.

Dear Editor:

I would not that you nor the readers of the Herald, should think me greedy of space, nor that I would render myself conspicuous by my writing; but with your permission I will try to offer a few thoughts from our church. We have a very good Sunday-school and we continue to enter new names on our roll book, and hope that when spring gets in full swing our Sunday-school will go beyond anything that it has ever been before. Our pastor, Rev. W. P. Martin, filled his regular appointment the 3rd Sunday and preached a very forceful sermon.

We are glad to report Rev. John H. Turner a little on the mend, not enough to go to church tho' yet. He was made to feel glad last Sunday afternoon when a number of his brethren called to see him, among them were Revs. Martin and Perry who conducted a series of prayers before leaving. There will be preaching Sunday a. m. at 11 o'clock. Every one is urged to be present, as we feel sure they will hear something that will do them good.

R. P. Turner.

Mecklenburg Ct.

Dear Bro. Swain:

I am pleased with my new field, not because it is doing so well, but because I see it is able to do, and I believe is waking up to a willingness to do, or at least a part of the work is. I have been to all the churches on the work, and have been in 34 homes of our people since I came on the work.

I was received with much kindness and hospitality.

I am very much pleased with our new neighbors at Matthews; while the people here do not belong to our church we do not know any difference so far as neighbors are concerned, and it seems that all of the people of Matthews love to go to our church, Peasant Hill. I am sorry that our people let Pleasant Hill go down. That could have been in better shape, I am most sure.

We have large attendance at our church. We are glad to have them. We certainly appreciate the kindness of Miss Ruth Starns, a member of the Baptist church, for serving as our organist. We want to thank Bro. Davenport, the pastor of Baptist church, for the privilege of such vegetables as we desired from his garden. We wish also, to thank Mrs. Davenport, for a hundred early cabbage plants that she gave us a few weeks ago.

The people of Beulah and Antioch have remembered us in giving us such things canned fruit, apples, turnips, coffee, sugar, soda, and wood. Bro. Gaimon also remembered old Sam, the horse, with a load of fodder. For all these we are thankful. Now a word for Stallingville. This is a new point and is a nice little town about 2 1-2 miles south of Matthews. It has no church there, but they are very anxious for a church building there. We want to get things in shape to give this point more attention. We believe that the Mecklenburg Ct. will be one of our best charges if our people will do the right thing this year. One thing this work must do if it wants a preacher that will compete with other denominations; it must pay a salary that a man can live on, and I think it will. This is one of the finest farming counties I have ever seen, and our people are good farmers and are able to pay, and if they will begin at the beginning of the year they will be surprised to know how easily they can pay the salary. So we are going to try to get up on a higher plane of working, loving, praying, paying and obeying this year.

With best wishes to all, I remain yours in Christ. J. W. Self.

Fair View.

Dear Herald: This being my first time to endeavor to write; hope I may be able to do more in the future.

Rev. Mr. A. O.Lindley, our pastor, filled his regular appointment today; we were glad to have him with us once more. Mr. Lindley preached a good and interesting sermon.

S. S. is conducted at 10 o'clock, the time was changed somewhat today. On the 3rd Sunday S. S. will be in the afternoon. We were glad to have so many new bright faces with us again; makes us all feel good to see so many at the house of prayer. We're sorry that some could not be with us, we ask all Christian people's prayers for them, and for the sick. The prayer meetings are doing good work for our community.

The good old Presbyterians are still working faithfully; as they have no regular pastor they have not had preaching so often although there will be preaching there to night by Rev. Lapsley from Rocky River church. We wish them the best of success and hope they may find a good and interesting pastor whom they all will love.

As there have been many deaths in our community recently we trust they have gone to a better land, nevertheless we think of those who are left and are bereaved, our sympathy goes out for them.

Collection was taken today for the orphans; there was a nice amount given. Mr. Julis Hill, one of the great workers of the church, got up and made a statement to this effect. The church is going to ruin fast, and asked who would volunteer to help to prevent this, in a short time they had between 22 and 25 dollars to start to work on in painting the house. They are going to order the paint and go to work at once. Some improvements have been made around the church recently; the grave yard has been cleaned off; am sorry the flowers got burned so much; trust they are not killed. We will have preaching at our church again by Rev. D. A. Braswell from Concord Wednesday night, March 8, at about 7:30 o'clock; we wish to see many out.

Clara Blackwelder.

New Hope, Vance Ct.

We are glad to have our pastor, Rev. R. C. Stubbins, back with us again this year. We are expecting to hold our Sunday-school Institute, March 17th, hope it will be of great benefit to the Sunday-school and church. Our pastor filled his regular appointment the first Sunday, he gave us a fine sermon. We had a small congregation, owing to sickness in the neighborhood. I am glad to report that my brother's little boy who has been very sick with pneumonia, is improving. Our Sunday-school is moving along fairly well; it is small but evergreen. We hope for a larger attendance and more interest this year than ever before. With best wishes to the Herald and its readers

Rehoboth, Granville Ct.

Mr. Bethea is winning the hearts of the people on Granville Circuit. We have heard many favorable comments about his work. He is enthusiastic in every movement pertaining to the uplift of God's kingdom, and is even now preparing our minds and hearts for the revival next summer. He sees the value of a soul and is putting forth his whole time and strength in the work of soul-saving.

Our church has been remodeled recently; the interior is ceiled, oiled and varnished while the work on the outside is a new cover. We also hope to paint the outside this spring. One of our members said that Rehoboth is now the prettiest country church he has ever seen. Last Sunday's service was the first since the work had been done, and Mr. Bethea reminded us that while we are making improvements in material things, we should renew our spiritual strength as well. We are proud of our church and wish to thank all who helped in the work of repairing—some were outsiders. We would also thank the school committeemen for the use of the school house for Sunday-school. Our Sunday-school is still good, all through the winter we averaged as many as forty. Richard Harris was re-elected Supt. this year.

Mr. John Mundy's family is greatly missed this year. They moved to Bear Pond and attend S. S. at Union Chapel.

Among the visitors at Rehoboth last Sunday were Tom Harris from the A. & M. College, Raleigh, and Mr. and Mrs. L. L. Barnes and daughter from Texas.

Dear Readers of the Metholist Protestant Herald: I would like time and space if it would be just to the paper and readers, to tell you just how kind and good the people all over this circuit have been to me and my little ones in our sad bereavement and affliction. It seems that every possible thought and consideration have been given both in word and deed. Many gifts and donations from every part of the work both in money and every mentionable way to supply the appetite and needs of myself and dear little ones.

Perhaps I should make special mention of W. Lexington who entertained and kept and ministered unto us during the first illness of my little boy, and the people of our home community and members of Bethesda, the most untiring and self-sacrificing people for their paston I believe in the world. Many, many deserve special mention, but should I specify and call names, it would take pages. Therefore let it suffice for me to say God knows every one and so do I. He will reward. The many kindnesses call for the utmost extent of the gratitude of our hearts. And now my dear little boy is up I enter upon my full work with the full desire to do all I can for all the people and to extend the Master's kingdom.

Yours in His service,
H. L. Powell.

Asheville.

One new member last Sunday, Bro. J. Brown, an old gentleman from Scotland. He brought his letter from the Free Church of Scotland.

Sunday was a good all-round day. 140 in main school, 44 at Woolsey Hall, 42 at Woodfin Hill. The preaching services were unusually well attended.

On the 10th our Ladies' Aid gave a reception in honor of Mrs. Stratton, a fine Sunday school worker who has helped us for more than a year.

On the same evening the Woolsey Hall S. S. workers gave a cake and candy social. More than twenty fine cakes were sold and many candy boxes. Coffee was served.

The sales amounted to just $30.00. "Twin Auctioneers" gave much fun to the audience. Also an impromptu debate between four splendid men.

Our organ at the Hall is more than paid for.

This Friday night a St. Patrick social will be given at the cottage.

Mrs. Frank Thompson of Baltimore is now visiting her husband in the city.

She is now engaged with the Peabody School in Baltimore. She will join her husband here in May for permanent residence. She is said to be one of Baltimore's finest contraltos. They are Methodist Protestants. Another new resident here is Dr. Griffith of Western Maryland, 1902.

Do We Need a Church in Morganton?

We say yes, because there is a great work to be done here, for there are more people here that do not attend church and S. S. than any town I ever saw to its size. Why? Because there is so much pride and formality in the churches that we common people do not feel at home, and there are some of us that never will feel at home till we get an M. P. Church here; for there is as good M. P. grit in Morganton as ever lived. We stated in the Conference six years ago that Western N. C., was as good soil for M. P's. as there was in the East, and if each end is good, why is not the middle of the field good? We think all we lack is a man like Bro. Hunt that has got more religion than pride and formality to do the work. We believe in foreign missions, but we just as well sow our seed at home as in the foreign field.

And the best place to do work, is where we have the most room. Who will be the first preacher that has the spirit of Bro. Hunt to come and visit this place? For we believe that we have many with that love in them. We have not got Elijah's home, but there is a home for all who will visit us. Who will be the first?

Pray for us.

Death of Uncle Daniel.

On February 27, Monday night, just as the clock chimed the hour of nine, the soul of Bro. Daniel Julian took its flight heavenward. And while we stood by the bed, and saw him breathe the last, our hearts were filled with sorrow, and yet we could but say, it is well. For his suffering had been great for some weeks before his death. He had lived to a ripe old age, was turning into his eighty eighth year. Had been in declining health for over a year, and had been confined to his room for some time, but seemed to suffer no acute pain until about two weeks before he died, he fell and broke his leg, after which he hardly gained consciousness. It has been my pleasure to know Bro. Julian for four years, he having made his home with his brother, Mr. P. M. Julian, of Cedar Falls, all of his own family having died several years ago. He left his own home near Giles Chapel and came here to live. And how it inspired us to see him living in such contentment in his old age. Just waiting for the great florist to transplant the old plant in the flower garden of heaven, there to bloom for ever. And he was so thankful for the kindness shown him by Mr. Julian's family and they were indeed kind to him. A debt which the Heavenly Father will reward. His remains were laid to rest in Giles Cemetery, with Masonic honors; services conducted by his pastor, Rev. Mr. Hatley. Bro. Julian had many friends and was esteemed by all. We can not speak too highly of this old gentleman. In fact we can but stand back and let him say with Paul. I have finished my course. I have kept the faith.

—Wilmington, N. C., has adopted the commission form of government.

Mrs. Mary Jane Cheshire.

Mary Jane Stonestreet, daughter of Wilburn Stonestreet, was born in Davie Co., N. C., Jan. 8th, 1841; was converted when about 17 years of age and joined the Methodist Protestant Church at Union Chapel, Mocksville circuit, and was a member of said church for about 53 years. She was married to John A. Cheshire, Nov. 22nd, 1860, and died at her home March 7th, 1911, leaving a devoted husband and two children and a host of friends to mourn her departure. She was buried next day at Union Chapel, the burial services, in the absence of the pastor on account of sickness, being conducted by Rev. E. P. Bradley, pastor of the Presbyterian church at Mocksville, N. C.

On the 22nd of last Nov., Brother and Sister Cheshire celebrated the 50th anniversary of their marriage at Union Chapel where and when a long table, laden with an abundance of good things to eat, was spread, and religious services were held, the sermon being preached by Rev. E. P. Bradley. Sister Cheshire was a loving and devoted wife, a kind and considerate mother, a good neighbor and a faithful and consistent Christian. Her home was the preacher's home, as many of our preachers can testify. She seldom missed any of her church services. She was very good about visiting the sick, none better.

She was taken sick on the morning of March 4th with congestion of the brain and lived only three days. All that loving hands and medical skill could do were of no avail. The large number of visitors during her sickness and the concourse at the funeral services testify to the esteem her neighbors and friends had for her. But now she is gone, and her place in the home and in the neighborhood and in the church will never be filled. She will be sadly missed, but her grief-stricken husband, children and friends have good reason to believe that their loss is her eternal gain. She left no dying testimony, but she left what was better—a life of service for Christ and the church.

Farewell, dear sister, we hope to meet you again "in the sweet bye and bye."

D. A. Highfill, pastor.

Mocksville, N. C., March 13, 1911.

Sister Martha Frances Wagner Leonard, the wife of David S. Leonard, of Bethesda, Yadkin College Ct., Davidson Co., N. C., was born Feb. 5, 1850; died Feb. 24, 1911, aged 61 years, 19 day. She was married to David S. Leonard, Feb. 17, 1870. This union was blessed with seven children: five boys and two girls. She leaves an aged mother, a husband, the entire family of seven children, and 13 grand children to mourn the loss of daughter, wife, mother, grandmother, and the

For Sailors and Prisoners.

Thirty years ago there were Seamen's Friend Societies, but no work for sailors by the young people of our churches. Now there are Floating Societies of Christian Endeavor among the boys on the sea on many iron-clads and merchant vessels, and in consequence an intense interest in them is aroused among the boys of the shore. The Floating Endeavor work carried on by the societies of Liverpool and London, New York and San Diego, of Nagasaki and Bombay, and many another seaport is beyond all praise. Vessels are visited; services are held; socials are enjoyed; good literature by the ton and comfort-bags by the thousand are distributed; and, better than all, the Christian sailor on the sea is given to understand that he is not forgotten by his brothers and sisters on the shore.

Thirty years ago few young people out of prison gave a thought to the tens of thousands of young men behind prison bars. Now the thousands of prisoners who have been converted to Christ and organized into societies through the efforts of their Endeavor friends outside, appeal most strongly to the warm hearts of our youth; and the fact that no prison Endeavorer is recorded as returning to prison when once discharged is a tribute to the sincerity of their conversion and to the sympathy of their friends outside, who have helped them to forget the past and to begin a new career.

The Use of the Press.

Thirty years ago there were no news papers or magazines devoted to the religious life of the young people save a few story-papers for children, which were given away in the Sunday-school. Now there are some forty national and state papers in half as many languages, devoted to the work of Christian Endeavor alone.

Fellowship of Young People Then and Now.

Thirty years ago there was comparatively little fellowship between the denominations, and of course the young people of different sects knew little and cared less for one another. Said a distinguished minister of a prominent church to me the other day: "When I was a young minister and I wanted to wake up my sleepy audience, I would pitch into the other denominations for their peculiarities. Then the men would sit up and take notice, and say, as they went out of church, 'Ain't our young minister smart? he knows how to give it to them hot and heavy.'"

Such a travesty on religion would scarcely be possible in any pulpit of the land today, and have not the young people had their full share in bringing about the hearty fellowship, which is so good and so pleasant a thing to behold?

As an answer to this question go with me to any of our great state conventions, where from five to fifty denominations assemble under the banner of Christian Endeavor . In Pennsylvania forty-six denominations are actualy enrolled among the five thousand Endeavor Societies of the Keystone State. Or, still better, go with me to such a convention as the World's Endeavor meeting at Agra, India, where every Protestant mission was represented, as well as every great race of mankind, and where at the consecration meeting responses were made in forty-one different languages,—English and German and Swedish and Chinese and Tamil and Teluga and Hindi and Hindustani, in Tibetan and Burmese and Karen and Cingalese and a score more, all telling of devotion to Jesus Christ and His cause.

William Carey and Andrew Fuller.

A century ago William Carey in a letter to Andrew Fuller prayed for and predicted such a meeting as a possibility of the remote future, but Andrew Fuller thought that it was not within the bounds of possibility, or scarcely desirable. A year ago his great-grandson, William Carey the third, presided at a meeting of forty denominations and as many nationalities at this same Endeavor Convention held under the shadow of the Taj Mahal in the heart of the same continent to which William Carey, the first, gave his life.

Great Conventions.

Or if in our own land you would fully realize the sweep and the strength of this fellowship of the young people of today, call to mind the Convention of '95 in our own city of Boston, when 56,000 young people from all over the land made the pilgrimage to our good city, when the city was decorated with banners and mottoes of welcome as never before or since in its history.

Or, better still, go with me next July to Atlanta City, and see a similar throng of a younger generation, representing every denomination, and every state, and almost every considerable community, of our land. Join with them in their praise; lift up your hearts with them in their prayer; mingle with them in their consecration, and tell me whether the fellowship of the young Christians of America is not a vital and glorious feature of our modern church life.

No Monopoly.

It is only fair to add that of course this great awakening by and for young people has not been monopolized by the Christian Endeavor movement. While it has been growing strong, the Sunday school has largely multiplied its efficiency and increased its numbers. The Young Men's Christian Association and Young Women's Christian Association have become at least ten times as powerful and prosperous as they were thirty years ago. The distinctively missionary and temperance societies of young people have increased in vigor and usefulness, and with all of them Christian Endeavor has sought to be a loyal-co-laborer.

A Personal Testimony.

May I add, before I close, a personal word? During these thirty years I have given myself with what vigor or devotion I could command to work with and for the young people of our country and the world.

During these years I have journeyed more than 600,000 miles in their behalf, have been five times around the world, besides visits to South America and Mexico and many journeys to Europe and nearer Asia.

I have spoken to nearly two millions of these young people, who speak sixty languages, and who were willing to listen to my halting words through an interpreter. I have seen them in meetings great and small, and in their homes. I have seen them in shop and school and college, on the campus and the ball-field. I have heard their stumbling confession of Christ. I have watched them grow strong in the faith and zealous in many a great cause. I have heard them in after-years in the pulpits of our land or preaching to the untutored nations of other lands; and, the more I have seen of these young people, the more I have come to believe in them, trust them, love them.

Making allowance for all unhappy exceptions, I have come more and more, during all these thirty years, to admire their sanity, their courage, their devotion to the right. I have found them responsive to every worthy appeal from God or country, and I have unbounded hope for the future, as more and more the affairs of state and nation fall into their hands.

I thank God for every mile I have traveled in their behalf, for every meeting I have addressed, for every kindly hand I have taken; and I can say with all heartiness, "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places," and so far as I may have the love and confidence of the young people of today I have a goodly heritage.

THE DEADLY CIGARETTE.

"Let's see what auntie says." Presently two little boys came in.

"Please, Aunt Sarah," asked James, "did you ever know any one injured by cigarette smoking? We have learned," he went on, "what the text-book says, and the teacher tells us it is ruinous; but some of the boys do smoke them, and say it doesn't hurt at all.'

Aunt Sarah looked lovingly into the earnest faces upturned to hers, as she replied:

"Yes, my dears, I do know of boys ruined by cigarettes, 'harmless ones, too, the dealer called them.'

"During the summer vacation three boys but little older than you, began smoking them. Before the fall term of school ended two were obliged to leave, Charlie having convulsions, and Edward, sore throat, both caused by tobacco poisoning, the doctors said. A few weeks later Charlie died; while Edward, in spite of the most skilled care and nursing that love and money could supply only lingered till early spring."

"And the other boy, Auntie," asked Harry, "what of him?"

"Well," resumed Aunt Sarah, "he says 'Tobacco never hurt me,' but from being at the head of his class he has dropped down near the foot. Instead of being the industrious, ambitious, wide-awake boy of one year ago, he is now idle, careless, apathetic, enjoying nothing as much as what he calls a good smoke with some one as dull as himself."

Nicotine poisoning shows itself in many forms, and often is not so quickly visible as in the cases I have mentioned; but you may be sure it is a viper that never forgets to bite. Like the alcohol curse there is no safety save in total abstinence from tobacco using. Avoid it as you would a deadly reptile.—Word and Work.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

A good congregation, both morning and night, at Haw River last Sunday. At the morning hour communion service was observed. Miss Mary Trollinger joined the church. She came to us from the M. E. Church, South. We extend to her a hearty welcome. The new song books added very much to the services.

Mrs. W. C. Crutchfield and Mrs. Jno. Stout of Haw River are among the sick ones.

It has been decided to have Easter services at both Graham and Haw River.

Sunday-school attendance at Graham was 70, at Haw River 76. The enrollment and average attendance for the first three months of the Conference year are as follows:

Graham.

Dec. Enrollment 80, average 41 3-4.
Jan. Enrollment 84, average 50 1-5.
Feb. Enrollment 91, average 61 3-4

Haw River.

Dec. Enrollment 93, average 52 3-4.
Jan. Enrollment 89, average 67 3-5.
Feb. Enrollment 90, average 63 1-4.

On March 13 Bro. Robt. Collins went to his eternal reward. He was more than 77 years old. He became a Christian many years ago and died in the faith. We laid his body to rest in the Graham cemetery on March 14. His faithful wife is now in very feeble health.

Denton Baracas to Debate.

The Senior Baraca Class of the M. P. Church will meet the Senior Baracas of the M. E. Church in debate on Saturday night, March 25th. The query, "Resolved that the social side of the Baraca work is detrimental to the spiritual," will be discussed. The affirmative is held by the M. E. Baracas against M. P. Baracas on the negative.

Everyone is invited to come and hear the discussion.

Dear Herald:

Bro. Ashburn filled his appointment here the second Sunday afternoon. He gave us a fine sermon. I know I am safe in saying our people are well pleased with their new pastor.

Our Sunday-school is moving on nicely. We have reorganized as follows: Mr. J. H. Allen was re-elected Supt., Mr. Chas. Camp, Asst. Supt., Miss Hattie Garner, Sec., Mr. W. M. Jordan, teacher of Class No. 1, Mrs. J. W. Allen, Class No. 2, Mrs. L. E. Woodruff, Class No. 3, Miss Ezelle Martin, Class No 4, Mrs. W. M. Jordan, Class No 5. Let us make a good start and hold out faithfully.

We were pleased to have Mr. and Mrs. O'Brien, also Mr. Troxler from Roanoke Rapids to worship with us Sunday. Mr. O'Brien gave us a very interesting talk on the Sunday-school lesson.

There is much sickness in the community. It is said that some of our Sunday-school members have the scarlet fever.

Pray for us that we may do more this year than we have in the past. I will close with best wishes for the "Herald" and its readers.

An M. P. Girl.

Garysburg, N. C., March 14, 1911.

—Bro. J. F. Gerringer has moved from Gibsonville to Lexington, Dakota Mill.

WHAT ONE GIRL DID.

A Baptist girl in Detroit tells in the most modest way of a remarkable work accomplished by herself during the past year. She had become deeply interested in missions, but was unable to give largely to further the work. Her time, however, she could, to a large extent, control. This she has used to such advantage that she has raised nearly a thousand dollars in her own church.

She found on enquiry that there were 375 women and girls in the membership of her own church, of whom only 75 were enrolled on the treasurer's books as making any contribution to missions. Her method of attacking the problem was as follows:

She bought a city map, on which by pins she located every woman and girl on the church list. From this map she made district calling lists. Armed with pledges and packages of literature she proceeded to call upon every one of these women. She usually devoted her morning because she found the women at home. She prayed much, scolded not at all, presented the marvelous opportunities, and asked a minimum pledge of five cents a week. Any pledges received she turned over at once to the treasurer. In the prosecution of her self-imposed task, this young girl made nearly one thousand calls. She said in almost all cases she was kindly received; and in many cases got more than she asked for. She attributes her success to the fact that she based all her appeals on the love of Christ, and that she expected definite prayer to be answered by a guidance that should give her favor with those whom she visited. In addition to the thonsand dollars raised she has distributed hundreds of pamphlets dealing with the needs of the fields. All who heard the simple, modest rehearsal of what God had wrought through his dear child received a new vision of the possibility of missionary service on this side of the sea.—Helping Hand.

I KNOW NOT, I TRUST.

I know not the day of my leaving
The sunshine and shadows of earth,
But I know I am daily receiving
Strength for my heavenly birth.

I know not what trials await me,
As sorrow swept pathways I tread;
But I know that foes will berate me,
And Satan his meshes will spread.

O, Father, I pray thou wilt keep me,
Through faith in thy infinite word,
That glory crowned angels will greet me
As they come in the clouds with my Lord.

C. E. TOPIC FOR MARCH 26—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

Missions in the Western United States, Isa. 62:1-12.

The Scripture:—Appoint some to read who has a good voice and fine dramatic sense. The reading or better the reciting of these 12 verses by such on one will be wonderfully telling in the success of the meeting. Let the comment be by the chairman of the Missionary Committee.

The Teacher:—As a month ago we studied the peculiar problems of the South from the Missionary standpoint, so at this portion of our great Republic. Rere we portion of our great Republic. Here we meet the problem of sin in many forms, which is the great foe to all progressive missionary work. But there are problems peculiar to the West—such as Mormonism, the Indian Question, intrenched heathenism. Concerning one of these the leader will no doubt fe l inclined to speak, providing for the others through his assistants.

Special Work:—Have written work or short addresses on such themes as: Mormonism; The Indians; Heathen Worship in the West; Jireh College; Mr. Roosevelt's visit to our Rifle, Coloraddo, church; Our Mission Points in the West; Our Missionaries in the West.

Questions for Meditation and Voluntary Answer:

When did our denomination begin home mission work in the West?

How has the work succeeded?

What is the need of home-mission work?

How does heathen worship happen to be in the West?

Is it right to allow this to go on?

How can it be prevented?

What are the peculiar problems of Indian evangelization?

Why do we need to study home-mission books and magazines?

How can our Society help Western Missions?

Tell of the work of one home-mission worker in the West. (To several).

Tell about missionary work in logging camps.

In the mining camps.

In the ranch country.

WESTERN MISSION POINTS. FROM MANY PENS.

Miners are insolated from the rest of the world, and need the friendship of Christ. They are strong, and are needed for the work of Christ.

Our northwest is a great agricultural region, one of the richest in the world. It is for the church to see that it also bears the fruits of the Spirit.

The West is the great field for experience in social and political life. God grant that it may also make "the Great Experiment" of Christianity.

"Dry farming" is a system of deep and persistent cultivating, breaking up the soil very fine and pulverizing it continually. It renders even the deserts fertile, and is a fine illustration of the breaking up of hard hearts which the gospel accomplishes.

Vast regions of the West are rendered fertile by the government's enormous irrigation works. By operations as gigantic let the church bring to these great empires the water of life.

The Mormons are the peril that hangs over most of the Western States; and in proportion as they gain influence there they will become a peril to the entire country.

The Indians constitute an important gospel field in the West; and we owe them the gospel, having taken so much from them.

Pioneer life has many perils, but none greater than the removal of the restraints of society and custom. Nowhere in the country are good habits so severely tested.

"The wild and wooly West" is a misnomer nowadays. When the American Board met in Portland, Oregon, that rich and cultivated city, a good lady in Boston wrote to the pastor of the splendid church that was to entertain the society offering to send out a melodeon for the use of the meetings, if there was any one there who would play it!

The Chinese and Japanese that are found in such numbers in the West afford a noble opportunity for the church, bringing foreign mission fields right to our doors.

Mammonism is a terrible peril in the West, with its many chances for money-making. The church is the only opponent that can conquer Mammon.

The West is a congeries of vast empires that may be won now with comparative ease, but the work will be immensely more difficult later.

The Christian Endeavor Society is especially useful in the West, where there are so many communities without churches. In all such places our society will hold the ground till a pastor comes, and often such a society has grown into a church.

There are over fifty heathen temples where heathen worship is conducted in this country, the greater number of these are found in the cities of the Pacific coast.

A missionary went into one of the neglected places of the West, and one of the old timers grasped his hand and looking wistfully into his face said "Sir, we have waited twenty years for you."

Christ's home land is today a foreign mission field. We must keep the light burning brightly at home.

Dr. Sallada tells of a town two years old, with three hundred people. No Sunday-school or church service of any sort has ever been held in the town.

Japanese Buddhist missions expend forty thousand dollars per year to plant that faith upon the Pacific coast. Thi is probably twice what any Protesta church appropiates for Japanese work there. Buddhism has a finer headquarters building in Fresno, California, than any mission building of the most numerous Protestant body operating on the coast.

—A little girl living in an old mud hut, near a filthy cow yard, lay dying. She was seen by a Zenana worker, and, when spoken to, said: "I went to a Sunday-school one day and heard about Jesus. I never went back, but I talk to Him while I am lying here, and He talks back to my heart and I am His girl." A few days after, the worker returned to the house just as the little one was dying. She motioned the missionary to come near, and whispered: "He has promised to take me home." The Lord's work was being done in that filthy Indian home.

SAINT PATRICK.

It is a common practice to follow the Roman Catholic tradition, that the so-called St. Patrick was the first person who preached Christianity in Ireland. And as "St. Patrick's day" annually causes the tradition to be repeated, there is a constant increase of literature impressing it on young readers.

Possibly it is not a matter of great importance that the error should be corrected; but, when attempts are constantly being made to assign missionary glory to sectarian persecutors, there may be no wrong in correcting it. Also, it is possible that some student might suppose that my statement in my late history, "Six Centuries," detracting from the glory of Patrick, had been hastily made.

But I wish it clearly understood that my statement was not hastily made. There is no historical evidence that Patrick was the first preacher of the gospel in Ireland, except the tradition. While I admit that the tradition itself would be sufficient if it were ancient enough, and were not contradicted, it should be stated that tradition usually loses its proving force when there are elements in it indicating an artificial make-up, or when it is opposed by documents of its reputed period, or when there are other certain events of history contradicting it.

It is not proper here to go into a minute discussion; but it is sufficient to say that there is so much of the artificial about the tradition that some critics doubt strongly whether there ever was such a man as Patrick, as distinct from others having connection with the events of the age. The name is admittedly merely patricius, signifying patrician, and has hardly any more identifying force than the word doctor, or count, or duke, or aristocrat, of our time. It is even argued whether Patrick's true individual name was Palladius, or Sucat, or Cothidge.

The tradition makes Patrick first to have converted the chiefs. This element harmonizes with the practice of the Roman Catholic missionaries, who used government power to spread their influence. It is accompanied by the other element in the tradition, that Patrick opposed heresy in Ireland. But why, or how, if he was the first preacher? Who had been preaching heresy there?

The meager documentary evidence indicates that there were "Irish believers in Christ," before the date of the arrival in Ireland, of Sucat (now considered the traditional Patrick.)

But the subject is too complicated to go into details; and I merely repeat that there is no convincing proof that the reputed St. Patrick first preached the gospel in Ireland, and considerable evidence and argument against it.

NOTES.

—Under the guise of "peaceful maneuvers" and "to try the efficiency of the fighting resources of the nation" President Taft, as commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, has ordered a hurried mobilization of soldiers, sailors and marines to the southwest, along the line between Texas and Mexico. It looks as if this movement meant a show down to Mexico which has been in a state of turmoil and strife for some time; but the official announcement has it that it is only for practice. At any rate Uncle Sam seems ready for business along the Mexican borders if occasion arises.

—A correspondent of the Associated Press gives out this from President Taft as to why troops are assembling along the Mexican border:

"All doubt as to the purpose of the government in sending 20,000 troops to the Mexican border has at last been swept away. The United States has determined that the revolution in the republic to the South must end. The American troops have been sent to form a solid military wall along the Rio Grande to stop filibustering and to see that there is no further smuggling of arms and men across the international boundary.

"It is believed that with this source of contraband supplies cut off the insurrectionary movement which has disturbed conditions generally for nearly a year without accomplishing anything like the formation of a responsible independent government will speedily come to a close."

—The Hookworm Commission and State Board of Health, Raleigh, are doing much to eradicate the hookworm disease in this State, already about 15,000 cases having been treated. The people are more interested in this disease than at first and there is promise of wiping it out, if intelligent co-operation may be had on the part of the people. Rockefeller's gift was not a bad one by any means.

—Rev. F. B. Meyer of London is to preach in Chicago a week beginning June 4th, under the auspices of the Moody Bible Institute.

—The House of Representatives voted, and without a dissenting voice, that it should be called "Civil War" and not the "War of the Rebellion."

—Burlington has the C. E. Convention March 31, April 1, 2. High Point has the State S. S. Convention April 26-28. Greensboro will have some of the benefits of both.

—Rev. R. M. Andrews is president of the State S. S. Association.

—The great authority on Sunday-school work, Mr. Marion Lawrance, is to be at the High Point Convention.

—Rev. Abel Kirkman died this week, after a prolonged illness. He was for many years Register of Deeds of Guilford County, and was one of the most popular officials the county has ever had. In addition to his work in this office, he did a good deal of preaching.

—Guilford's Court House will have an annex to cost from $4,000 to $5,000.

—Rev. Daniel Field, of Leaksville, has been superintendent of his Sunday-school for fifty years. He has been absent only eleven Sundays in this time, and always from good cause.

—Lafayette Holt, of Burlington, has invented a rotary engine which promises much, if current accounts are true.

WASTE.

O the love in the world that is running to waste,
While there's many a heart would be glad of a share!
But so high out of reach and so awkwardly placed
Is this love in the world that is running to waste
It is risking one's life to attempt but a taste;
While the doing without is slow death by despair
Of this love in the world that is running to waste,
While there's many a heart would be glad of a share.

—R. E. Black, in Pall Mall Magazine.

"Helping together by prayer" II Cor. 1, 11.)

I like to feel that though on earth
We never meet,
Yet we may hold heart-fellowship
At God's dear feet.
I like to feel in all the work
Thou hast to do,
That I, by lifting hands of prayer
May help thee too.
I like to think that when on high
Results we see.
Perchance thou wilt rejoice that I
Thus prayed for thee!

GENERAL COMMISSION ON ARCHIVES & HISTORY THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH

SOME OF GOD'S CHOSEN.

That God is indeed visiting the Gentiles and taking out of them a people for His name, and that many from the land of Sinim are among these, no Christian who has lived this last decade in China can for a moment doubt. We who literally see the prophecies fulfilled before our eyes, are to be envied. When we consider that our word "Church" means an assembly of called-out ones, and that God's choice of people is still as different from man's as it was in the time of Samuel and the sons of Jesse, our very disappoint-His name, and that many from the land ments in some from whom we hoped much, lead us closer to Him, who is "no respector of persons, but from every nation accepteth those who fear Him, and work righteousness." Nothing delights a missionary's soul more, than to meet one of those God-chosen souls, and it is of a few of those I wish to speak.

Into the women's dispensary in the city of Paotingfu came an old gentleman the first week of January, 1908. "Do not send to the men's hospital without first having a talk with him," pleaded the woman who kept the gate. "He has only a trifling eye ailment. He is no ordinary man and I think his heart is open." In our first conversation he told me that, for years, he had visited a high temple, far distant from his home. There sitting down quietly behind the idols, without eating, sleeping or moving more than was absolutely necessary, and holding in his breath, he had stayed as long as three days at a time, hoping desperately that he might hear the voice of the true God. One year he spent no less than seven months in this waiting attitude. Greedily, he listened now to the story of God's love, and His unspeakable gift to the world, and like a little child the old man received the words spoken. It was the week of prayer. He came to the meetings and to church; then he disappeared. A Chinese evangelist tried hard to find him but failed. Ten months afterwards, God answered our prayers by sending his grand daughter to the dispensary. She told us the old gentleman had died praying, a few days after he last visited us. Surely, this soul had followed the light of his conscience and God gave him the True Light ere he died.

Another city dispensary patient asked me to visit her mother-in-law who was too much of an invalid to go out. As soon as the woman heard the dear Old Story she exclaimed, "Every word you have uttered is true, positively true?" "What makes you so sure of it?" I asked. "Listen," she said, "long ago I was left a young widow with two small children. My boy lay at the point of death, and the household was in despair. Going out into the court I looked up at the stars and, kneeling down, I vowed to the One who made those that, if He would make my boy well, never again would I burn incense or worship hand made gods. The life was spared, I have kept my vow, and now, something in my heart tells me it is of the same God of whom you speak." Old, and delicate as she was, my listener went to work to learn to read and had read the first few chapters in John, when her son was called to an official position farther south. The family left Paotingfu taking with them a servant who had heard the gospel and believed.

Five years passed. The old lady died, and the servant came back with the funeral procession. She told us that rarely a day had passed without the two uniting in prayer, sometimes three times a day. The old lady had helped her with her reading, so that she was well on in the books which we like them to read and understand, before applying for baptism. "I mean to have no other purpose in life until I am admitted to the Church," she told us.

Access to the yamen ladies is sometimes difficult, but one day, as interpreter for Dr. Elizebeth Lewis, I had a beautiful chance of meeting three daughters-in-law of one family. The interest shown made me long for a second visit and, after many months, the invitation came. At the home on this occasion,I missed one young lady whom I had liked very much and, on enquiring for her, found that she was ill. I asked to see her, and was delighted to find that she remembered all the main points of our conversation. In my pocket was a leaflet with selected texts and a short prayer which she was pleased to get. As I left, I promised somehow or other to get a book to her that would enable her to see, from God's own Word, His plan of salvation for mankind. How to get the book to the yamen without bringing censure upon her head was a difficult matter; but remembering that a calling acquaintance of mine, a dear old lady, was related to her by marriage, I asked the acquaintance to be my messenger. Shortly after the young lady died, and the next time I saw the old lady she said to me, "She is in heaven, she believed in Jesus."

"What makes you think so?" I asked. "Why," she answered, "the day I slipped your book from my big sleeve into hers, she whispered to me. 'How can we help believing when they have come so far, just to tell us?' and," added the sweet old lady, "I believe and my daughter believes, but we must keep quiet because of our superiors."

Before I knew her, this same lady ate nothing palatable for twenty-five years, as a thank-offering to the unknown God who had given her such good parents! Surely the Chinese are grateful!

One of our church women gave five dollars as her Christmas gift to the Lord for the poor, although her total income was only thirty-five dollars. Another, who gained the first dollar she ever possessed by memorizing four hundred Scripture verses when asked what she was going to do with it, said: "I suffer so every Sunday when the collection plate passes and I have nothing to put into it, that I am going to divide this into coppers and have something for all the Sundays this year." The donor said, "Pray about it." Next Lord's Day the woman's happy face was clouded. "I prayed about it," she said, "and I woke in the night thinking of it, and a voice seemed to say, there is a debt of six dollars in the family and the Bible says 'Owe no man anything,' so I gave my dollar to my husband, to be subtracted from our debt."

The Chinese women church members have a Bible woman of their own whom they support and daily pray for. The servant woman above mentioned gave the last copper she possessed as her contribution. Surely we may sit at their feet sometimes and learn of Him who said "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Ministers and Woman's Foreign Missionary Workers.

The North Carolina Branch of Woman's Foreign Missions meets in Greensboro, Apr. 20 and 21. It is earnestly requested that each church, whether there is a Woman's organization there or not, send at least one lady representative. The Greensboro ladies extend an invitation to the ladies of the various Methodist Protestant churches throughout the state, to attend this meeting. Much good has been done by the Woman's Foreign Mission workers, and plans are being made for greater work to carry out our Lord's command "Go ye into all lands." In order to do effective, systematic work in the organizations the members must be acquainted with the needs. This can be done by attending Branch meetings. Let each auxiliary send as many delegates as will come, and will the pastors of the various churches not help us by insisting on representatives from each charge?

Mrs. Wm. C. Hammer, Cor. Sec., N. C. Branch of Foreign Missions.

—China, old stable China, is becoming one of the progressive nations. Within the past year, slavery has been abolished, an opium reform greatly acclerated, and representative government begun.

MARCH IS THE CHURCH EXTENSION MONTH.

The Board of Church Extension had no funds left over from last year, with which to meet the claims of the present year. We must depend upon this year's collections for money to pay the men in the field. It is hoped that remittances will be made to the Treasurer promptly. If the individual member could realize that the small amount which he fails to contribute promptly is causing somebody to be delayed in receiving his rightful due, and that needless inconvenience, not to say suffering, results from his neglect, I am sure he would think more seriously before waiting until the end of the year to pay what he could pay, just as easily, perhaps, during this month. I trust it will not be considered presumptuous for me to request the pastors to urge their people to pay the Church Extension promptly, and that all remittances be made to the treasurer without delay. No one knows, so well as a pastor, the pastor's needs. Requests have been coming from the pastors on mission fields for payments on salary. These payments can be made, only as the money is sent in by other pastors.

J. Norman Wills, Treasurer.

ARE YOU DOING YOUR SHARE?

Are you doing your share at making the world better? That is a straightforward question, and each man and woman of us ought to try to give it an honest answer. Suppose no one else were doing any more than we are, what would be the chances of the millennium dawning one of these bright mornings? If every other man's light were no brighter than ours, when would it be likely that the day of the Lord would flood this old earth with the glory of its dawning? If every other Christian had as many unchristly characteristics as we have, and was as indifferent and half-hearted as we about really living the Gospel of Christ among men, would that gospel stand a chance of redeeming the world of mankind from the blasting curse of sin? These may not be easy questions to answer with exactness; but if we honestly ask them, perhaps some answer will suggest itself that will set us thinking. And it may be that really we have not heretofore thought much about such questions as these. It is truly time that we did.—Christian Guardian.

—It is pleasing to read the South Carolina has begun to amend its marriage laws. A new law has passed which will require officers before issuing marriage licenses to investigate the qualifications of the applicants.

CHILDISH MEN.

Jesus charged the men of his generation with childishness. Great changes have taken place since that charge was made The race has laid aside some of its childish ways. It has not, however, entirely outgrown its childishness. Perhaps all of us must plead guilty to the charge. At least there have been times in our lives when we have behaved in a childish manner. We have been childish in our thought, in our speech, in our character. Paul says, "When I became a man I put away childish things." Would that we all might say so with equal truth.

Some men are childish in their littleness. A child is a little creature both in body and mind. It is small in understanding. It has no intellectual grasp or strength. It cannot solve hard problems, nor wrestle successfully with difficult business conditions. The desires and aspirations of children are as small as their mental powers. They do not desire great things. They would not know what use to make of them if they had them. They are content with tin horns, tin horses, tin soldiers, marbles, tops and kites. These are more to them than arms or banks.

There are many little men. They are full-grown in body, but what about their thought life? It moves in a very narrow circle. There are big things to be done, but they cannot do them. There are great things to be won, but they cannot win them. They do not even desire to possess them. They seek after farms and money and other things that perish with the using, but they have no desire to possess the Kingdom of God and His righteousness. They would not know what use they could make of these divine treasures. They think they would be a hindrance and an embarrassment to them rather than a help. They are like children.

Many are childish in heedlessness. Children are heedless. They hear many warnings, but pay little attention. They hear valuable instructions, but they do not learn. They require line upon line, line upon line, here a little and there a little before they will take heed. Some men are like that. Danger signals are displayed on the road to drunkenness, on the road to the penitentiary, on the road to disgrace, but many pay no attention. They pass on and are punished.

Some men are childish in their whims. Children are whimsical. It was to this feature of child life that Jesus referred when He said concerning the men of His generation: "They are like children playing in the market." The men of that generation heard John, and rejected him. They said he was too austere. His raiment was camel's hair and his meat locusts and wild honey. They said, He is no prophet. Then came Jesus, eating and drinking and dressing as other people, and they said He was no prophet because he was too much like a winebibber.

It is so still. Let your religion be sober and solemn and many will despise it. Let it be cheerful and happy and they will reject it. One preacher is too solemn for them. He talks too much about the grave and the judgment and eternity. They cannot hear him. He makes them nervous. Another preacher wakes the people up with witty speeches and they say he indulges in levity. Nothing suits them. The only religion they can endure is no religion at all. They do not like the Methodists because they are too noisy, because they are too quiet. The Congregationalists do not suit them because they are too scholarly. The Episcopalians cannot please them because they require too much millinery. The Baptists will not do because they require too much water. They are fruitful in objections. They do not know that their objections are all whims and their way is childish.

Some men are childish in their fighting propensity. Account for it as we will, it is true that children are prone to fight. Children in one house will pick a quarrel with the children living next door. Boys in one end of the town will fight the boys from the other end. Boys in the city quarrel with country boys. Sometimes children in the same family will fight each other. They are children. It is the way of the child. They say, "You cannot put old heads on young shoulders." True, but may we not expect mature heads on old shoulders? This is what we do not always see. When a man is fourscore years old and begins to manifest a little weakness in his reasoning powers people say he is childish. It may be so, but there seem to be many men not half so old who are childish also. working men and employers. Is there any good reason for it? What comes from it? Is there not a better way to settle differences? Men used to think the manly way to settle a quarrel or to get satisfaction in case one's honor had been touched was to fight a duel. Now we all know that it was not manly at all, but childish.

Think of the age-long quarrels between different religious denominations. Those who waged those unseemly wars thought they were acting the manly part. We now know that they were childish. Are wars between nations any better ? If we could stand on some distant star and look down on the feuds and wars and causes of wars; if we could hear from that distant region the discussions in Congress, in Parliament and in Cabinets which result in war, and then behold all the horrible result, would we not be impressed with the childishness of it all?

Let us pray for larger minds, larg r lives. Let us seek diligently to grow up into Christ our Living Head in all things until we shall come to the fullness of the stature of men in Christ Jesus. Then shall we go forth showing to the world a character like unto the manliest of all men, the only perfect man, the Man of Nazareth, the Man of Galilee, the man of Calvary.—N. Y. Advocate.

OUR BIBLE SCHOOL.

Answers to Assigned Questions.

26. I think God knew that Adam and Eve would not obey the Divine command. So far as I know we have no Scripture which refers to this special case, but we have much which refers to other cases; and if God knows what one man, or one class of men are going to do, why may he not know what each and every one is going to do. If he knew in some case after Adam, why not in Adam's case and in all cases? He is the same, yesterday, today, and forever.

Read the Prophets. You find there many things foretold very minutely, things in which personal free actions were to play a large part. Trace them up and you find them coming to pass years afterwards just as foretold. How could these things be foretold so exactly without knowing the future free actions of men?

In the case of the children of Israel, God speaks to them often in a way which would cause us to believe that he knew they would not obey.

In Deut. 31, just after God had made a covenant with them in the land of Moab, had made all his commandments plain, had set before them life and death, and Moses had plead with them so earnestly that it seemed impossible they could ever forget, He said to Moses "Thou shalt sleep with thy fathers; and this people will go a whoring after the gods of the strangers of the land * * * and will forsake me, and break my covenant which I have made with them."

Then in Isaiah 48:3 God says, "I have declared the former things from the beginning * * * I did them suddenly and they came to pass;" and of the children of Israel he says in verse 4, "I knew thou art obstinate, * * * 5 I have even from the beginning declared it to thee, * * * 8, I knew that thou wouldst deal very treacherously."

In Acts 15:18 we read, "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." Isa. 46:9 "I am God, and there is none like me. 10 Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done." How could God know all his works, how ccould He know the end from the beginning without knowing what we will do? To know the end he must know what He will do and to know what He will do, He must, in a wise dealing with us, know what we will do.

Read Isa 41:4; 42:9; 44:8. In commenting on 41:4, one writer says, "To Him the whole range of creaturely existence, in all its cycles must be visible." On 42:9, he says, "As the law of the vegetable's life is contained in the germ, so is the whole order of events in the moral world pre-existent in the Divine Idea."

Then the question comes, even though God be able to know all these things, may he not in some cases at least withhold his omniscient power as Christ did his concerning the final judgment? In the first place, we must remember that at the time referred to Christ was on earth in human form, He was the man Christ Jesus. In humanity knowledge is progressive, so it must have been in some measure at least, with Christ while in the flesh. Of course God communicated to Him such supernatural knowledge as he needed. He did not at this time of the final judgment; therefore, this was withheld by God the Father.

As to God's withholding his own omniscient power. I do not think it possible. I can not think he could know what to will to not know without knowing something of the thing which he willed to not know. His choosing to not know a thing implies a knowledge of that thing.

Mrs. Geo. L. Curry.

(The question of God's foreknowledge and predestination is a profound and difficult one. Some say that if we accept the view that God foreknows all, we cannot escape the view that He pre-determines all. Others say that knowledge is not causal, and that God can foreknow without pre-determining. This, however, has never been made clear. It seems to us that what is known is already determined. Mrs. Curry argues well for the common view, but we would like to hear from others who think that God may not really know in advance what use a free moral agent will make of his freedom.)

Lesson for Next Week.

Numbers, chapters 1 to 12 inclusive.

TWO VOICES. A CONTRAST.

Last night while walking silently among the trees, watching the stars, I heard a voice on another hill singing in sweet tones,

"Jesus Savior, pilot me O'er life's tempestuous sea."

Almost in the same instance I heard a voice along the highway taking the name of God in vain. "What a contrast," I cried, to hear the sweet voice of a soul singing the praises of the Savior, while another filled the air with horrid words. The voice of the drunken, carousing man soon hushed, while the other rang on in a tone that filled the air with music. "The deeds of the wicked soon perish; while the righteous live forever" says the wise man. How true this is! We see it being fulfilled every day. Last Thursday as I sat on the car with a man, of long experience in the school room, he said, "Two boys, of good character and minds, come to my school once. Both boys of the same community, of the same chances in school, about the same age. One a wicked boy, the other a true Christian. They started in the same class. The boy who was a Christian soon left the wicked one behind, soon finished his course and went away to college. Ten years past and one day while in the town of ————, the court bell rang calling the court together. I went up into the court room. There strokes of the gavel were heard, and looking at the face of the judge, behold he was the boy that left his class mate ten years ago. The sheriff marched some prisoner's into the room; a familiar name was heard, and how strange it really was. For here was my boy that was left. But as I looked at him I said, to myself, "What a pity; you are left again unless your school mate (the judge) sets you free."

"Don't understand me to say that a wicked man can not make a success in his studies and make a successful man, but the trap along the road of a sinful life oftentimes catches the hopes, aims and ambitions of a young man."

The porter called out my station, and with much regret I had to leave my friend. But I am thinking yet of the voice that sings, and the voice that swears.

Bro. Raper filled his regular appointment Sunday and preached an helpful sermon, as he always does. Every one present seemed to enjoy his sermon so much. Prayer meeting fourth Sunday at eleven o'clock. We expect to have our literature and organize our Sunday-school on that day. We hope to see lots of little folks and big folks too, for that is what it takes to make a good Sunday-school. And may the Lord help each of us to take more interest in Sunday-school work this year than ever before.

Tabernacle Circuit.

The second quarterly conference met in Julian M. P. Church last Saturday, preaching at 11 a. m. The conference was held immediately after preaching. All the churches represented, a very good attendance from Tabernacle and Julian; but not so with the other two churches; only one from each of them, Bro. J. A. Sharp was present but not as a member of the conference, and we were glad to have him present. The usual business was transacted in good spirits, Bros. J. F. Coble and C. C. Lineberry were nominated for election to represent the circuit in our next Annual Conference.

It was ordered by the conference that the circuit pay the railroad fare of the delegate to and from Conference. The reports on Sunday-schools were very good. The trustees reported some improvements contemplated during the year at Moriah. Shady Grove and Tabernacle, and Moriah and Shady Grove are now raising money for the purpose. Some of the churches are holding class and prayer-meetings and I hope they will become more enthusiastic over these lines of work.

The stewards reported as follows on pastor's salary: Tabernacle paid the past quarter and for the year, $64.75; Julian paid past quarter $21.50, and for the year $28.75; Moriah paid past quarter $18.00, and for the year $19.00; Shady Grove paid past parter $2.00, and for the year $2.00. Stewards for general interest have paid president's salary and are beginning to work on the other interest; as the spring begins to dawn we expect to raise every cent we can.

There has been some money raised for other purposes on the charge.

Some of the churches are expecting to hold Easter services, and I hope all will if they can, for I believe it will increase the attendance of both Sunday-school and church services.

Our special meetings and engaged help are as follows:

Shady Grove, 4th Sunday in July, Rev. Ed Suits of Thomasville, N. C.

Tabernacle, 1st Sunday in August, Rev. J. D. Williams of Burlington, N. C.

Moriah, 4th Sunday in August Rev. J. A. Burgess of Burlington, N. C.

Julian, 5th Sunday in July, Rev. T. M. Johnson of Asheboro, N. C.

Hope these brethren will take notice and be well.

C. A. Cecil.

Burlington.

Through an oversight, we failed to report last week. However will say that our attendance was 237 at S. S. on the second Sunday. Last Sunday we had 180, which was an excellent attendance when the weather is considered.

All services of the church are now well attended. The prayer meeting has been rained out several times lately.

The S. S. voted to pay for laying a concrete walk from the church to the street at a cost of about $30.00, and the work is now progressing.

Since our last report our church has lost another of its most loyal and devoted members. On last Friday morning about six o'clock Bro. Will Griffith passed away after a very short illness. Bro. Griffith was a member of the Board of Stewards and served well in that capacity. He was very faithful in his attendance at all the services of the church, and he will be sorely missed. The funeral was conducted at the church on Saturday afternoon, and the remains laid to rest in Pine Hill Cemetery by North State Council, No. 34, Jr. O. U. A. M. and Purity Council, No. 22, Daughters of Liberty, of which Bro. Griffith was an honored member. We extend sympathy to the bereaved.

On last Monday, Bro. Williams conducted the funeral of little Eula Coble, daughter of Mr. R. A. Coble, of Bellmont, at Mt. Pleasant, Liberty Ct. This was a very sad death, and one which touched the writer deeply, as Eula was one of his pupils less than a month before her death. She was a bright child. The parents and other relatives have our sympathy.

Bro. Williams has also performed two marriage ceremonies recently. On last Wednesday evening Miss Rosa Crawford and Mr. Carl Stanford were married. On Thursday at the home Prof. T. C. Amick, at Elon College, Mr. John H. Howard, of Great Falls, S. C., and Miss Lula Amick, daughter of Mr. Geo. Amick, of this county, were married. They will reside in Great Falls, S. C. We wish both couples much joy.

Several of our congregation are sick at this writing. We are glad to know that the Misses Baulding who have been very sick are improving rapidly.

Our pastor filled his regular appointment Sunday; two excellent sermons. The weather being unfavorable, congregations smaller than usual. Those present enjoyed soul-stirring sermons. He seems to be an electric wire connected with the power of God; this being true the message that he delivers must come from God direct to the hearers.

We have a live S. S., our Supt., C. H. Surratt, is taking great interest in the school. He has introduced the idea of each class acting as Supt., one Sunday each from Senior to Junior. By so doing our school has no special form of service; seems to meet with approval. An increase of attendance of 45 per cent.

A liberal reward for the arrest of the fathers and mothers to be brought into S. S. Christ said, Go ye therefore into the highways and as many as ye shall find bid to the marriage. Matthew 22: 9.

We are privileged to bid our friends to S. S. and not till then are we clear of God's bidding. Lord, teach us thy will concerning our own soul's welfare, while here we stay.

The Young Men's Prayer-meeting is an uplift to our cause. They seem to take special interest in the work. We are glad to note the larger per cent of the young men attend these services. May God bless the young men and make them useful.

Our mid week prayer meeting is largely attended.

Bad weather and a two weeks' siege of grip has kept me from doing very much during March. Quite a number are sick with grip and colds in our community just now. Signs of life and activity are to be seen on every hand on this charge. We find something doing at every church and we are more hopeful than ever of a good year's work for the Master. I find that a number of people read the Herald to know what's going on in the church in the state. Quite a number yet who need to take their church paper in order to be more interested in what their church is doing.

Wish you could see the recent improvement made at Rehoboth. Doesn't look like the same church, especially inside.

The Vance County Interdenominational S. S. Convention meets at Union Chapel this week and we are hoping to get much help from that for our Sunday-school workers. Some of our teachers are expecting to attend the State Convention in High Point.

Quite a number attended services at Antioch yesterday, notwithstanding the rain.

Sunday-school re-organized at Mt. Carmel yesterday. We are expecting to do better work in all departments as spring opens up.

We have been kindly remembered in a substantial way since last report by Sisters Rogers, E. R. Bobbitt, and Mundy, also Bros. Stephen Floyd and John Mundy.

Our second quarterly conference meets at Rehoboth first Sunday in April at 11 a. m.; hope all the officials will be present, and any others who may be interested. Preaching and then the business of the Conference.

Praying that this may be a prosperous year in soul saving with us all.

Sincerely,
N. G. Bethea.

We are moving along and it looks like our people are to forge ahead any how. Mr. W. F. Ivey has been elected Supt. of Sunday-school in place of Mr. George Lawrence, the former Supt., who resigned because of his not being in town. Sorry of course to give him up.

Our school has had an attendance as follows: Dec. 25, 108; Jan. 1, 46; Jan. 8, 80; Jan. 15, 82; Jan. 22, 75; Jan. 29, 82; Feb. 5, 94; Feb. 12, 80; Feb. 19, 92; Feb. 26, 40; Mar. 5, 80; Mar. 12, 81; Mar. 19, 32.

Our school has Baraca and Philathea classes and a Junior class or two. We are aiming to do good work. We have a good congregation at preaching usually. The weather was bad yesterday and not many out. They were the ones that come always any way, really the salt of the earth. We hope in the future to give a better report in S. S. and preaching service.

New Hope, Why Not Circuit

We are having a very good Sunday-school at New Hope now. We think it will be much better as spring opens up.

Our pastor, Rev. J. H. Stowe, has preached for us three times this conference year and gave us something interesting and helpful each time. Bro. Stowe moved his family to the parsonage at Why Not recently in order to send his children to school there. We are glad to have his family on the circuit again and we are hoping for a good year's work.

The enrollment of the school at Why Not is the largest in its history and several new students expected in soon.

A large crowd attended the box party at the academy Friday night, March 17. 42 boxes were sold and brought $20.15. The proceeds will be used to buy additional books for the school library etc. Prof. Garner is doing a good work which should be appreciated by all patrons of his school.

Dear Editor:

Please give these thoughts space in the Herald.

Dear friends and brothers and sisters, we who claim to be Christians, what are we doing for our Lord in trying to save lost souls; or to tear down the strong hold of sin and Satan and build up Christ's kingdom? I fear we church members have gotten cold and gotten too far from God; and I fear if we don't get nearer God and live more for him than we have he will hold us responsible for many people that are going astray. Now, dear ones, have we got on the whole armor of God, and are we working daily for God, or for the good of this world and a good time here? I think if we are to be servants of the Lord, we will have to get about his holy work in a different way from just attending church and Sunday-school. We say we would like to see this town saved. What are we doing to get it saved? Are we all praying earnestly and without ceasing? are we walking just as we should before God and the world? I fear we are not doing just what we might in every way towards getting the people of our town saved; for we are too afraid or making some one mad or else we haven't got enough of the grace of God in our hearts to face the sinners with God's holy word. O may the Lord help us to see our weakness, and come to Him just as we should, and may he help us to be willing to do any thing for Him in spite of what the world might say. If we were willing to do anything for our Lord's sake; he would give us the victory over sin and Satan. If we who profess to be Christians and do sincerely want to do our Master's will and want to tear down Satan's dens we can tear them down here, if we will just take it all to God in earnest prayer and put him in front as our guide and go right to work with the Spirit helping us. May the Lord help us to obey him and be ready to do any thing for our Lord's sake. Now dear friends and church members, you know our protracted meeting is to begin the first Sunday in May. Do let us go to praying and talking and working now for that meeting and pray and talk earnestly that many, many souls may be saved.

Now may the Lord help us to pick up our C. E. and missionary societies and go right on with them. We can't afford to let such good things die out; if we want to do our Master's will, let's go to work now.

Now, dear readers of the Herald, pray for us, and pray for me that I may be entirely the Lord's and obey him at all times that my light may shine the right way.

Yours in love,
E. V. Blackwelder.

Although yesterday (Sunday) was dark, gloomy and drizzling, it seemed to have no effect on quite a good congregation who greeted our pastor, Rev. T. A. Williams, at Pleasant Hill at 11 o'clock. Text, Luke 13: 6-7. Wish I had time and space to tell you some of the good things we feasted our souls on. Rev. Williams spoke of our having an Easter service, which we hope will be gotten up.

The S. S. is small, but there is life in it, and there is plenty of material scattered around, outside, idling away precious time, that could, and should be given to church and S. S. work. What's the matter? A screw loose somewhere? Well, may be it's my fault, may be it's your fault. Whereven the fault is it should be corrected, and a creditable service rendered. We were pleased to have worship with us yesterday Prof. and Mrs. W. B. Speas of Winston-Salem; also Miss Ida Long and Bro. from near Winston-Salem.

On last Saturday Prof. C. F. Hauser closed his school at Dosier with an old time exhibition. It was indeed very creditably rendered, showing careful training. There was an immense crowd present and everybody orderly and well-pleased.

We are glad to welcome back to the community Mr. J. F. Hunter and family from Clemmons. John is a son of Uncle Quill and you all know him; he's one of the oldest members of P. H. Church and a faithful attendant at Sunday school. As this is the first report I've made this year I wish to say that I like the new "dress" for our old Record very well. And I also wish to say that so far as I can learn every one likes our new pastor.

Dear. Herald, I would have paid you a visit earlier but thought another reporter had been appointed, but recently learned that I was the "same one again," so here I am. Thank you. Yes, I'll come again when I gather up something to say that I hope to be interesting.

Hickory Grove, Guilford Ct.

Our pastor, Bro. Plyler, filed his regular appointment here Sunday. The weather being unfavorable there were not many out to hear him. The sermon was helpful and interesting. Bro. Plyler is interested in the work and great good will be accomplished if we will only do our part. Hickory Grove has made some improvement by adding three new lamps that cost near twelve dollars. The church will be well lighted.

Our Sunday school is improving. Some changes have been made for the better, we think.

Asheville.

Last Sunday was a rainy day. 142 in main school. 25 at Woodfin Hill. 26 at Woolsey Hall.

The Saint Patrick Social on Friday evening was well attended. There were 71 present. The silver offering amounted to $7.60. There were 35 at the children's social in the afternoon. Their nickel offering amounted to $1.15; a total of $8.75 for the socials.

In the evening Mrs. J. Frank Thompson sang a number of selections which were richly enjoyed. She has a great voice and is willing to use it for the joy of others.

The next social by the Ladies' Aid will be an Art Sale on the 1st of April. They will charge ten cents admission.

There have been four marriges at the cottage within a bit over thirty days.

On the 9th of April we will celebrate the sixth anniversary of the first preaching service and Sunday-school we held in Asheville. We hope to have our new Corresponding Secretary-Treasurer, Dr. C. H. Beck, with us.

Shelby.

Dear Bro. McCulloch:—With your permission I will give to readers a brief statement about our work here in Shelby.

I have found 35 members of the M. P. Church here and are interested in our building an M. P. Church here. We start the work of building the church March 20.

We will build a neat church 36x54 with a steeple on the corner and recess pulpit.

We have a lot 54x200 ft. that cost $175. We have enough money and subscriptions to hull the church in. We would like to finish it while we are at it. So if anyone wants to help us we will thank you for it.

You can send it to H. W. Braswell or J. F. Carter, Shelby, N. C.

Now as to the work here. We have a fine opportunity here for our church. We have been well received by all denominations; they are glad for us to come here and they have helped us already and our people are very anxious. They have given very liberally. Bro. W. D. Pell and his people have helped us very much for which they have our thanks.

We have 19 members at Lincolnton where we will organize in the next month and will build by the middle of the year.

As to our church at Caroleen I will say that we have just closed one of the best meetings there that we were ever in. I have good hope for Caroleen. They are good people; they are loyal. They all seemed helped much by the meeting.

With best wishes to the editor and the brethren.

H. W. Braswell.

Paint Fork Church, Ivy Circuit.

Dear Herald:—Our pastor filled his appointment here yesterday with a grand sermon from Heb. 2: 3. "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?"

His theme was "neglect." The one thing that has wrecked many poor souls. He presented the text as a letter to the church. I trust that each heart present was so prepared for the reception of the truths; that not one of us again will neglect our duties to God: for a life for Christ is the only life that's worth while. Let us as we lie on our pillows at night recall the duties we have neglected and each day bring ourselves nearer to him who died for us.

Bro. Williams is a good man; and preaches with much zeal and earnestness. He has the power of the Holy Ghost ever present with him, and carries the truths to the hearts of those to whom he speaks. But, church members, let's not expect our pastor to do all the work. Let us lend a helping hand and much good will be accomplished for the Master this year; not be careless and negligent; remember neglect causes destruction to our never-dying souls.

Our Sabbath School is moving on nicely.

Some work is being done on our church grounds.

We have our regular prayer service on the second and fourth Sunday afternoons.

Sunday morning at 4 o'clock the death angel visited the home of Mr. Milton Radford, and took from him his dear companion, Clio Patria, daughter of J. M. Anderson, aged 24 years. She has been very ill with consumption for several months. She was a member of the Missionary Baptist Church, a faithful worker in Sunday School work. She was kind and pleasant to every one, and was loved by all who knew her. She will be laid to rest today at 11 o'clock. We realize our loss is her eternal gain.

March 20, 1911.

—Bros. S. A. Alexander and Everett Stafford, of Mt. Pleasant Sunday-school, came to Greensboro on Tuesday to attend the County S. S. Convention, which was held in the Friends' Church. Rev. A. G. Dixon was one of the speakers in the morning session.

—The death of our venerable brother George B. Johnson removes one of our very best laymen. He was a man of noble character, and was indeed a pillar to his church.

—Bro. James Pike, a brother of Rev. W. M. Pike, died a few days ago. He was accidentally wounded years ago, and this is thought to have shortened his life.

—Bro. J. W. Dixon is superintendent of a live Sunday-school held in a schoolhouse near his home. It is made up of different denominations.

—Bro. Dixon's address in the County S. S. Convention on Tuesday was well spoken of.

—The leader of the gang of train robbers that robbed a train in Georgia not long ago is an old man. He began his criminal career as a brigand in California by holding up stagecoaches. He was finally captured and served twenty years in prison. When he was released, he became a train robber and was again arrested, condemned and imprisoned. Now he is in the toils of the law again. A bad life surely his has been.

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

A heavier blow to the horrible White Slave Traffic was never struck than that in progressive Iowa a little while ago, when property interests were touched with the strong hand of the law. By the "Injunction and Abatement Law," in that state, it has become next to impossible for the "Madames" at the head of these places to rent a house or room for evil purposes. Any citizen can get in a day an injunction against a disorderly house or one even which general reputation has markel, and this injunction can only be raised when the owner of the property proves that his house is not being used for immoral purposes. Moreover, the entire furniture of the building is immediately confiscated, anl the house, without bed or chair or cooking utensil, becomes, of course, absolutely uninhabitable. Moreover still, unless the owner proves his innocence, both he and the madame are subjected to heavy damages. Moreover yet again, he is forbidden to rent his house, and all income from it ceases, for a whole year. This makes the business unprofitable and almost impossible, for vice must have a place in which to hide. Not even at the five-or-ten-times-as-much rates for rent that are sometimes paid, will property owners run the risk—the almost certainty—for discovery.

This law is attracting very wide attention. It is certainly the most drastic and effective effort that has ever been made to check the social evil and protect our girls. To Dr. John B. Hammond of Des Moines, who everlastingly and intelligently agitated the subject, is given great credit for the passage of the law. We gather the following from a recent article by Dr. Hammond:

Let us start out on an investigation. We search out the house, enter the unprepossessing building—it is usually that—and are met by the gaudily-dressed and jeweled woman who conducts the place. We inquire for her books, and find that she is dividing the profits of her spoils with the landlord, for she pays an exorbitant rent. This particular building would not bring $15 a month in any other business—she pays $50 a week for it. The house is full of beautiful furniture, electric piano, etc., etc. It is all rented, very probably, and the renter is again receiving an exhorbitant price. How is it possible to pay all this? The average girl will earn for her keeper over $5,000 per annum. This only makes the business a possibility.

But there are other dividers of Madame's income, first the "pimp," who is a man—save the name—who solicits for patrons. Then in the parlor, we may find a low salesman with his wares about him—cheap gaudy garments and cheaper jewelry—surrounded by a group of the girls. He sells at exorbitant prices but on the weekly payment plan, and procures another division of the price of sin. This man is one of the most useful to the red-light resorts as he prevents the escape of inmates through the mortgage he holds on their clothing. When a dash is made for liberty by some poor victim he sends the officers of the law after her with a warrant for removing mortgaged property or obtaining merchandise under false pretenses.

In an aljoining room, we may hear muffled voices and almost noiseless steps. We enter—it must be unannounced. The county undertaker is carrying out the emaciated form of what was once the pride of some mother's heart. But laughter from the front room may penetrate even here. It is over the arrival of a new victim who thinks she has found a "lover at first sight" and is going joyfully to the marriage altar. The ranks reduced by the undertaker are filled again, and another tragedy has begun.

We may hear—this is not a fancy picture but the reality is enacted in a hundred places in our country almost any night of the year—the pleadings and moans of a childish voice on the upper floor. On the stairs we may meet the Madame with a roll of crisp bills, the receipts from the sale of a new white slave, for there are rich patrons in this business who pay out large sums of money to procure innocent little girls—lured from their country homes very likely by promises of work and "good times in the city." More than one village or little town has missed its bright Bessie or Belle—mysteriously disappearing. Here she is—not willingly or knowingly going wrong but deceived, betrayed. One's hand unconsciously seeks the hip pocket and there is an itching on the trigger finger as one hears the child's sobs or screams, but—a blue-coated policeman at one's side reminds us that the house is protected by city authorities! By Law!

With the awful demands on the girl's nervous system, she easily becomes a victim of the liquor and drug habit, and her downward way is rapid. In five short years on the average, she has paid the price with her life, either through disease or by her own hand; but long before this the respectable?) houses have thrown her aside, and she falls into the lowest places of the underworld. A new victim is demanded and it is to meet these demands and fill up the rapidly depleted ranks, that the army of procurers has arisen and the White Slave Traffic has been established. Attorney Sims is authority for the statesment that in New York City alone, there are "thousands" of men who make their livelihood through this trafic. No man's child is free from danger. The game of "lover at first sight," the promise of a stage position for "talent recognized at once," pleasant employment—these are the usual methods for decoying the little inexperienced, self-conceited, village girls into these death traps, but physical force is sometimes used, if necessary and possible.

These are startling statements but absolutely true. A little announcement in the morning paper of the rescue of a twelve-year-old girl in Chicago, who was being held at the police station, brought inquiries from 500 parents whose daughters had recently disappearel. Where are the other 499 girls? It is admitted that many "shady hotels" are detaining girls under fourteen years for immoral purposes. War? Was there ever a more worthy cause for war?

It has been found almost impossible to stop this business by the usual detective and jury systems. What decent man, what man whose word would be believel, would be willing to enter such a house as a detective. How easy it is, considering the enormous profit, to buy up juries! But this new Iowa plan—this short cut—this strike at property through the simple complaint of any neighbor or reputable citizen—this is making the whole unspeakable business next to impossible.—Deaconess Advocate.

IS MY RELIGIOUS LIFE A HUMBUG?

Those who have met Dr. Wilfred Grenfell, on who, if they have not met him, have read of his Labrador work, will be interested in the following paragraphs, showing the circumstances under which he entered upon his life of splendid Christian service: "In 1883, while I was studying medicine at the London Hospital in White Chapel, I was attracted by a huge crowd going into a large tent in the slums of the Stepney. There was singing going on inside, and curiosity led me in.

"As I left with the crowd, I came to the conclusion that my religious life was a humbug. I vowed in future that I would either give up or make it real. It was obviously not a thing to be played with.

"Some time later I heard that one of England's famous cricksters, whose atheletic distinctions I greatly admired, Mr. J. E. M. Studd, was going to speak in the neighborhood, and I went to hear him. Seated in front of me there were two or three rows of boys from a training ship, all dressed in the same uniform. At the end of his speech Mr. Studd invited any one who was not ashamed to confess that Christ was his Master for this life, rather than a kind of insurance ticket for the next world, to stand up. I did not know that I was afraid of anything. One boy out of all this large number rose to his feet. I knew pretty well what that meant for him, so I decided to back him up and do the same. With this theological outfit I started out on my career."

"I came to the conclusion," says Dr. Grenfell, "that my religious life was a humbug." A most serious and startling conclusion, wasn't it?

DIED.

Death of G. B. Johnson.

On March 18th, 1911, the venerable George B. Johnson passed from earth to heaven. He was born July 29, 1826, being 84 years, 7 months, and 9 days old. He was married to Barbara L. Bowman whom he leaves behind. To this union there were born five sons and one daughter. The daughter and three of the sons are still living. One of his sons, the Rev. T. M. Johnson, is now pastor of the Methodist Protestant Church in Asheboro, N. C. He has also been president of the North Carolina Conference, Methodist Protestant Church, for five consecutive years. Another, Dr. L. A. Johnson, for a number of years was one of the leading dentists of this state, but because of ill health, has been compelled to retire. The other, W. A. Johnson, is a leading farmer in community of his birth. The daughter is and has been for a number of years a mainstay in the church of her choice.

In early manhood Brother Johnson became a loyal follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, and as the years passed by his trust continued to grow stronger and stronger, and his hope brighter and brighter. He held his membership at Friendship Church on Mt. Hermon Circuit. This church never had occasion to complain that he failed to stand by it, and no pastor who served this field ever had ground to say that Brother Johnson failed in the least to co-operate with him in trying to build up the Master's kingdom. The very best that he had he placed at the feet of Christ. He was a man who provided for the needs of this life, but at the same time did not forget the needs of the future life. He was a man who seemed to keep continuously in mind this scripture: "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." He was a plain-spoken man. Frequently, when in conversation with him, he would call me by name and say: "I want something over yonder," and during his long earthly life he was busy converting material things into spiritual things and sending them on ahead of him. He was rigidly truthful, careful not to say too much nor too little, but just the thing, and when he had spoken you knew that you had it all, there was nothing to be subtracted nor added, nor did you have to go back of what he said to look for something, for there was nothing there. What was true of him concerning truth was equally true of him concerning every other element of character. What is written in the Law, that he did. He was a righteous man. But he did not trust in his righteousness. He was righteous because he believed in Jesus Christ as his only guide and model and Savior.

In the life of Bro. Johnson we have a concrete example of what the power of God can do for a man and through a man when allowed free flow. He made no show, no pretention. He did not proclaim his religion from the house top, but he lived it, in his home, in the road, in the field, in the presence of all his neighbors, everywhere, he never laid it aside. The result was that his neighbors looked upon him as one whose steps were ordered by the Lord. He had a grip on his community which is rarely surpassed, and which I have never seen surpassed. None who were thrown in touch with him failed to get help from his life. To touch his life was to be benefited. His life was an inspiration to this whole section, and it is impossible to calculate its future results. In his death, his home, his community, his church, and his pastor, have sustained a great loss.

On the 19th of March his remains were laid to rest in the Friendship Cemetery, the writer conducting the funeral services assisted by Rev. W. E. Swain. The weather was very unfavorable, yet the house did not hold all the people who came to honor this man of God. May God bless and comfort the bereaved family, and raise up some one to take his place in the community and church. A fuller account of his life will appear later.

J. A. Burgess.

Robt. G. Lamb departed this life at his home at Level Cross in Randolph County, N. C., on March 13th, 1911, aged 61 years, 4 months and 25 days. Bro. Lamb had been in failing health for some years due to paralysis, and a second attack proved fatal. Bro. Lamb had been a member of the church at Level Cross for forty-one years and died in the faith that saves. For a part of his church life, and while living near his church, he was an active and useful Christian and church member. He had more than ordinary natural ability, and at times it was a real benediction to hear him pray. The writer has heard him say, that in his young days he had often thought that God wanted him to preach His word, and he attributed some of the uneven things in his life to his not heeding the voice of God in this particular.

In early life Bro. Lamb married Miss Roxannah Rose who still lives. There are five children all living: Mr. Thomas Lamb, and Mr. Shubble Lamb of Level Cross, Mr. Edward Lamb of Danville, Va., Mrs. Robert Dosier of Level Cross and Mrs. Kirkman of Randleman, N. C.

Thirty members of Randleman Council Jr. Order U. A. M. of which Bro. Lamb was a member were present at the funeral, and had charge of the same. The funeral was conducted in the church at Level Cross in the presence of a large congregation by the writer, and the burial was by the Juniors. Bro. Lamb had expressed some time before his death a desire that a former pastor, Bro. Millaway or myself be called to officiate at his funeral.

May the comforting influence of God's Holy Spirit sustain the widow, and the children until they all meet at God's right hand.

Thomas P. Hauser was born Oct. 18, 1854, died Feb. 27, 1911, aged 56 years, 4 months, and 9 days. He was married to Charlotte Kreiger Dec. 30, 1875. To them were born 12 children, 11 boys and 1 girl He leaves a wife, one sister, 10 children 4 grandchildren and a host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss, but they do not mourn as those that have no hope, as they have the blessed assurance that their loss is his eternal gain. Bro. Hauser professed religion and joined the M. P. Church at Mt. Zion in 1874, and lived a consistent member at that place until a few years ago when he was transferred to Shoals M. P. Church. I first met Bro. Hauser 14 years ago. Two years later I was assigned to what was then called Surry circuit, but is now called Pinnacle and Mt. Zion, and have been his pastor altogether a little more than ten years.During all this time our association has been pleasant and profitable to myself, and trust it has been to him also. I have visited his home many, many times and always found him ready and willing to welcome me there at any and all times. I with many others shall greatly miss him. He was a very tender and affectionate husband, a kind and loving father, and a good and obliging neighbor. Those who knew him best loved him most. O! how we shall miss him in the home, in the church, and in the community. The church has lost a strong pillar, the community a noble man. Worst of all will he be missed in his home which has been so saddened by his absence, but let us all think of Bro. Hauser as living more today than he did when he was in our midst. He lived to die, but it is also true that he died to live again. Then let us all strive to live as successful life as Bro. Hauser, and some day we too may go and live with him and his blessed Savior whom he served while on earth. It was not my privilege to visit Bro. Hauser during his sickness, which was very brief, and his own family was not aware of the seriousness of his condition, but I have learned from others that he appeared to suffer very little. He was taken with Lagrippe about one week previous to his death, and was most of the time in a kind of a stupor, until a few hours before his death when his breath seemed to get shorter and shorter until as a child drops into the embrace of slumber, so he closed his eyes on earth and loved ones, to open them in heaven, to greet loved ones gone before.

Funeral services conducted by his pastor assisted by Rev. Mr. Hall in the presence of a large attendance, showing the love and respect of his relatives, friends and neighbors, after which the remains were deposited in the mother earth. "Dust to dust, ashes to ashes," to remain until the resurrection morning when the graves shall give up their dead. Then he will come forth in an incorruptible body and be forever with the Lord.

We extend our heartfelt [illegible] the bereaved family. May this dispensation of God's providence serve to draw us all nearer the Master.

A. L. Hunter.

Sister Susanna Ledbetter departed this life Feb. 28, 1911. She was another one of Hickory Grove's oldest members. Sister Susanna has been a member of this church sixty years, and lived a devoted Christian.

She told her friends she desired to leave this world and be present with the Lord. This sister was 77 years, 2 months and 17 days old. The funeral was preached by her pastor, Rev. T. A. Plyler, then the remains laid to rest in Hickory Grove graveyard until the morning of the resurrection.

Seems that God is calling Hicory Grove's members fast. There have been six of its oldest and best members passed from earth to reward in the last twelve months. Who will be next?

E. S. Jones.

Bro. James M. Pike died Sunday, March 19, 1911, and was buried at Hickory Grove M. P. Church Monday at 10 o'clock, a. m. at which place he had been a consistent member for more than 25 years.

Burial services were conducted by his pastor, Rev. J. H. Bowman. Deceased was a brother of Rev. William Pike. He was about 48 years of age.

He leaves a broken hearted wife, three sons, three daughters, one brother, one sister and a host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss. To the bereaved family we extend our heart-felt sympathy.

Weep not, friends and loved ones. Bro. Pike has only paid the debt we all must pay sooner or later.

May God help us so to live that we can say, "Thy will be done, not mine."

MANNERS IN THE MINISTERS.

The pastor has much to do with social life. We do not live in a land of barbarians. We rejoice in the dissemination of culture and refinement. Churches want their pastors to be gentlemen. They want them to manifest at least ordinary politeness and a thoughtful attention to the usages of good society. Some church members may carry their taste for etiquette to an excess and become overfastidious. But sensible people recognise the value of certain rules in social intercourse, rules which are founded upon that regard for the comfort and pleasure of others which is one fruit of Christianity.

Men who have been obliged to struggle in life for "the main chance," as it is called, and who have a natural admiration for great independence of character, coupled with a god deal of boldness and conceit, sometimes delight to trample on social usages. They call it "defying the absurb dictates of fashion."

It seems to them unnecessary and fussy to be neat in their personal appearance, to cultivate good manners at the table, to be courteous to ladies and children. They have none of that delicate sense of fitness which is so desirable. In speech and in conduct they seem to glory in doing the startling rather than the appropriate thing. They annoy sensitive natures by the lack of respect, if not of reverence; and make their best friends ashamed of their boorishness. If favors are shown to them they take no pains to express appreciation or gratitude; and spoil by their clumsy bluntness in conversation and by their rude jokes and personal criticisms during the week all the spiritual appeals of their sermons.

Indeed, if refinement of manners is not cultivated by the minister in social life, the lack of it will soon appear in the way he conducts the services of God's house where a delicate appropriateness is the true expression of reverence.—Rev. H. F. Colby, D. D., in the Homiletic Review.

Mr. J. W. Killough, who went to Florida for his health, has returned home. He has been in bad health for two years. He is a fine business man. May the Lord bless him and make his pathway bright.

Misses Ethel and Dora Killough, of Sandy Ridge Township, are visiting Miss Dora King, of Indian Trail, N. C.

Banks, the little son of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Killough, was badly cut last Wednesday. He was playing and fell on a broken lampglobe and cut his arm badly.

Mr. Justice King, of Indian Trail, is visiting Mr. and Mrs. J. A. King, of Charlotte, N. C.

Mr. P. C. Bea, who was badly burned is still in the hospital in Charlotte, N. C. Pray for him, Christian friends, that he may get well.

Variety.

We have a variety of chickens, though we had nine stolen, and in one month or so, there were over 100 chickens stolen in Reidsville, and the man, a white man, is now on the county road force, and our number is growing. Sister Jack Porter sent us two, Sister Mamie Dixon brought us another one this morning. This makes 5 given us. It is so kind and thoughtful. It hurts a woman's feelings to lose her chickens as well as a preacher's.

REV. C. H. HUBBELL'S ENGAGEMENTS.

Friday night, Mar. 24, Pinnacle.

Saturday afternoon, Mar. 25, Home Moravian Church, Winston-Salem.

Saturday night, Kernersville.

Sunday afternoon, Mar. 26, Thomasville.

Sunday night, High Point.

Monday night, Mar. 27, Worthville.

Tuesday night, Mar. 28, Mt. Lebanon, Randleman.

Wednesday night, Mar. 29, Mebane.

Thusday night, March 30, Graham.

Friday morning, Mar. 31, Elon College Chapel.

Friday night to Sunday night, State C. E. Convention, Burlington, N. C.

It is hoped that arrangement can be made to have Bro. Hubbell's stay prolonged to answer calls from Greensboro and Asheville. Asheboro kindly gives its time to another point where there is no organization.

This seems to be the best schedule I could make with the information I had. I trust that our pastors and young people will make an effort to secure the attendance of other young people with them that the meetings may do as much good as possible.

Bro. Hubbell is brought to N. C. by the officers of the State C. E. Convention, who pay for his time, but they request that an offering be made at each place to help defray traveling expenses.

—Dr. Aked, pastor of Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, has resigned and accepted the pastorate of a Congregational church in California. The New Yorkers were not sufficiently responsive to his appeals. He warned them and gave them two weeks to wake up, but they did not wake up, and he could not consistently remain with them.

—Rev. Mr. Padgett is preaching in a continued meeting of South Greensboro Baptist Church.

CHILDREN'S PAGE.

DO THIS, IF YOU CAN.

Draw a rectangular twice as wide as it is high. Using the upperside as a base, construct an isosceles triangle with an altitude equal to the altitude of the rectangle. Then draw lines dividing the whole figure into eight equal parts of the same shape. Send us your work as soon as you have finished it, and if you are first, we will send you something in appreciation of your labor.

THE OWL AND THE BOY.

I am a barn owl; and so far as chickens are concerned, I never meddle with them. In fact, if a good, fat pullet should come to me and ask to be eaten, I should bow my thanks and send her away. The fact that I am a barn owl and not a hooting woods owl ought to be known to every farmer's son; but some of them are too stupid to learn natural history.

Such a one came into the barn where I was stopping the other day. I had entered the place the night before and caught four fat mice and a big rat. After devouring them, I flew up to roost on a big beam and went to sleep. When night came again I was to go for more rats and mice; and if left alone for a week or so, I would clean the barn of vermin and make the farmer rejoice.

I was sound asleep and having a pleasant dream when the barn doors banged open and a boy about fifteen years old banged in. He went kicking things about and whistling as he kicked, and by and by he happened to look up and see me.

"There's an owl!" he shouted at the top of his voice.

"Well, what of it?" I asked, as I looked down at him.

"But I've got to have your life."

"Why?"

"Because you are a bird; because you are an owl."

"But I am a barn owl, and live on rats and mice."

"That makes no difference," he said, and went on hunting for missiles to throw at me.

He did throw at me a couple of times, and then, as he was stooping over the third time, I flew for him and alighted on his head. I gave him a couple of sharp digs with my claws, and then fastened them into his cap and flew out of the door and away to another barn. I heard him shouting and calling, but I did not look back. I have his cap yet; and if I could write as well as some of the boys and girls that read this page, I should put the following advertisement in the papers: "If the stupid boy that didn't know the difference between a barn owl and a chicken stealer will read up on natural history, and beg my pardon besides, his cap will be left at his father's kitchen door the first dark night after this."—Exchange.

THE ELM TREE POST OFFICE.

The box fastened to the elm tree had been a bird's nest once, but ever since Margery and Rosamund had had Twinkle to creep softly through the grass and keep an eye on young and tender nestlings, Mother and Father Bird had declared it was too near the ground, and had built their nest in the higher branches, safe from his cruel claws.

For two years it had been vacant; then one day Margery had a happy thought. "Let's have a post office," she said to Rosamund.

"But what will be put into it?" inquired Rosamund.

"Letters," answered Margery, "and packages and lots of things; and we will let Evelyn and Sybil have a part of it too. See, they can crawl through the slat in the fence over there, and it is just a step over the grass to the tree."

"But who will be postmaster," asked Rosamund, "and give out the mail?"

"Each can help herself," answered Margery, "and no one must touch anything that does not belong to her. Come, let's go ask Sybil and Evelyn now."

They danced off across the grass and through the hole in the fence, and soon all four were busy getting things to put in the post office.

And such mail as that box held! Letters, notes, packages of all kinds, candies, cakes, and even dolls' clothes, passed through as the days flew by. Before the children realized, it was school time and play days were over. Still the box held many treasures; and once Evelyn, for her school composition, wrote a poem about Margery, and dropped it into the elm tree box.

At last nutting time came, and what fun the children did have before school and on Saturdays gathering the winter's store!

One Saturday Sybil found some extra chestnuts, and, hiding them carefully away from the others, after they were safely home again, she stole across the grounds to the elm tree post box and dropped in two little packages for Rosamund and Margery.

It was late that afternoon before the children visited the post office, and Rosamund gave a little scream as something gray and furry jumped out as she put her hand in. "O see," she cried, pulling out scraps of paper, some empty nutshells, and a few nuts, "that squirrel is using our post office to store his nuts in!"

"O no!" cried Sybil, running across toward the tree. "I put some chestnuts in there for you and Margery, and he has taken them. Isn't it too bad?"

"No," said Rosamund stoutly, "not if he was hungry. It has been a hard year for squirrels, my father says. Let's go away and see if he will take the rest. He needs them more than we do I am very sure."

Sure enough, when they came back half an hour later, squirrel and nuts were gone.

"Do you suppose he will come again," asked Rosamund.

"Perhaps he will," said Margery. "We might leave something for him and see if he takes it;" and taking a couple of nuts from her coat pocket, she dropped then into the box.

Next morning they were gone. "Let's put some more in," said Sybil, as the peeped into the empty box. "We will say he owns a share in our post office, and leave him mail ever day."

So every morning the children dropped in a handful of peanuts, chestnuts, crackers, and even some tiny bits of cake; and soon they became accustomed to seeing, as they came to the box, gray-tail fly and scramble off as fast as he could go.

Soon Mr. Squirrel did not seem afraid of them, and would sit just out of reach and wait for them to drop in his rations, as well as their own letters or packages, and at last he became so tame he could jump on their shoulders as the goodies fell into the box.

"He calls every day," said Rosamund. "I suppose Mrs. Squirrel and the babies wait for him to bring the mail home to them."

All through the fall and early winter Mr. Squirrel made his daily calls at the post office; but with the deep snow he disappeared, and the last handful of nuts lay uncalled for.

Then Margery's father made a tight wooden cover to keep out the snow and rain, and the children used it all winter for their holiday surprises.

One day in March Evelyn visited it with her hands full of letters for the patrons of the office; but as she neared the tree she almost dropped them all, for there sat Mr. Squirrel waiting for her beside the mail box.

Evelyn fairly flew home and called for the others. "O, come quick, come quick!" she cried. "Our squirrel has come back and is waiting for his mail."

Eagerly the children gathered a pile of goodies and ran to the elm tree post office. Yes, there sat Mr. Squirrel waiting, as much as to say: "It is a long time since we received any mail at our house, and I have come for it now."

After eating all he could and storing the rest away in his pouchy cheeks, he was off like the wind, and the children watched him out of sight.

"We must bring him mail every day," said Rosamund. "Let's use it only for his mail and see that he has plenty, not only for the summer, but to put away for the winter. Then he and Mrs. Squirrel will not have to worry about feeding the babies any more."—Emma F. Bush, in Zion's Herald.

HOW THE FLOWER MISSION STARTED.

One day a little English girl was walking along a street in London on her way to school. She carried her books and a bouquet for the teacher. A poor little crippled boy, leaning on crutches, said to her: "Say, gimme a flower."

The kind hearted little girl picked out a rose and handed it to him; but four or five other little children gathered round her, each begging for a flower, and one by one she gave all her pretty posies away.

The next day she took two bouquets, one for the teacher and one for the street children; and day after day she carried her flowers, until at last she took a basket for the poor children. This was the beginning of the Flower Mission. The news spread, and the idea was taken up all over London, and then some one in Boston began it, and then in New York, and now thousands are given away all over the country. So all this beautiful work started with one kind-hearted little girl.—The Mayflower.

From thence our hero promptly went Into a seed establishment
And for these things his money he spent:

He has a garden under way
And if he's fairly lucky, say,
He'll have about the last of May

GOD'S CALL TO CHINESE PHILIP.

Mable C. Hartford.

The Father of Philip Lee was doorkeeper in the yamen of the Foochow Prefect. His was an important position, and his salary was good, but the curse of opium entered his home, and robbed his wife and children of all comforts. He died when Philip was ten, leaving his wife to care for three children, two younger than Philip. The mother received a small pension from the yamen, and made shoes to keep the family from starving. Before Philip was fourteen he went to work for an official. The official's wife was very fond of him, and often intrusted him with large sums of money to buy supplies for the household, so even as a small boy he learned business methods. When eighteen he went to Ku Cheng to work for a man who professed to want to be a Christian. The man turned out to be a gambler, and cheated Philip out of six months' wages, leaving him with only one suit of clothes. However, Philip had found Christ, and was happy in spite of his poverty.

Some missionaries saw signs of promise in the boy, and gave him work, and also put his fifteen year-old brother in the Ku Cheng Boys' School. Soon after, the mother and little brother went to Ku Cheng, and all the family became Christians. It was wonderful how easy it was for these three brothers to accept the teachings of Christianity. Philip said: "It did not seem strange when I believed, but when my younger brother accepted everything so easily, I was surprised." When the second brother came to Cheng he was not used to walking long distances. He came up in one day thirty miles. We asked him: "Don't your feet ache?" He answered: "No. The messenger told me if I prayed to God, He would help me and He did." This boy had never been taught anything about Christianity.

Soon Philip came to know much of mission work, and showed a great deal of ability in business matters. It was decided to help him preapre for work, and he was sent to the Anglo-Chinese College in Shanghai. The same year the second brother entered our Anglo Chinese college in Foochow.

Soon Philip was appointed to attend to the buying supplies for the Athletic Association, and after a time the principal gave him work in his office, so he received a great help in business methods.

A little orphan girl was found by one of our W. F. M. S. ladies in West China, and brought to Chinkiang and put into our Orphanage. She was trained by Miss Robinson as only she knew how to train girls, and grew up a beautiful young woman. A friend of Philip's thought Miss Wei was just the wife he needed, so spoke to him of her. Philip said: "At first I was not at all interested, but soonI became interested." He went up to Chinkiang and saw Miss Wei and they became engaged. They were married two years later. The interest has not abated. It would be called love in America.

There was a plan to open an Industrial Home in Foochow for poor children from any part of Fukien Province. Those interested were trying to find a superintendent. A lady asked a friend of Philip if she knew of any one. This friend answered: "Ten years ago I heard Philip Lee say he wanted to open an orphanage when he was old enough. I believe he is the man you need." The lady at once went to Shanghai, inquired about Mr. Lee, and engaged him for the work.

The Fukien Industrial Homes are to be supported by the Christian Herald fund for seven years. There are 200 children. The work is interdenominational, but not connected with the Missionary Societies. There is a Board of Control composed of six foreigners and six Chinese, but they give Mr. Lee great freedom in his work. It is the plan to build, but as yet he has not been able to buy land, so has hired several Chinese houses and repaired them.

Philip has shown great ability in this difficult work of selecting the children and buying supplies and opening up the Homes. But in all he is humble. He tells his boys in the Homes: "I was a poor boy, and God has helped me to become a man. Now I want you all to strive to become useful men."

God called this Chinese Philip to help the poor boys of Fukien.—Zion's Herald.

—A man who escaped the State prison at Raleigh, N. C., sixteen years ago, then receiving a sentence of 30 years for murder, was recaptured in Kentucky last week and brought back to prison. The man was living under an assumed name, had given good account of himself and had amassed a comfortable fortune. Two weeks ago a similar case occurred at Danville, Va., when the chief of police was arrested and carried back to Atlanta, Ga. from which prison the man had escaped fifteen years ago serving a life sentence for murder. "Be sure your sins will find you out" may sometimes seem a relentless sentence, but it is a proverb as true as it is old. God ordained that sin should not be covered forever, but provided a way of escape for every guilty one.

C. E. TOPIC FOR APRIL 2—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

Lessons from Joshua's Life, Josh. 1:1-9.

Consecration Meeting.

Roll-Call:—For variety's sake have the roll called at the very beginning of the meeting, allowing no one to speak more than two sentences which shall emphasize a truth from Joshua's life.

The Leader:—If the leader will have some one read the Scripture and another to comment thereon briefly, it will be well for him to speak about some one great event in Joshua's career—his favorable report of the promised land, his success as a warrior, his holding up of the hands of Moses, his conduct on becoming head of the people, the fall of Jericho, his farewell address to the people. On some one of these or some kindred theme he will speak his five minutes, driving home the moral truth of whatever incident he chooses and providing that his fellow endeavorers shall do likewise of the other leading incidents.

Questions to Meditate Over and Voluntarily Answer:

How was Joshua trained for his great responsibility?

Why is training necessary for us today?

How does Christian Endeavor contribute to this training?

How should we face dangers?

Why is it always best to speak the truth fearlessly?

How does Joshua compare with Moses in greatness?

Why should we be cheerful?

How did Joshua learn that success comes not from might, but from trusting God?

What do you like in Joshua's farewell address?

Compare it to Christ's final word with his disciples.

Compare it to Washington's farewell to American people.

Wherein does it fall below Christ's farewell words?

Wherein does it surpass Washington's farewell words?

What is the greatest teaching of Joshua's life for us?

Scripture Verses:—If desired, the leader can find a goodly number of appropriate Scripture verses for memory and recitation with brief comment by consulting the concordance under such words as: Courage, trust, faith, cheerfulness, service, save, consecration, truth.

Essay Work:—Have an essay of two or three minutes on such themes as: The Value of Studying the Lives of Great Men; The Chief Value of the Old Testament Historical Books; How the Bible Records a Man's Life; Joshua's Place in Israel's History; The Secret of Joshua's Success.

What Joshua Teaches.

Joshua began to fight for Jehovah as soon as he left Egypt, in the first battle with the Amelekites. God does not select an untried man to succeed His heroes like Moses.

In this first battle, won more by the hands of Moses lifted up in prayer than by his own weapons, Joshua got the most important lesson of his life,—that victory is not by might and power, but by God's Spirit.

Joshua was with Moses on the holy mount when the law was revealed. Well might he revere that law, and make it the man of his counsel.

Joshua was placed in charge of the first tent of meeting, where Moses met Jehovah and came forth with his face shining like an angel's. The experience must have taught Joshua to place prayer by the side of the Bible as his two guides in life.

Joshua was one of the twelve spies that investigated Canaan, and he alone, with Caleb, reported that the land could be conquered. "We can" was his motto all through his life, and that spirit was more than half of the power that won his victories.

Joshua came near being stoned to death for his courageous report concerning Canaan. It was well for him to get very early into the habit of standing alone—with God.

Joshua and Caleb were the only ones of their faithless generation that lived to see the promised land. Every year of the wilderness wanderings was an education in faith.

Notwithstanding all his preparation, Joshua was overwhelmed when bidden to take up the gigantic task of Moses, and needed the splendid exhortation that was given him. He would have been less fit for his task if he had felt himself to be fit for it.

Joshua's first great victory was just such a triumph of faith as his entire life of faith had been preparing him for. Jericho would not have fallen at the blast of the ram's horns if innumerable other Jerichos had not thus fallen before Joshua during the preceding years.

Joshua's farewell address to the people, after all his campaigns and faithful leading, gave them the secret of his successful life. "Serve the Lord," he pleaded, and enforced the plea by the resources of a powerful orator. It is the lesson for us, if we would enter into Joshua's successes.—Prof. Wells.

Said about Joshua.

The courage, the cheerfulness, the sense of victory and of success which runs through the Gospels, finds its best illustration from the older church in the character and career of Joshua.—Stanley.

Josua may be compared to the man of two talents, whilst his great master was dowered with five.—F. B. Meyer.

Ever since that day on the mount and in the cleft rock, the Lord, and no heathen god of them all, had been Joshua's God.—Whyte.

Joshua could not dream undying prophetic dreams, he could not legislate in God's council-room for all the ages of time; but he learned, in the free school of fidelity, how to make a promised land a possessed land.—H. E. Lewis.

Inclusive Endeavor.

There is no need to establish in a church different sorts of young people's societies in order to do different kinds of work. Literary work, health culture, civic studies and activities, charities, social pleasures, all find a natural home in Christian Endeavor. Incorporate them in the society. Give them in charge of special committees and departments. Set special officers over them.

The great advantage in this is that you do not split up the active young people of the church into a lot of sundered cliques. You place back of every enterprise the zeal and numbers of a large body of young people.

Show Your Colors.

The Christian Endeavor pin is the most generally known and commonly accepted and widely used badge of Christianity!

The wearing of it is a splendid advertisement for our society. It leads to many conversations about it, and it is easy to pass from that topic to genuine religious conversations.

Many pleasant acquaintances are made by means of the Christian Endeavor pin. This is constantly the experience of the writer.

DEBS AND SOCIALISM.

Mr. Eugene V. Debs, the distinguished advocate of socialism, spoke in Greensboro last Saturday night to a large audience. He is a good speaker, has an interesting theme, discussed it in a lofty spirit, and it was a pleasure to hear him, There was in his speech no indication of class-hatred and no appearance of desire to cause strife among men. He is not bitter against the rich, but he denounces the present system of competition which he holds responsible for the widely unequal distribution of wealth, and predicts that it will in time be succeeded by a system in which society as a whole will own and control the means of production and distribution. Feudalism preceded the present system, and men once thought feudalism would continue forever. The present system is also destined to pass away. said he, and he indicated the manner of its passing. Wealth will more and more be gathered into the hands of the few, the trusts grow more and more powerful, till at length society will confiscate their property and hold it for the common good.

He endeavored to make is appear that the success of this program would be in accordance with Christianity and with Christ's purpose.

To be sure Christianity requires an equitable distribution of wealth and tends to encourage the highest economy in the production of wealth, but Christinaity nowhere encourages the doing of evil that good may come. The growth of the trusts as is well known is not due simply to natural law, unless it is natural law to defraud one's fellowmen. The trusts are the result of bad morals, in many instances, taking unfair advantages of competitors and consumers, secured, it may be, by unfair legislation. Can we expect the millenium to be ushered in by a course of fraud? Will greed be the forerunner of righteousness? We cannot believe that the way the Socialists have marked out is Christ's way. We believe the time is coming when there will be more wealth in the world and that it will be better distributed; but we believe in that good time because Christianity is going to rule men in the business world and make them honest and humane. Christianity will awaken in men's minds a truer estimate of human life. Fraud will pass from the business world because men will come to have too honor, too much self-respect, and too much love for each other to be guilty of so mean a thing as taking an unfair advantage.

O yes, Mr. Debs, better times are coming. The world is growing better. The millennium is approaching, but it is coming at the front door and not by the back door.

You yourself are not confident that you are right. You seemed so when you said the system of the Socialists is sure to come and nobody can prevent it though men may retard it. But later you expressed doubt when you said that your faith in the triumph of Socialism depends on the ability of Socialists to develop the capacity for business management which the system would require. Well may you have doubt on this point. As men become more intelligent, they become less manageable, and it would take a very big boss to manage all mankind in the more enlightened age of the future. No, the world is not moving toward the paternal system of the Socialists, unless it is moving backward, but we believe it is moving toward a better order of things than the Socialists can imagine: to a time when Christ will be recognized as Lord of society and King of men as He is and has a right to be, and when men will regard each other as brethren, as they are and should ever feel themselves to be.

Washing the Air.—There is a large office building in Pittsburg the air of which is washed as it is admitted to the bulding by passing it through a shower bath. This takes out five or six gallons of coal dust every week. Our rains wash the air for us. If we had no rains, the air would soon become so full of dust as to be very unwholesome.

What It costs to Travel.—Bleriot calculates the cost of air travel to be $15 a mile, as against 1 cent a mile by trolley, 2 cents by rail, and 25 cents by high-power automobiles. Just how much it costs to walk is not stated.

INJURIOUS READING.

The remarks of the following article are not intended to condemn novel reading, however unwise the surrender to that practice may be: for novels do not usually deceive their readers, and many a novel teaches truth. The points concerning novel reading are, to discriminate, not to waste time, and not to surrender to mental stimulant.

But I refer to matter set before the public by an author whose words reveal that he is not sincere in his writing.

It is unwise for a young minister, or any young person, to read the writings of an author who is either personally dishonest, or whose statements are found to be unreliable. It is even unsafe: for such author, in his own career, has lost the power of instinctively discerning truth, and even for himself trusts to reasonings that are unsound; at some time, or times, in his own past life having labored to believe a lie, and having combined and interwoven arguments and evidence for such purposes. In his own experience having surrendered to the untrue, he has grown into the condition alluded to by the Apostle Paul in 2 Thes. 2: 10-12:

"They received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God sendeth them a working of error, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be judged who believed not the truth."

Such a writer will state reasonings in a way to mislead his reader by insidious and suggestive ideas, possibly being unconscious that he is teaching a lie. His life habit has become that of an actor, and not that of a doer. Reality has disappeared from his purposes, and his finger-board is not determined by the pole-star of liberty (notwithstanding his claims) but by prefe ences. In this state he may not intended to deceive, but his writing is unsafe. Young ministers should avoid it: "For there is nothing more important than [illegible] child that has never heard a lie, [illegible] natural instinct for truth possessed [illegible] deceived. Preserving that child-[illegible] habit, you will gradually form the [illegible] which will save you from [illegible] hour of investigation, at [illegible] you might otherwise still [illegible] in uncertainty [illegible] hill-truth-habit, you [illegible] truth apparently [illegible] almost as free from [illegible] of character denied to those who make their minds and hearts a highway for the tramping demons of deceit. Sooner or later any error that is given even temporary hospitality in the human mind, fixes itself for permanent residence there, and hinders the entrance of the angels of truth, and obstructs their glory and helpfulness.

But if you preserve the truth habit, you will be like Sir Isaac Newton, who foresaw much truth that in his day was yet undiscovered (because of the state of science at that time), but has since been demonstrated, or been discovered. He had the truth-habit so fixed, that he sometimes instinctively perceived truth, or seemed to feel it. Such capacity is of far greater value than the much praised practice of listening to all pleas. That practice does not make a man broadminded, or liberal: it sometimes makes him shallow, or uncertain.

Jesus had such ideas in mind when he used the following words:

John 8: 47. "He that is of God heareth the words of God; for this cause ye hear not because ye are not of God."

John 18: 37. "Every on that is of the truth heareth my voice."

And John, the beloved disciple, had such ideas in mind when he wrote the following:

1 John 4: 6. "We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he who is not of God heareth us not. By this we know the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error."

Such instinct as that of Sir Isaac Newton, of John, of Jesus, is highly important. In order to get such instinct, be quick to drop an author who is insincere. As you would not bargain with a dishonest merchant; just so, read not an insincere author. For, if you do, at some time you will be misled, losing your keenness of vision for truth.

ARTISTS' MISTAKES.

In a noted picture exhibited not so long ago the artist, well known for his ability to "hold up the mirror to nature," still made a curious error, which he would not have committed had he taken the trouble to acquaint himself with certain habits of the beast he portrayed in that picture.

A tiger is shown slaking its thirst at a [illegible]. The artist does not show much [illegible] than the head of the beast, and it [illegible] could not be made the blunder of [illegible] mouth of the creature far be[illegible] [illegible] of the water, making it [illegible] as one may see a horse any day [illegible] and not lapping up [illegible] cat as of course a tiger would. It is curious to understand how an artist who could paint well enough to command for his picture a place on the walls of an important exhibition, could make such a fundamental mistake.

Another example, shown at the same exhibition, displayed a dove with outstretched wings. A student of animal mechanism looking at that picture, remarked that is very pretty and poetical in idea, but that by no possibility would a bird thus constructed be able to fly.

Mistakes of this kind were common enough in past times, when there were no zoological collections for study, and when artists had to depend upon travelers' tales for their information regarding foreign animals. Until the time of Cuvier, these pictorial monstrosities were the rule and not the exception.

Some years ago a leading scientist pointed out that painters were liable to fall into errors of another kind through ignorance of the elementary laws of optical phenomena, and he gave them many valuable lessons and warnings. It was shown that, although geometry had been applied to perspective and anatomy to form, artists as a class seemed to have come to the conclusion that the phenomena associated with air, sky, and sea need not engage their attention. For example, there was the case of a capable painter who pictured a rainbow inside out! When the work was returned to the artist for correction, he was so much disgusted with what he regarded as a preposterous demand that he charged one hundred dollars for replacing the colors of the bow in their proper relative positions. Another painter had the temerity to place a crescent moon in the eastern sky directly opposite to a setting sun. When the fault was demonstrated to him, he defended his action on the ground that if he had painted the moon full, as it certainly would have been in nature under such conditions, it would have upset "the balance of the picture."

This artist was by no means the only one who has fallen into a mistake with regard to the earth's satellite. Examples might be quoted in which the new moon had its convexity turned away from the sun, which is, of course, an impossible state of things, as one may test for himself by experimenting with an orange and a lighted candle. Sometimes too the moon has been represented close to the constellation known as the Great Bear, a part of the heavens which it has never been known to invade. Then the size of both the moon and the sun as represented in paintings has often given rise to protests from those whose words are worthy of heed [illegible] distinguished astronomer once [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] in [illegible] the size of the moon, and to deduce from it the height of the mountains shown in the same picture. He found that the average height of the hills was about forty-three miles, while one giant peak raised its head more than one hundred miles above the sea level!

It would, of course, be absurd to tie an artist's hand, and to say that every touch of his brush must be made with scientific accuracy. The imaginative faculties must have play, or we should have no pictures worthy of the name. Turner, who was one of the greatest masters of landscape composition and coloring, frequently exaggerates the heights of his hills with the intention of conferring upon them a majesty which otherwise they would not possess.

If mistakes are possible to artists in these advanced times, when every branch of knowledge is specialized, and when it is so easy to obtain encyclopedical information, it is not surprising that errors of a far grosser kind were committed by the painters of past centuries whose learning was necessarily limited by their environment.

The most common errors were brought about by confusion of period, by which the affairs of centuries apart were dovetailed and blended in the most curious fashion. In the early works of the German, Flemish, and Dutch artists are found both anachronisms and incongruities in plenty. That the Garden of Eden should be painted by a Dutch artist as having well-clipped borders and yew trees cut in quaint devices is excusable, for the draughtsman was unacqainted with any other type of garden. In 1794, we are told, there was a picture to be seen in a Dutch village in which Abraham appeared ready to sacrifice his son Isaac by a loaded blunderbuss. This would antedate the use of fire arms by more than three thousands years.

Pictures are shown of the Israelites crossing the red sea, armed with muskets of comparatively modern date.

It is in the matter of costume that the early painters found such a stumbling block, and there is no difficulty in seeing how this arose. They painted the scenery and dresses of such widely different countries as Palestine and Egypt without having any knowledge of those places or any opportunity of acquiring reliable information. In the National Gallery at Edinburgh there is a picture in which Pharoah's daughter and her ladies are attired in the long-wasted bodices and hooped skirts peculiar to the sixteenth century European woman. In another picture of the same date, representing Joseph and his kindred in Egypt, which is hung in the National Gallery in London, there is no trace of the distinctive features of Egyptian architecture about the buildings; they are all Italian in type.

It was impossible for even such a genius as de Vinci to know that a table, a spotless table cloth, plates, knives and forks, to say nothing of salt cellars, were wrongly introduced into one of his most famous works, and that the Eastern people whom he painted used neither tables nor chairs, but squatted around and ate from one dish.

In more recent times we find that anachronisms of costume and scenery were as common little more than a century ago in dramatic representation as they were in the pictures. In a portrait of Mrs. Hartley in the character of Cleopatra, she is dressed in a hooped petticoat, over which is a pannier skirt and a long train, the skirt being adorned with festoons of roses. Her waist is confined in the stiffest of corsets, while she wears on her head an earl's coronet, surmounted by an ostrich plume. It would require the pencil of one of the world's famous caricaturists adequately to express Anthony's surprise when he saw his Cleopatra arrayed in such fantastic style.

And it would not be the first time that a picture had been caricatured by reason of some incongruous feature. For instance, there is a well-known picture of Napoleon crossing the Alps. This subject has been quite a favorite theme with artists; but the particular example referred to shows the Emperor in gorgeous costume, mounted upon a richly caparisoned steed, which is prancing with delight at the august burden which it is honored by carrying. Such is the romantic idea of the event as it was presented to the mind of the imaginative painter. The caricaturist has given us a far more prosaic representation of Napoleon's famous journey. It is snowing hard, and the Emperor, so closely wrapped in his cloak as to look like a mere bundle of rags, is crouched upon the back of a wretched mule. A tall chasseur, as lean as the poor mule, grasps the animal by the tail with one hand and flogs it with the other. The caricature is probably far more historically correct than the more serious work.—Scientific American.

MANNERS OF MINISTERS AGAIN.

Every week as we read the M. P. Herald we find so many inspiring things and we often think how much we would like to shake hands with some of its contributors and thank them for their timely suggestions. Just here we recall an article from the pen of Rev. J. A. Burgess written during that most unfortunate discussion relative to the merging of our M. P. Church into that of the M. E. Church. While we hope that such a discussion may never again be allowed to mar the purity of the Herald's columns, yet we thank Bro. Burgess for clear and decided defense of our church and its unimpeachable principles. Long live the Methodist Protestant Church and its adherents.

But we started on to write about the manners of Ministers. And we would not for any reason whatever utter one unkind criticism of any true and faithful minister of the gospel; but with heart and voice we would encourage them to "lift high His Royal Banner," O ye heralds of the Cross of Jesus, "For it can never suffer loss." Remembering always that the great army of the redeemed of earth from every land, with the mighty God as their leader is steadily marching on to certain victory.

But with reference to the manners of ministers we don't know how much ought to be written. How often have we during our long and varied experience been pain-at the absence of "reverence, dignity, courtesy, and refinement, in some of our ministers and how keenly we have been mortified even in the services as they have been conducted in our churches. "That delicate sense of fitness" in speech and manner in the home circle as the so-called "man of God" sits and in loud tones relates some coarse joke and we have heard them hold up to ridicule some of our most sacred church usages and customs and we felt then and do yet that such men should be relegated to inferior positions and not allowed to desecrate our pulpits.

But we were quite pleased a few days ago when I met a very fine lady who had married and left her home and had come to reside in our city. We found her a true Methodist Protestant and when we requested her to bring her membership to our church, she readily agreed to do so. She said, "Since I came to this city I have been importuned to join my husband's church and wealth and culture and high social prestige of that church has been brought to bear on the situation and the members of said church seem keenly disappointed that I do not yield to their many allurements; but when I remember my home church and pastor and his excellent wife, his high and beautiful character, his refined dignity, his loyalty to the Methodist Protestant Church and most of all his ardent piety, I feel that I cannot desert my church for that, as well as many other good reasons."

So my brethren in the ministry, your high and holy calling demands of you the very highest culture to which you can attain. You have possibly no idea what an influence you are exerting for our beloved church as well as the cause you represent when your life, character, piety and manners are irreproachable.

THE MEETING OF THE BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The Board met in the Baltimore Book Concern Building on Wednesday, March 8th, 1911. All the members were present.

The work reports of the four Sub-Districts of the Japan Mission Conference were presented. They showed that 36 adults and 5 children had been baptized in the quarter ending January 1, 1911. In addition there were 73 persons who applied for baptism, an increase of 33 over the former quarter. 61 church members were received, and 13 probationers. Full members on roll 1049, probationers 212, enquirers enrolled 352, absent members 381, a total of 1994. Number of Sunday schools 41, scholars enrolled 2454, increase of 92 in the quarter, officers and teachers 105, a total of 2559. Total amount contributed in the quarter Yen 1003.39.

The financial reports of the four Sub-Districts, and of the Yokohama School of English (Night School), and of the Nagoya College were submitted, and approved.

The Budget of expenses for the Fiscal year, April 1, 1911, to March 1, 1912, as prepared and approved by the Financial Committee in Japan, was presented. The total amount asked for is $16,326.00, but does not, of course, include the missionaries nor is the house-rent of a missionary included. The Evangelistic Department calls for $9984.50, the Educational Department $4946.50, and the General Miscellaneous Expenses, $1395.00, total, $16,236. The committee to whom the Budget was referred recommended that it be granted. and their report was adopted. Urgent supplementary items—land, churches, etc., amounting to $13,500.00 could not be granted.

The Minutes of the Mission Meetings held in Japan, and letters from the Missionaries were presented by the Corresponding Secretary, and extended discussion followed. Dr. T. H. Lewis, at his suggestion, read the address of Rev. Dr. Schneder delivered at a meeting of the Conference of Federated Missions in Japan, and favorable comments were made.

It was decided, in view of the fact, that Rev. E. I. Obee has unselfishly volunteered to remain at his post in Japan until April, 1912, solely in the interest of our missionary work, although his seven years of service for which he contracted with the Board end next September, that the plan in the distribution of the Missionaries be continued for the ensuing year. The Cor. Sec. was instructed to write Rev. E. I. Obee, and express the Board's sincere appreciation of his fine spirit and noble act, and to commend him for his wise and efficient administration of the affairs of the Nagoya College, and the Nagoya Sub-District.

The Cor. Sec. was also instructed to write Rev. E. H. Van Dyke expressing the deep sympathy of the Board with him and his estimable wife in her illness, and to assure them of the Board's continued interest and prayers for her speedy restoration to health, and to express the Board's continued appreciation of his earnest efforts to discharge his important duties under the trying conditions in which he has been placed.

The Cor. Sec. was further directed to express to Rev. L. Layman the Board's appreciation of his services, and the generous spirit he displayed in the effort to reach a satisfactory adjustment by which to conserve the best interests of the work.

The Cor. Sec. informed the Board that the brother whose services were sought by the Board for employment in the Japan work had written that conditions which he could not control prevented him from entering the work.

Questions of law which the Mission sent to the Board for an interpretation were referred to Dr. F. T. Tagg for answer. President Tagg was made a committee to prepare a Constitution and By-laws for the government of Missions, and submit them to the Board. The President and Cor. Sec. were made a committee to send a letter to the Mission concerning educational matters. Rev. E. H. Van Dyke was appointed President of the Conference, Rev. L. Layman Principal of the Yokoaham School of English, and Rev. E. I. Obee the Board's Representative at the College. The next meeting will be held May 31, 1911.

—The Cor. Sec.'s report and the Treasurer's Financial report were presented and adopted, the auditing committee having reported that they had examined the accounts and found them correct, and certified to by Mr. H. C. Staley as requested by the treasurer and approved by the Board.

Fred C. Klein, Cor. Sec.

WE WILL IF YOU WILL.

If you will rush your order for Easter supplies into this office, we will rush them to you just as fast as steam will carry them.

It is NOT TOO LATE TO ORDER. Any school of good average ability can prepare this program yet in time to render it for Easter. And some of our friends have been kind enough to say it is good enough to render after Easter is over. We have shared neither time nor expense in the preparation of this service, and we want every Sunday school in the Denomination to share in the benefit which will come from its use. Send in the orders, we will do the rest. But send them to West Lafayette, Ohio. Our friends in Greensboro, Baltimore, Pittsburg and Adrian have been very kind, and we presume that every order sent has reached us, but it than it will if you will send them to us takes longer when they come that way direct.

Will You Remember This?

What the Board of Home Missions is able to do for the Methodist Protestant Church in 1911-12 depends upon what the Methodist Protestant Church does for the Board of Home Missions now. And do you know that the Easter Offering is a very important part of the income of the Board? It will mean greater work done for the church, if we can have an Easter Offering from every Sunday school in the church. May we count on you?

Chas. H. Beck, Sec.-Treas.

CUR COLUMBUS C. E. CONVENTION.

We are glad to know that many of our endeavorers are already turning their thoughts and hearts toward the city of Columbus, Ohio, and our coming denominational C. E. Convention. We are prepared to say that this will be a convention with several sides: Inspirational, Practical, Educational.

We are trying in the preparation of the program to keep these thoughts constantly in mind, and we are sure that you will find these features present when you come to Columbus, Ohio, on May 25-28. We are expecting soon to be able to announce some special Evangelistic Features. This will be on the spiritual side of the program, and we assure you that this will not be forgotten. We are sure the C. E. does stand for Christian Evangelism and for Evangelism for everybody and we will have some help of this kind at our convention. Remember the request that names of delegates be sent in as they are selected as this will help the people who are to entertain us.

HELPING TO UNDERSTAND CHINA

Rev. D. Gilbert Reid, who knows China as few men do, is performing for that people and country of greatest possibilities an unspeakably valuable service with pen and voice in presenting the present status and opportunities as they really are, thus removing many misapprehensions. In a recent address in Chicago before the Chicago Association of Commerce, on "American Business Opportunities in China," he said that, while there are great opportunities for American business men in China today, they are being neglected through remembrance of past failures or through fear of future dangers. He spoke of the friendly attitude toward America by the more intelligent Chinese at the present time, and enlarged upon the American policy of advocating the open door and urging on American financiers a larger participation in the development of China. Speaking of the two great misconceptions as to the existing relations between the two countries—the reports that Japan is planning to take possession of the southern half of Manchuria, and that the Chinese are planning another Boxer uprising—he said: "Japan may have railways and may have open mines, but the country is still under the sovereign rule of China. Beyond this fact the Chinese merchants in Manchuria, as along the border between Manchuria and Korea, are outstripping the Japanese merchants, and, with the business of the country in Chinese hands, there is no likelihood that the country will pass into the hands of the Japanese."

Another Boxer uprising, he asserted, "is an impossibility;" and added that "the folly of the former uprising is enough to prevent another of a similar character. The mere fact that here and there local disturbances appear is no indication that the general sentiment of the nation is anti-foreign. Still less is there ground for thinking that the Chinese are opposed to co-operation from generous and fair men from abroad. It is a fact, which needs reiteration, that the enterprising men of China are seeking for the investment of foreign capital on the basis of co-operation."

In the World's Work for November Dr. Reid calls attention to the stupendous fact that "the Senate of two hundred members, the first parliament ever attempted in China, has been in session some weeks. It is composed of the brighest men in the empire, and, for a first Chinese parliament, it has shown remarkable enterprise, courage, and intelligence. According to a recent edict of the Emperor, the second house of the first Chinese parliament will convene in 1913 instead of 1915, as first planned."—Zion's Herald.

OUR BIBLE SCHOOL.

Answers to Assigned Questions.

30. The indication that material blessing is conditioned on man's spirituality can be found in Lev. 25th chapter, 1st to 22nd verses. Also Lev. 26: 2-5.

Ruth Chavis.

It is not our purpose to make a debating society out of our class. But when different members of the class hold different views regarding important Bible questions, it will be in order to state them, with the reasons that sustain them.

Question 26 has been well answered from the point of view of those who believe that God foreknows all. But this view seems to us to leave no room for human freedom, and we ventured rather timidly some years ago to question the correctness of that view. There is a difference between the question as to whether God foreknew the fall of Adam and Eve and the question as to whether God can foresee that a sinful man will keep on sinning. If the sinful man cannot save himself from sin, he will certainly continue to be a sinner until saved by the grace and power of another. God may determine the course of a man's sinful career after the man has entered upon such a career without doing any violence to his freedom; and if it suits God's benevolent purpose that a man should sin in one way rather than another, God may predetermine that the man shall pursue the course that will help to work out the purposes of God. In such cases as this, God can certainly foresee what men will do. But in the case of the unfallen Adam, I think we may believe that God did not really foreknow. He knew the possibilities and provided for both alternatives, but to me the thought of man's freedom is inconsistent with the thought of God's complete prescience. Some fear that they would dishonor God by supposing that He does not know all. But they may well enquire whether they do not dishonor God more by denying to him the power to create a being whose action God could not foresee. If God can make such a being, possibly He made such a being when He made man.

We believe that the nature of man as a free moral agent forbade God's foreseeing the fall of man and that it also forbids God's foreseeing what the individual will do when confronted with the means of his salvation in Christ. Again, God treats men as if He did not know and as if He were supremely concerned lest they should fail at the critical time, and suffer infinite loss. It is comforting to believe that God knows all that is knowable, and that God is able instantly to provide for every emergency that may arise through the play of human freedom.

GIDEONS AND THE BIBLE.

Do people just buy Bibles, or do they read them? Do they possess themselves of the good Book because it seems the right thing to do, and because it makes one more comfortable to have one around, or do they read them when bought? This is a question. There is an organization of drummers who call themselves Gideons and believe that people generally need to read the Bible more, and believe much good would come of reading it more. So the Gideons are placing the Bible in almost all the large hotels throughout the country. The Evening Chronicle thinks well of this movement and comments in this manner upon it. "It has been in progress for months past and many instances of good results have been noted. The Philadelphia Press calls it "a pious and useful work." and one that cannot fail to bear good fruit. Educators, The Press says, bear testimony to the lack of Biblical knowledge among the students at leading colleges and universities. Evidently the Bible, though circulated by millions, is no longer generally read in the home. Young men who would be ashamed to admit ignorance of an allusion to the mythology of ancient Greece, do not understand an ordinary scriptural reference. The 'drummer" who finds a Bible in his bedroom at the hotel may have childhood memories recalled to him and read through sentiment. Or, seeing the Bible, may awaken either a religious impulse or simple curiosity. From whatever initiative one takes to Bible reading, the result cannot fail to be an increase of spiritual culture, intellectual breadth and literary appreciation. There is no more interesting book in the world of literature than the Bible, in itself the wonderful literature of a wonderful people. And of all the monuments of English literature, the King James version of the Hebrew Scriptures is the greatest. The Gideons are doing a splendid work, not only for their fellow-traveling sales-men, but for the hotel guests, who will profit by the distribution of the Book of books.

—There was a fearful fire in New York last Saturday when 142 employees, mostly working girls in a shirt-waist factory, were burned to death or were killed in endeavoring to escape. The building was ten stories high and there was not a single fire escape on the outside. Most of the deaths were on the 9th and 10th floors. It does not seem possible that a city of modern times would allow a building of such height without fire escapes.

We had a very good number at Sunday-school and church Sunday and the pastor gave us a good lesson from the following words: For we are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as were our fathers; our days on earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding. 1st Chronicles 29:15.

In the afternoon we were pleased to have the editor of the Herald (Bro. McCulloch) with us; also C. H. Hubbel of Michigan who gave us a nice talk on Christian Endeavor and Sunday-school work. And through his persuasions we organized a Christian Endeavor Society of several members, and no doubt in a short time it will be a strong organization, doing great and lasting good for the church and entire community.

Our protracted meeting will come off in the near future and we are expecting to see many souls saved during this meeting.

Our Sunday-school is progressing nicely and a great interest seems to be manifested. The attendance for March is as follows: Mar. 5, 88; Mar. 12, 87; Mar. 19, 42; Mar. 26, 100. On account of bad weather the attendance wasn't as large as it possibly would have been.

We are glad to report that Bro. Shepherd who has been seriously ill is somewhat better, but not able to be out.

Bro. Boyles and family(on account of having scarlet fever) have been kept away from church and Sunday-school for a short while.

Bro. T. G. Perry, wife and Master Glenn went visiting relatives and friends in the country Saturday and returned Sunday.

Bro. S. P. Montgomery is contemplating moving to High Point in the near future. We regret very much to lose them from our midst.

May our church overflow with an abundance of blessings at our future series of services.

We are glad that our pastor has improved so much as to be able to preach the past two Sundays, although he has lost about twenty-eight pounds he is not yet what you would call too small, and we hope he will continue to improve until he is wholly well.

The sermon yesterday morning was grand, from the words, "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." Notwithstanding the bad weather the attendance in the morning was splendid, for our people were hungry to hear the Gospel from the lips of our pastor again. The night service was rained out. At the morning service Mr. and Mrs. W. V. Hutchens united with the church by certificate; we are glad to have two such good people cast their lot with us.

The fourth Sunday in April is the time set apart for a revival to begin at this church. We need and want a great meeting and we know if we make ourselves ready that God will give it.

Invitations have been sent to members and friends of the church to a birthday social to be given by the Ladies' Aid Tuesday night, April 4th.

Our pastor's subject on last Sabbath was "The Proper Conditions of World Wide Worship." And after logically presenting these it was interspersed with illustrations and incidents in song and literature and from life.

The prayer of the deacon in Ian McLaren's "Beside the Bonny Brier Bush" on the shadowel life of a young maiden of the church was given in full. And its pathos was transcendent. This sermon was one of unusual sweetness. And we would we had many W. F. Kennetts dispersed over our conference. May he never be put on the shelf.

In that broadening comprehensive work, "Distinguished North Carolinians," we find on the stone of William R. Davis, founder of our University, inscribed: "He preferred the nation's good to the nation's favor." This a suggestion to pastors and folds. For until we learn this, a form of love as God loves, we are lacking in the highest possible Christian grace.

After an intermission of some two months our S. S. resumes next Sabbath.

'Tis with sadness we learn of the demise of Rev. T. M. Johnson's father, and extend sympathy to him and his.

Though at this late date we would place violets on the grave of Rev. W. L. Harris, highly esteemed by many here, believing his life was not spent in vain.

Mrs. John B. Ogburn was called to Gibsonville Friday by the sudden death of her mother, Mrs. Berry Davidson, a most estimable woman. And much sympathy is felt for her aged father in his irreparable loss.

We had the pleasure of again hearing our pastor, Bro. H. L. Powell, fill his regular appointment here last Sunday morning at the usual hour. He preached a very interesting sermon to an attentive congregation. Am sorry no more were out to hear him, but the weather was very threatening. We are always glad to have our pastor with us; every one seems to like him and speak well of him. We met and reorganized our Sunday-school the second Sunday in March. Supt., W. M. Byerly; assistant, J. E. Sinder; Sec., Roy Phillips. We hope to have a better S. S. this year than we did last year. We are sorry to note the sad death of Bro. J. F. Byerly which occurred last Monday morning, the 27th at 6 o'clock at his home. His remains will be laid to rest on the 28th at 2 o'clock in the cemetery at this church of which he was a member. All of his children were at his bed-side except one daughter, when the end came.

Success to the Hearald and its readers.

Dear Herald:

Our pastor was with us last Sunday, and delivered an excellent sermon from the text, Matthew 26:29, But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom. I think I never heard a sermon complimented more. Bro. Ashburn always comes with something good for us. Wish so much we could have him with us more than once a month. It seems so long from one appointment to the next. The Lord's Supper was administered of which a large number partook.

Owing to sickness in our community our Sunday-school hasn't been well attended for the past month. Our Sunday-school is not as large as some others, and not as large as it should be. There is yet much work to be done to get other interested.

Our prayer meeting is generally well represented. Some fathers and mothers that have been coming here a long time, never too tired to say no, when the Spirit says go. Oh! what a great encouragement their presence is to their superintendent and scholars. It makes us feel that life is worth living, and that there is a great joy in life devoted to the service of God.

We are preparing to have Easter service, which we hope to be successful. We cordially invite one and all to be with us on that day. We are hoping for a nice time and a good collection.

The second quarterly conference will be held here next fourth Saturday; preaching at 11 o'clock and conference immediately afterwards.

We are yet in debt on our new church. There is a chance yet for any one who hasn't helped. "Don't you Herald readers want to help us?"

I am glad to report that our class leader, Bro. G. F. Robinson, who has been very ill is a little on the mend, not enough to go to church though, yet. We are glad to welcome back in our Sunday-school our faithful teacher, Mrs. Chas. E. Dimick, for class No. 2. She has been absent for the last three months, visiting her people in Madison, Neb.

Mrs. Rebecca Robinson, the oldest member of our church, fell asleep in Jesus last day morning, at the home of her only son, Mr. G. F. Robinson. She had been in feeble health for some time. She will greatly missed by her children, grand children and great grand-children, and friends.

Dear Editor:

Our pastor, Rev. Mr. Powell, filled his regular appointment the second Sunday night. We are all always glad to see him come, for he has something good to tell us. Our special meeting will begin the first Sunday in April. We are all hoping to have a good meeting.

Rev. Mr. Bowman is to do the preaching.

I am a little girl aged ten years. I go to Sunday-school every Sunday. We have a good Sunday-school. Mr. L. A. Hardister is our Supt. and we all think we have the right man in the right place. My teacher is Mr. Charlie Phifer, and he is a good teacher. We have a large class. We got the attendance banner today for having the most scholars. Mr. Phifer has offered a nice present to the one that gets the most new scholars and we are all working for it.

Well, I will close for this time hoping that this will not find its way to the waste basket.

From a little Sunday-school girl,

Duevell Gibson.

Dear Editor:

We are going to have an Easter entertainment at the Chapel April the 16th. Our program is not quite made up yet, but it will be complete this week. The S. S. workers are taking hold of the work, and we hope to have a good time, and will have if we try to make it so. God is always willing and ready to do his part if we do ours.

May God depend on us! and may we be willing to respond to his call. Not that we may have pleasant things said about us, but that we may be instrumental in his hands in portraying the death and resurrection of his Son, for in Him all of our hopes are centered, that in that great day of days. When at his second coming we all shall arise to meet him who gave himself for us.

We hope to have our program complete by next week. So we can publish it in the Herald by your permission. The hour for the service will also be published. All invited.

Yours for success.

J. C. Allred, Superintendent.

Our pastor, Bro. Williams, filled his regular appointment here Sunday. The weather being unfavorable there were not many out to hear him. The sermon was helpful and interesting. We are all pleased with our new pastor. We have a live S. S. Our Supt., J. E. Holder, is taking great interest in the school. We have 80 on roll, and we hope to add many more.

A Member.

Fairfield.

To the members of Guilford Circuit. At the first quarterly conference I was elected circuit steward for this charge. It seems to be a new office so far as this charge is concerned at least. The duty of this Steward is to try to stimulate the members in regard to their financial duties to the work. I thought there was no better way to begin this work than through our church paper. Now if all our members read our church paper I would be talking to all the members at once, but I fear that I am only talking to a small per cent. So first, let me urge members to read our church paper. It should be in every family on the work, I don't see how an official member can get along without it. A brother may be a good official who doesn't read our church paper, but he would be a much better one if he did read it. Let us have a better attendance at quarterly meetings. Let every official come and as many laymen as can come. At our last quarterly meeting some of the officials members at the church where it was held were not there. They said if they had known when it was they would have come. I don't think Doc Cook reached the North Pole, but think he went far enough north to get cold. I don't think any of our official members have reached the North Pole in regard to their official duties, but some of them are terribly cold; every member should post themselves upon all lines of church work; Missions, Church Extension and so on; then they would know how little they were doing; every member should attend every service. If you don't get your money's worth out of the sermon, take him home with you, talk with him in private conversation, get his experience and give him yours for what it is worth. The poorest preacher in the conference can do more good on a work where the members assist him in every way possible than the best preacher can do on a work where the members' hearts are all locked and they have got lead in their ears, and are down with the don't cares. If a pastor thinks you have no interest or confidence in him he will lose confidence in himself. Some members say if we had so and so for a preacher I would pay so much. They would not do any such thing; we all have a better preacher than we deserve. A preacher's success depends largely upon the assistance his members give him. Let us beautify our church grounds and build churches in keeping with our homes and school houses, that our church may be as attractive as any other denomination's; then Methodist Protestants living in the country should join country churches. The city churches don't need you; the city pastors would advise you to join the country churches. We ought not to look for some one to take care of us, but join where we can do the most good. I had rather be the big end of a little thing, than the little end of a big thing. Let every official member decide that he has got business at the next quarterly meeting that no one else can attend to. Now if all the members will obey the few things that I have set forth in this article, there will be no doubt about the finances this fall.

Yours for promptness,

J. M. Davis.

Dear Herald:—Our County Sunday School Convention was held at Union Mar. 25-26. We had with us Rev. N. G. Bethea, our pastor, Rev. R. C. Stubbins, of Vance Ct., Rev. J. A. McClure, of Henderson, Mr. J. Van Carter, State Supt. S. S. Association, and Revs. C. E. Newman, pastor Christian Church of Henderson. There was a large attendance notwithstanding the condition of the weather was bad. Everybody showed intense interest from the beginning to end. Rev. Bethea made an able address on Saturday: "Preparation of Ourselves." The next to speak was Rev. J. A. McClure, on "The Sunday School Teacher." This address was short but to the point. Mr. J. Van Carter's address, "Round table on Sunday School Teacher," was enjoyed by all present. He told us of some things to think about and to get our Sunday School to be up and doing. He also demonstrated, on how to teach the Sunday School by hearing the lesson Sunday.

Rev. R. C. Stubbins spoke with much interest on The Sunday School with an Aim.

We also had with us the Choir from Oak Ridge Baptist S. S. which did credit to themselves and their Church.

Miss Moss Rose and Miss Lillian Huff were elected as delegates to the State Convention at High Point.

We have a Sunday School of which we are very proud, but hope to make it better. Bro. L. H. Stone is our Supt., who is a fine manager and much loved by all.

With best wishes to the Herald, I close.

Mt. Pleasant, Guilford Ct.

Sunday School was organized last Sunday with Bro. J. R. Stone Supt., Bro. Herman Murphy assistant Supt., Ada Craven, Sec., Sallie Stoaf, Organist, Class No. 1., S. S. Welbourn, teacher; Class No. 2., Girtha Stone, teacher; Class No. 3., Ethel Darr, teacher; Class No. 4., Effie Murphy, teacher; Class No. 5., Mary Eller, teacher.

We hope for this to be the most successful year's work ever done at Mt. Pleasant. I want to ask the older people to come to Sabbath school. If you can't come except on preaching days, come and take part in Sunday school. And we will be glad to see you and have you in our school.

Mrs. John Eller is confined to her room from falling some days ago.

A collection was taken Sunday for the purpose of seating the church as Canaan and six dollars was raised.

Mrs. Dora Darr is confined to her room, we are sorry to note. We regret to have her absent in our Sunday school. She is a good teacher and always willing to lend a helping hand.

Miss Irma Hayworth of Elon College is spending a few days with her parents.

Wishing the Herald and its readers success.

Last Sunday was another very unfavorable day for us, yet the S. S. attendance was 228 and the collection $4.10. During the quarter just closed the average attendance was 217. There were only two Sundays out of the thirteen when our attendance fell below 218. The enrollment at the close of the quarter was 460, divided as follows: Main school, 337; Cradle Roll 50; Home Dept., 73.

The morning preaching service was well attended, but the night service was almost entirely rained out.

The C. E. Convention meets here Friday. On Sunday morning the convention will adjourn so the delegates may attend the Sunday schools of the town. We want to extend a cordial invitation to all M. P.s' and others who may be in attendance to attend ours at that time. We meet at 9:45 A. M. and you'll find us right down East Davis Street, about five blocks from the Post-office. Come.

Perhaps it will interest some of our readers to know of the good things we are anticipating at this place the 2nd Sunday in April. For weeks we have been training our few S. S. children for an old time Easter service, which we have not had here in over six years.

The last appointment Bro. Dosier announced the expected visit of our beloved President, that he would be with us next 2nd Sunday; so it was decided to have him preach at 11 A. M., dinner on the ground, then the children's Easter service in the afternoon. This we felt would mean a success, for both services and give our president the opportunity to meet more of his friends at this his old home church, among his home people. We had thought to make this a surprise to him but it is too good to keep; then we want his prayers, and the prayers of all our people for this special occasion, which we feel will mean so much to give us prestige toward reviving the old time interest here.

We are moving on "steady and slow, but sure." At Christmas we had two trees and splendid exercises by the children. Brethren and sisters, pray for the entire work, that this year may be one of surpassing success.

With best wishes for success.

Sincerely, I. H. N.,
Callie W. Tarkington.

Our pastor did not fill his appointment here last third Sunday on account of the weather being very bad. We hope the weather will be favorable so he can fill his regular appointment here the third Sunday in next month. I trust that each one that will be present will be prepared for the reception of the truths that not one of us again will neglect our duties to God, for a life for Christ is the only life that's worth living.

Last second Sunday we had two interesting sermons from our pastor. Bro. Lowdermilk always comes well loaded with good things to tell his people and tries very hard to encourage them to live sober and godly lives. At the morning service, his subject was the pure church. In his discourse he clearly showed us that the church is not so much in need of us but that we needed the church and that God does not need us so much, but we need God. It seems to me from the action of a great many people they really think the church does not need them from the fact they seem to have no business at the church only on special occasions. Instead of saying, children, come let us go to Sundy-school, they lie around or congregate together and spend the holy Sabbath day in frivolous joking and say to their children, go. At night his text was ye must be born again, John 3:7. This sermon was highly appreciated by a good sized congregation and trust through simplicity of that discourse some one has understood the true meaning of the text and repent of their sins that they may be born into the kingdom of God.

Our S. S. is moving on slowly. Last Sunday we made some changes in teachers and elected an assistant Supt., Bro. Pink Baker. I hope that the attendance will be better as the spring opens. I see that there is a great need of a general awakening along the line of Sunday-school. Last fourth Sunday we had a good temperance meting; there was quite a number out to hear the splendid talk by Mr. Delious Hammer of High Point on the subject of Intemperance. There is a great deal of work needed on the line of temperance. I think that is a shame that in this enlightened age of the world full of opportunities for young men to build a grand and noble character will stoop down low enough to debauch themselves with strong drink.

On March 25, at 7 o'clock p. m. at the residence of the bride's father, Pleas Wears, Miss Ettabell Wears was united in marriage to Mr. Walter Anderson of High Point. They will make their home in High Point. Miss Etta is one of our much esteemed members and will be sadly missed by the church. She proved herself a faithful steward last year. We regret to lose her. Mr. Anderson is a friend. May their life be long and happy.

Sorry to say that Bro. Pleas Wears is very sick with pneumonia; hope that he may be restored to health shortly. I forgot to say that Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk officiated in the marriage. Best wishes to all.

Our "special meeting" here began on Wednesday night before the second Sunday in March, and closed Friday night after the second Sunday.

Our pastor had Rev. S. W. Taylor of the Littleton circuit to assist in the meeting, and Brother Taylor gave us some fine sermons. We feel that the meeting has done much good.

We were disappointed last Friday night at not having Dr. Hubbell with us, but Brother Fogleman gave us a good sermon any way.

A few of the Christian women of our town organized a prayer-meeting at the suggestion of Brother Taylor, during the meeting, and we expect to "keep it up," meeting on Thursday afternoons at four o'clock. All the ladies of our town are cordially invited to attend and to take part in these meetings.

We are glad to report that Mr. R. E. Patterson, who has been confined to his room for some time, is now able to be out again. Miss Myra Hunter of Glendon, N. C., and Miss Mary Hunter of the State Normal College, have recently visited their sister, Mrs. E. R. Wells.

This report ought to have been in last week's paper but owing to sickness it was not sent in.

Lee's Chapel, Halifax Circuit.

We were grieved so much at the sad death of our beloved pastor, Rev. W. L. Harris. How we have missed having him with us on third Sundays!

President W. E. Swain visited our church last Saturday. He made a very interesting talk and preached an excellent sermon. That we were anxious to hear him preach was proven by the large congregation present. We all returned home feeling more encouraged than before.

Rev. A. G. Wilcox preached for us on Sunday, and, to say the least, it was the best sermon I ever heard him preach. His subject was "Praying Amiss." He kindly consented to preach for us again next fourth Sunday afternoon.

Sunday-school having died out during the winter months, was re-organized. Mr. E. L. Lee was re-elected Supt. Prayer service and S. S. next Sunday afternoon. We hope to have a large attendance.

There seems to be a great deal of sickness in the neighborhood. Mr. G. L. Knight and Mrs. E. L. Lee are on the sick list.

Miss Sue E. Perkins, who has been visiting her aunt, Mrs. G. L. Knight, has returned to her home in Port Norfolk, Va., much to the regret of her many friends in this community.

Miss Lela Knight spent last Saturday and Sunday at home.

We are glad to note that Mrs. Mary F. Odom, who has been extremely ill for some time, is able to be up again.

With best wishes for the Methodist Protestant Herald and its many readers.

CARDINAL GIBBONS ENDORSES TUBERCULOSIS DAY.

Cardinal Gibbons, the highest authority of the Roman Catholic Church in America, has expressed his approval of Tuberculosis Day, which is to be observed by the churches of the United States on or about April 30th, and of the general organized anti-tuberculosis campaign, according to a report of an interview made public to-day by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis.

The interview was granted by His Eminence to H. Wirt Steele, Executive Secretary of the Maryland Association for the Prevention and Relief of Tuberculosis and Dr. Charles O'Donovan, one of the leading physicians of Baltimore. Mr. Steele and Dr. O'Donovan explained to the Cardinal the object of Tuberculosis Day, namely, that it was an effort to secure a simultaneous and systematic presentation of the educational side of the tuberculosis campaign in all of the churches of the United States on April 30th or on some other day in the week preceding or the week following that date. The Cardinal expressed his entire sympathy with the plan of the Tuberculosis Day movement, and endorsed the program both of the Maryland Association and of the National Association.

Following the interview, Cardinal Gibbons also sent a letter to Mr. Steele in which he expressed formally his approval of the anti-tuberculosis campaign as conducted in the United States at the present time. The letter is as follows:

Baltimore, Feb. 23rd, 1911.

My Dear Mr. Steele:

I have read with keen interest the pamphlets you sent me, which tell of the triumphs already achieved in the warfare against tuberculosis.

My wonder has been aroused by the simplicity of the arms used in this warfare—namely—rational living and cleanliness—which are within reach of all.

I shall follow with special interest all your efforts in this splendid propaganda against the terrible disease, and hope the results of your labor will be commensurate with the zeal, the energy, and self-sacrifice which you and your fellow-workers are devoting to the work.

I can remember well the ravages made by yellow fever in days gone by, but rejoice to see that the medical fraternity have conquered it.

I trust that you will be equally successful against tuberculosis.

With best wishes, I am

Yours faithfully,

J. Card. Gibbons.

The National Association has prepared an outline for a tuberculosis lecture or sermon especially adapted for clergymen who will speak on Tuberculosis Day, and also other literature which will be sent to any clergyman applying for it at the office of the National Association, 105 East 22nd Street, New York City, or at the headquarters of any state or local association in the United States.

Richard Harding Davis at a football game in Philadelphia praised the voices of the young undergraduates shouting their weird college yells. "It makes me think of a Yocust Street bride," said Mr. Davis, smiling. "She turned to her husband one night at dinner and remarked: 'My dear, the first time I saw you was at Franklin Field. Your head was thrown back, your mouth was wide open, and your face was very red—you were yelling your college yell.' 'Yes, I remember,' said the young man. 'And I noticed,' she continued, 'what a remarkable voice you had.' 'Yes, you spoke of it at the time,' said he. 'But what makes you think of it now?' 'Oh, nothing,' said the bride. 'Only I wish the baby hadn't inherited it. That's all.' "—Argonaut.

DIED.

Dear Editor:

Ever since the sad news reached my ear that Thomas V. Avent of Nash County, N. C., was with us no more in this world, I have been watching the Herald for an obituary notice, but as I have seen no notice of his death in our church paper I deem it fitting that I, one of his former pastors, should at least let the readers of the Herald know that one of our best and most prominent laymen has been called from labor to reward.

Brother Avent was prominent in his country and his church. He was a member of the Board of Education in Nash County for a number of years and was faithful and always stood for the best interest of his country and community.

This writer knew him best in his home and church life. It was in the pleasant and hospitable home of Bro. Avent that I spent my first night within the bounds of my first work in Conference. In his home I was made to feel that I was among true friends. His home was the preacher's home as many of our ministers can testify. Bro. Avent was a good man and is no doubt, now reaping a rich harvest, for he was faithful in the discharge of his Christian duties while he lived.

In the death of Bro. Avent Harmony M. P. Church has sustained a very great loss and the community, in which he was born and raised and spent his life mourns the departure of a man who was loved and respected by all who knew him. But within the circle of his home and in the homes of his children his departure will be felt more keenly than any where else, for I have often thought that he was one of the best men in his home I ever knew, and, no doubt his children can add this testimony to this phase of his life. As I think of his noble character, I feel sure that he is at rest with his consecrated Christian companion who preceded him to the spirit world. And I confidently believe that some where and some time I shall meet again Bro. and Sister Avent and shall know and love them there as I did here.

May the Lord bless his children and may the memory of his life be an inspiration to them to fight life's battles faithfully.

J. D. Williams.

In Memory of Little Mary Holmes.

Mary Elizabeth, daughter of Rev. Geo. W. and Mary A. Holmes was born July 16, 1908, and died March 26, 1911, aged 2 years, 8 months and 10 days.

Funeral services were very impressively conducted by Rev. W. M. Pike, and in the presence of a large number of relatives and friends, she was laid to rest in Bethel cemetery today.

Mary was a beautiful, sweet and affectionate child beloved by all who knew her. She was just old enough to be interesting, cunning and sweet; and oh, how dear little Mary will be missed in the home, only those who have gone through with the same sad exprience can know. How our sympathy goes out to father and mother and brothers and sisters in this sad hour, for who can be missed more by all than the baby one. The one whose prattle and smile and sweet affectionate ways make home a joy. To father and brothers, we know she will be missed so much as they come home and to mother and sisters, whose constant care she was, there is never a time that she is not missed.

She was only sick a few days. So her life on earth was short, pure and innocent. God in mercy and love took her home to Heaven. Surely He wants the purest and best of earth, and so He often takes those most beloved by us, the sweet little children; for "of such in the kingdom of heaven."

One more treasure in heaven, where many of her people who had gone before were waiting to meet her. Some time in our imagination we love to picture to our minds such meetings in heaven. We feel that we can see the pearly gate of heaven swing wide as the angel of God bears home dear little Mary. We imagine we see Grand-parents on both sides, uncle, aunt, and cousins ready to welcome her, and best of all the Lord Jesus Himself. What a happy meeting it must have been; and how will it be when we all get home! We weep not as those who have no hope. We expect to meet her again.

Death of a Good Man, Robert G. Lamb.

On March 13, 1911, God saw fit to release our dear uncle, Robert Glen Lamb, from his suffering and he was laid to rest in the cemetery at Level Cross by the Junior order and funeral preached by Rev. W. D. Fogleman, assisted by Rev. T. H. Matthews. A large concourse of friends gathered to pay the last tribute of respect to one they all loved. Uncle Robert had been afflicted for six years. He had a stomach trouble and six years ago had a stroke of paralysis from which he never fully recovered, but he was so patient never murmuring or complaining. Just a little over a week before he died he told me he was glad of his affiictions, for he was a better man than he might have been had they not been sent upon him. He told me he was ready and willing to go when ever the Lord called him, and he wanted us all to meet him in Heaven and he made special mention of his children and grandchildren as though it was his soul's desire for them all to live right and meet him where they would part no more. He was 61 years old and had lived a Christian two thirds of his life. He was converted when he was a young man and joined the M. P. Church at Level Cross and lived a faithful member the rest of his life.

We will all miss Uncle Robert, but most of all will his good wife who was so good and kind to him all those years. She has our heartfelt sympathy in her bereavement.

Mrs. T. E. Marley.

ORPHANS' HOME.

Since our last report we have received the following: Efland Church, one box of provisions. Mrs. Nannie Lloyd, one quilt. Mrs. Agnes Minnis, one quilt. Mt.

Pleasant, Liberty Circuit, one box of provisions, one bag of potatoes. Mt. Lebanon, Randleman, three boxes canned goods. Mebane Church, one box supplies. Marker Dalton, Gilmer Co., Winston, 136 yds. prints. Mrs. S. C. Whitaker, one quilt. Mrs. John Powell, 13 Hens.

About three weeks ago we received a box containing six cans of corn, two boxes hose, 49 yds. goods, four quilts, and some dried fruit. We would like to know who sent this.

We are sorry to have to report that our good neighbor, Mr. C. H. Surratt, is being kept in nursing a dislocated shoulder. He was thrown from the buggy while out looking after a cow for the Home. We hope he will soon be out again.

We now have a good cow, one that we hope will meet our demands for a while. Messrs. Cone Surratt and John Tucker volunteered to build us a barn, Mr. J. R. Peace gave us the framing, so we will soon have a nice barn for the cow. These good people have only to find out that we need a thing done and they are on hand.

TWENTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

High Point, April 26, 27, 28, 1911.

The greatest Sunday-school meeting of the year for this State will take place in High Point, April 26-28.

The music will be in charge of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Butler. Mr. Butler has been for several years past with Dr. R. A. Torrey in his evengelistic tours. He is well known as a leader of evangelistic singing and as a soloist of unusual ability. His wife has a very sweet soprano voice. Their solos and duets are inspiring and uplifting.

The railroads have granted reduced rates from all parts of the State. The tickets will be sold on the certificate plan and will be one and one-half fare, plus 50 cents for the round trip. Tickets will be on sale from April 22-26, with final limit May 2nd.

Each county is entitled to as many delegates as there are townships in the county. This does not mean that every township must be represented, but that the basis of delegation shall be the number of townships in the county.

All delegates will pay a registration fee of $1.00. This will be paid at High Point when assignment to home is made. All delegates will receive—Entertainment during the convention, a seat in the convention with county delegation, a souvenir badge, a convention program, a right to a voice and vote in all the deliberations of the body, helpful literature of various kinds.

Entertainment will be provided all delegates by the citizens of High Point, during the three days of the Convention.

Mr. Marion Lawrence, General Secretary, and Mr. W. N. Hartshorn, Chairman Executive Committee, will be the representatives of the International Sunday-school Association.

The Convention is interdenominational. Those desiring to attend should send their names to their County Association Secretary or to J. Van. Carter, General Secretary, Raleigh, and receive appointment as a delegate.

A DIPLOMATIST.

As Mr. Compton looked down at his waistcoat he discovered that it lacked a button. "And I asked my wife to sew it on more firmly, last night," he said to his commuter neighbor in the train, "I don't see how she forgot it."

"Don't ever ask her to mend anything," said his friend. "I learned a better way before I'd been married a year. When I want anything mended, say a shirt, for instance, I take it under my arm, all mussed up, and open the closet door, and sing out to my wife, 'Where's the rag-bag Peggy?'

"'What do you want of the rag-bag?' she'll ask me.

"'Oh, I thought I'd throw this away,' I tell her, and squeeze it a little tighter under my arm.

"'Let me see what you have there,' she'll say, and I'll mutter something bout 'worn-out old thing!' while I hand it over to her.

"'Why, James Holland!' she'll say, when she's spread it out and looked it over in a hurry. 'I am surprised at you! This is perfectly good. It doesn't need a single thing except—' And then and there she sits down to mend it, looking as if I'd made her a present."—Ex.

BACKBONE vs. WISHBONE.

Karl Ludwig Kraft.

Proportionately, if a man's backbone weakens his "wishbone" develops.

The nine-dollar-per clerk wastes his time in wishing he had the luck of a Rockfellow, a Carnegie, or a Morgan—wishing that he had this, that or the other job—continually wishing.

The material parts of the human body, muscles or bone, develop only by usage. There is not, in nature, any spontaneous generation; everything comes by propagation.

Which are you developing—your backbone or your "wishbone?" Do not compaginate them. By constantly using your "wishbone" it will develop in undue proportions. On the other hand, in properly strengthening your backbone you shall have no cause to wish.

"Brace up;" stand erect; strengthen your backbone—also, your jawbone. Learn to say "I will" instead of that monotonous "I wish." The world bestows prizes on men with a backbone, while to those with a "wishbone," asking for fish, she gives a serpent.

Motion propagates motion and life throws off life. Wishing you were fabulously rich leads you to the bread line.

CHILDREN'S PAGE.

THE THREE OLD LADIES.

There was an old lady all dressed in silk,
Who lived on lemons and buttermilk;
And thinking this world was a sour old place,
She carried its acid all over her face.

Another old lady, all dressed in patches,
Lived on nothing but lucifer matches;
So the world it made her strangle and cough,
And as sure as you rubbed her you set her off.

And another old lady, all sunny and neat,
Who lived upon sugar and everything sweet,
Exclaimed, when she heard of their trouble: "I never!
For the world is so nice I could live on forever."

Now, children, take your choice
Of the food your hearts shall eat.
There are sour thoughts and brimstone thoughts,
And thoughts all good and sweet;

And whatever the heart feeds on,
Dear children, trust to me,
Is precisely what this queer old world
Will seem to you to be.

THE GREAT HOSPICE OF ST. BERNARD.

The hospice was founded in 962 by Bernard de Menthon for the benefit of pilgrims journeying to Rome. In those days it was often attacked by bands of robbers, and the monks would be forced to barricade themselves in their stronghold until stress of weather drove the besiegers away.

The monastery consists of a plain block of gray buildings with massive walls, built to resist the wind and the weight of snow. In midwinter the snow around the buildings is seven to ten feet deep, and sometimes forms drifts against the edifice that reach right up to the roof. It is connected by telephone with a small inn on the Swiss side, and with St. Remy on the Italian side. At both these stations arrangements are made by which the monastery is warned of the number of persons that commence the ascent from these two places. Through these advices the monks know exactly how many travelers are making the ascent from either side of the mountain. It is really impossible for any one to attempt to make the ascent without the monastery's being warned. Often a party of travelers set out for the hospice in fine weather. A few hours later a sudden storm comes on, and the monks, knowing at what time the ascent was begun, know approximately what spot the travelers should have reached. At the hospice a book is kept recording the telephone messages, and also the number of travelers that reach the summit, so that at any given moment the monks know the exact number of people on the pass and their approximate whereabouts.

In the kennels at the hospice there are at the present time fifteen trained dogs and a number of young puppies. They were all born at the monastery. Their training is very simple. During the summer months, when the monks are not so busy, they take the young dogs out in the valleys or hollows, where there is always snow. One man then lies down in the snow or buries himself in it. A dog is sent to look for him. He is taught to bark when he has found the man, and also to rouse him as from sleep by licking his face. When the man wakes up and stands on his feet, the dog leads him to the hospice, running on in front to show him the way.

The full-grown specimens in the kennels at the hospice are magnificent creatures of their kind. They stand thirty inches high at the shoulder, and weigh about one hundred and fifty pounds. They are exceedingly strong, and can carry a man for a considerable distance.

The dogs commence the work at the end of September, and continue looking for lost travelers to the middle of June, which period represents the winter season on the pass. In the depth of winter not a vestige of a path is visible. The snowdrifts, too, present formidable obstacles. Besides, there is the danger of avalanches. Fogs are frequent, and in stormy weather the wind rises to a hurricane, blowing the snow into one's eyes and making it impossible to see any distance ahead.

Why, then, do people venture upon this dangerous road during the winter? The greater majority of the travelers are poor workmen going or returning from their labors on the other side of the Alps. In February and March as many as a hundred will make their way across the path in a single day. It is then that the monks are busy. They think nothing of remaining out in the snow, seeking the lost, for twenty-four hours at a time. Father Darbellay says that he has known the dogs to remain out in the snow for two days, eating very little and not taking any rest or sleep.

Before the advent of the telephone, a modern invention that has lightened the work of the monks and reduced the loss of life to a minimum, the dogs carried a flagon of wine tied to their collars and food strapped to a saddle on their backs. Now they carry only the wine, because it has been found that the weight hinders their progress through the snow. So well are they trained that they are often dispatched by themselves down the pass to escort travelers up the treacherous path to the hospice. They always discover them and guide them to the desired haven. The monks also allow the dogs to accompany travelers on their journey down the mountain if the weather is at all bad and the roads difficult to trace.

There are over one hundred beds for travelers, and they are never empty during the winter months. Often the hospice shelters three or four hundred persons at one time. No one is asked to pay for his accommodation. Very few drop into the alms box in the beautiful chapel the amount that would have been paid for similar accommodation at an ordinary hotel. Hence the monastery must depend to a very large extent upon other means of support, and the expenses are very heavy, for about all supplies have to come from Aosta and the neighboring villages.

Wood for firing is one of the most important necessaries. Not a stick grows within seven miles, and all the fuel has to be brought from the forest on the backs of horses. For this purpose alone about thirty horses are employed daily during the brief summer.—The Churchman.

A SPRING POEM.

An apple blossom—just awake to life;
The sun, the wind, two enemies at strife;
The apple-blossom's heart, the prize to be,
For him who gained the early victory.
Then wind, with eager accents, loud and strong,
Approached the blossom with his lover's song.
He tried to break the petals from their hold
So closely on the blossom's heart of gold.
But all in vain—the more he puffed and blew,
The blossom her pink petals closer drew.
Then sun came out so gently and so warm,
The blossom knew that he could bring no harm.
His brightest rays he sent, his warmest kiss,
Which thrilled each petal pink with rosy bliss,
And, blushingly, her petals fell apart,
And to the sun revealed her golden heart.
But wind was not content to loser be,
And he began to laugh in mockery,
Ruthlessly he tore the petals from their stem—
Flung them upon a breeze, and captured them!

But there remained what wind had never won—
The blossom's heart, still golden in the sun!—

JOHN BUNYAN.

John Bunyan was born in a cottage just outside of the hamlet of Elstow, in Bedfordshire, England, late in the year 1628. His father, Thomas Bunyan, was a tinker in very poor circumstances, and his mother, Margaret Bentley, was of as low an estate. Nothing is known of Bunyan's education, though it is supposed, since he could read and write that he went to the village school. His language shows that he was not a college bred man, and his book learning was very slight; even in later life his reading was confined almost wholly to the Bible and Foxe's "Book of Martyrs." While he was a boy he learned to help his father, whose trade he followed throughout life.

Bunyan, in his "Grace Abounding." the most autobiographical of his works, says that he was a hopeless sinner as a boy. Later biographer's, however, have realized that Bunyan's condemnation of his youthful practices as unpardonable was the result of a morbid conscience.

When he was a boy of seventeen Bunyan served as a soldier, probably in the Parliamentary army.

Besides the mere incidents of his life, there is really only one thing to tell about Bunyan—the story of his conversion and its results. His spiritual conflict, beginning when he was about twenty and lasting for about seven years, brought forth a new man; thence grew his influential ministry, his imprisonment for the sake of his conscience, and his great book.

Nothing is known of his first wife except that she was a "godly person" and brought as dowry two religious books, which he fell to reading. At times the evils of his youth haunted him; in his own eyes he was "more loathsome than a toad." Once he took much comfort from Luther's "Commentary on the Galatians." At last he came, like Christian, to a land of spiritual rest. For a while the conflict had broken his health, but with new faith and hope, which gained slowly upon him, he grew strong again.

About the year 1653 he was publicly baptized in the Ouse, by Mr. Gifford, pastor of a congregation in Bedford. For a few years he suffered set-back, and periods of despair, but by 1655 he had attained a spiritual calm and fortitude, which never deserted him. In that year he moved to a house in Bedford, and was made a deacon of the congregation. From then till his death he was unceasing in good works.

If there is little known about Bunyan's youth, there is not a great deal known about his maturity. To his second wife, Elizabeth, who survived him, he was married probably in 1655, the first year of his ministry. It is known that he had six children, all of whom except his daughter, Mary, who was blind, outlived him.

There is plenty of evidence of Bunyan's success as a preacher. Yet his head was not turned.

Very soon after taking to the ministry, Bunyan began to write. In 1656 he published his first volume, "Some Gospel Truths Opened." He was answered by a young Quaker, Edward Burrough, and shortly after had ready a reply, "A Vindication of Gospel Truths Opened" (1657) From then on till his death, except for a few years during his imprisonment, he turned out controversial books, religious allegories, and exhortations with the fertility of a Scotch or a Defoe. Some of his most famous writings are: "The Holy City" (1665), "Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners" (1666), "Saved by Grace" 1675), "The Strait Gate" (1676), "The Pilgrim's Progress, Part the First" (1678), "Life and Death of Mr. Badman" (1680), "The Holy War" (1682), "The Pilgrim's Progress, Part the Second" (1684.)

Bunyan had not been preaching and writing long before he came into conflict with the law. Men were forbidden to call people together for unauthorized religious services in private houses or homes. Bunyan was taken for violating this law and was, therefore, legally guilty. He was given a chance to escape punishment, if he would give his word that he would refrain in the future. He refused to take the oath and was imprisoned. His wife, Elizabeth, went three times up to London with a petition to the House of Lords, seeking for pardon, but with no success, and Bunyan remained in prison during the next twelve years. He was by no means wholly cut off from his work. He spent much time in writing, especially at first. There are some grounds for supposing that he was less strictly guarded during the last six years of his imprisonment, that he enjoyed, indeed, occasional liberty and was sometimes allowed to preach.

By the King's Declaration of Indulgence in 1672, Bunyan was made a free man. His second imprisonment has received special notice because during it, he is supposed to have begun "Pilgrim's Progress." By the Test Act, which required strict conformity to the church of England, the Bedford preacher was again in danger.

Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" at first did not find great favor among scholars, but it was popular enough to go through ten editions during his lifetime. The best evidence of its widespread popularity is the fact that it has been translated into over seventy-five languages and dialects.

In all his fame, Bunyan preserved his humility. He lived in a single cottage in Bedford, from his release to his death. It has been said that his library was limited to a Bible, and copies of "The Pilgrim's Progress" and a few other books—chiefly his own works.

James Montgomery says, "There is no long allegory in our literature at all comparable to Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. Robert Louis Stevenson says, "Pilgrim's Progress is a book that breathes of every beautiful and valuable emotion." Isaac Disraeli says, "Bunyan is the Spenser of the people." Reuben Post Halleck says, "It would be difficult to find English prose more simple, earnest, strong, imaginative, and dramatic than that of Bunyan." J. Schen says, "GraceAbounding is the best study for the origin and essence of Puritanism. It is a work which has the significance for the seventeenth century that the "Confessiones" of St. Augustin have for the fifth and the "Confessions" of Rousseau for the eighteenth." Theodore Roosevelt says, "Cromwell, Milton, Bunyan,—what can Puritan England, of their day, show to match these three names?" Edmund Gosse, in "A History of Eighteenth Century Literature," says, "Pilgrim's Progress is an allegory, successful above all allegories in literature."

Bunyan often left Bedford to preach in neighboring towns, to comfort the afflicted and to settle foolish disputes. In the summer of 1688, he rode to London through a driving rain to preach, and caught a severe cold. He managed to get through the service on Sunday, August 19, but on Tuesday he fell seriously ill and a few days later, August 31, died. He was buried in Bunhill Fields cemetery.

Bunyan was tall of stature, strong-boned, though not corpulent; somewhat of a ruddy face, with sparkling eyes, wearing mustache on his upper lip after the old British fashion. His hair was reddish, his nose well set, but not declining or bending. His mouth was moderately large, his forehead somewhat high, and his dress always plain and modest.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR ROUND TABLE.

Prepared by W. A. Harper to be used in the N. C. State C. E. Convention at Burlington, N. C., April 1.

1. What is Christian Endeavor?
2. How is its work done?
3. Do we need it and the Sunday-school, too?
4. How can we have it in the country church?
5. What committees would you suggest? Their duties?
6. How can you get committees to work?
7. How can we have a good prayer-meeting?
8. What shall we do with the verse-readers?
9. What should the leader do?
10. What should be done with the long talkers?
11. What about the music?
12. How can we get all the members to pray in public?
13. How can we avoid the life-killing pause?
14. What shall be done when two or three rise to speak at once?
15. What are the qualifications of a good president?
16. How can we have variety in our meetings?
17. How can preparation be made for the meeting?
18. What are the duties of active members outside the Society prayer-meeting?

23. How would you go about organizing a Christian Endeavor Society?
24. What are the different grades of Christian Endeavor?
25. How may we get all to take part?
26. What are the cardinal principles of Christian Endeavor?
27. Give some figures showing the growth of the society in all parts of the world.
28. What benefits may the pastor expect from Christian Endeavor?
29. What should Christian Endeavor expect from the pastor?
30. How may Christian Endeavor be utilized as a training school in any department of church work?
31. How can we train those to lead who now will not?
32. Give us two fundamental principles for success in Christian Endeavor work.

(If you have other questions than these, don't fail to ask them. We want to make this parliament practical and helpful.)

C. E. TOPIC FOR APRIL 9—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Painting the States White. Ps. 14:1-7.

Temperance Meeting:—Let the Temperance Committee lead. The chairman should make the leader's talk. One of the members of the Committee should read or better recite the beautiful Psalm that is our lesson. Another should show in three minutes how this passage of Scripture relates to the Saloon evil, which is the topic of the evening. A fourth should announce the hymns. A fifth should look after the prayer side of the meeting.

Leader's Remarks:—There are several possibilities open to the leader. He can speak of the harm of the saloon; of the progress in temperance; of the work yet to be done; why the saloon is to be outlawed; etc. Some people say that the saloon is necessary for business. Our country was never more prosperous than at present and yet now 75 per cent of the actual territory of the United States is dry, and this territory includes 41,000,000 of our population. The money that comes from the licenses is more than expended in punishing the crime that the saloon traffic creates. North Carolina has had a 55 per cent decrease in crime during the past two years under prohibition, according to Chief Justice Walter Clark. But one thing is sure; the saloon will never go except at the cost of eternal vigilance.

FIGS FOR MELANCHOLIA.

Dr. William Bulleyn of the same family as the unfortunate Anna Boleyn, was a contemporary of Sydney, Raleigh, Drake, Hawkins, Grenville, Spencer, and the rest of that famous galaxy that illuminated the Elizabethan era. The leading physician of his day, he took great interest in vegetable remedies and his "Book of Simples" was an honored authority for generations. He recommends the free use of sage tea; and of figs, saying: "Figges be good against melancholy and the falling evil (epilepsy) to be eaten. Figges, nuts and herbe grasse do make a sufficient medicine against poison or the pestilence. Figges make a good gargarism to cleanse the throat.—"Doctors and Surgeons," by Charles Winslow Hall, in the National Magazine for April.

PROGRESS OF THE HOOKWORM CAMPAIGN IN THE STATE.

The progress of the campaign against hookworm disease in North Carolina is splendidly shown by the growth in the number who have sent specimens of feces to the State Laboratory of Hygiene. During the year of 1910 the growth was as follows:

First quarter, 70 examinations, second quarter, 486 examinations, third quarter, 2421 examinations, fourth quarter, 4972 examinations, Jan.-Feb., 1911, 5478 examinations.

These examinations represent school children more largely than any other class, however the State militia, a large number of college students, and other adults are included. Many physicians treat the disease without having a laboratory examination made. It is learned from those in the State who are treating the disease about one-half the active practitioners, that about 15,000 cases have already been treated. The Hookworm Commission, State Board of Health, Raleigh, N. C., will send literature about this disease which has been found to affect about one-third of the people, free and the State Laboratory of Hygiene, Raleigh, N. C., will make the examinations for it free.

Matthews Chapel, Greensville Circuit.

Our pastor, Rev. W. F. Ashburn, filled his regular appointment the third Sunday. He preached from Zechariah 14: 6, 7 and 8. It was an interesting sermon. It was enjoyed by all who heard it. It was an unlikely day and there were not many out to hear him. Our Sunday-school is still improving and hope it will continue to do so.

I will close with best wishes to the Herald and its many readers.

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary (G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass.) comprises the "Second International as much as that has enlarged its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built. The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers under the supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reenforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonyms, pronunciation, have received unsparing scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are treated with fullness and clearness. In the matter of weights, measures, and the convenience of consultation, the work sets a new mark in lexicography.

AN ATTACK UPON THE EPISCOPACY

Near the end of January of this year the daily papers gave out this statement:

"Rev. Henry Spencer Booth, who has resigned from the pastorate of the Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church of Morristown, today gave out an open letter addressed to Bishop William F. Anderson, of Chattanooga, president of the Holston Conference, of which Rev. Mr. Booth is a member. In that letter he says he is cutting in earnest at the 'roots of the evils that are sapping the vitality of Christianity,' and he begins on his own denomination.

"He affirms that there is 'too much watered stock in Methodism; that preachers and other officials had statistics as to the number of conversions, etc., to make fine showings in reports and to "maintain prestige;" that the church has "gone daffy on 'organization' and machinery" and thus "largely crushed and ground the very life out of what real religion we have had."

"After expressing cordial personal esteem for Bishop Anderson, the letter, which is lengthy, concludes:

"'I am after the 'system.' I call on Methodist preachers everywhere who are weary of acting as puppets in the toils of a great ecclesiastical machine, to unite in opposing the abuse and espionage to which they are constantly subjected and to protest vigorously and forcibly against the oligarchy.'

"Rev. Mr. Booth declares he will carry his campaign into every State in the Union."

Last week we received for review from the King Printing Co., of Bristol, Tenn., a book written by Henry Spencer Booth, entitled "The Insurgent of St. Mark's." This book seems to have been written in pursuance of the purpose to attack the episcopal system. It gives a vivid picture if true of official conduct in the M. E. Church. One recognizes some of the characters and places.. The General Conference at Asheville is referred to as taking place at Asbury. Bishop Morrison, who was tried for arbitrary administration appears as Bishop Wallace, and his trial is represented as a case of persuasion instigated by a ring of presiding elders whose selfish designs he had thwarted.

The book also contains a picture of some of the evils of the industrial world, and has a socialistic leaning.

A love story runs through to sustain the reader's interest.

The author has succeeded in making a very fascinating story, but as a criticism of our institutions, it is destructive and not constructive. The author does not seem to know that Methodism can exist apart from the episcopacy, and as to a remedy for industrial abuses, he confesses himself at his wit's ends, and brings on the angry mob armed with dynamite.

The price of the book is $1.50, and we especially recommend the reading of it to all admirers of episcopacy.

NOTICE.

The members of the auxiliary of Grace Methodist Protestant Church, Greensboro, extend a cordial invitation to the women of the church in North Carolina who are interested in Foreign Missions to attend the Branch meeting which will be held April 20-21. Whether you are a member of an auxiliary or not, come and learn the workings of the W. F. M. S. Free entertainment will be provided for all who wish to attend the meetings. Pastors are also invited. Their advice and co-operation are needed. We hope to have a large attendance and a profitable meeting.

MORE INTEREST THAN USUAL AMONG WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORKERS.

This promises to be one of the best Branch meetings of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society in the State. More of the Cor. Secs. have responded. The reports are better and on the whole the indications are that the work is on a better footing than in some time. It has been gratifying that so many of the persons supplied with Gold bags for the benefit of the Building Fund, have returned them with a bill or check for $1.00. One sister sent $1.00 for herself and $1.00 for their Christian Endeavor Society. Will not others ask for gold bags and send me $1.00 towards the new building which is so much needed for our work in Japan? The work of the Missionary Society in the Methodist Protestant Church in the State is not only for a few but for every woman in the church. YOU are needed. God calls YOU. His work must be done, and will YOU not help do it?

Will the pastors not see to it that at least one woman from each church attends the Branch meeting April 20-21? And will they not also pray for a profitable meeting? All who intend coming should report to Mrs. H. A. Garett, Greensboro, N. C., who will secure homes for the delegates and visitors. Help make this a Banner Branch Meeting by your efforts, prayers and attendance.

AID FOR THE TEMPTED.

(Hebrews 2:14-18.)

This a lesson of real comfort for Christians. It contains beautiful thoughts and beautiful promises for those who are seeking to live pure lives, and are pressing toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

The whole Christian life is a warfare with Satan. He is always seeking to deceive, and trying to induce every child of God to forsake his Father's kingdom and enlist in the bondage of sin.

Christ so loved us, that He left His home in heaven, took upon Himself the form of man, and came to earth; that through death He might destroy the works of Satan, and deliver us from the bondage of sin.

While Christ was in the world, He was in the flesh; and was subject to like passions and temptations as we are. If He had taken on Himself the nature of angels, and come to the world as an angel, He would not have been our great sympathizer: but He came in the flesh; that He might be our intercessor, and make reconciliation for our sins.

Christ taught us, by His example how to live above sin. His temptation in the wilderness was an example for us in temptation. Christ had fasted forty days and nights, and was physically weak when Satan presented three very great temptations to Him; yet He never yielded, but resisted Satan, and fought him with Scripture until he left Him. When Satan left Christ angels came and ministered unto Him. This was a test of Christ's power over Satan and sin.

When we are tempted let us go to Christ and ask Him for aid. He is our refuge and our deliverer. He is our ever present friend in time of trouble. He conquered both Satan and sin, and He is able to keep every one of His children in the darkest hour of trial and temptation. His grace is sufficient for us, and He is able to supply all our needs.

Let us endeavor to walk in the footsteps of our Savior. Let us put on the whole armor of the Lord, and commit ourselves unto Him. Then, we will not have to fight the temptation of life alone; but Christ will lead us and fight for us. He has promised never to forsake His people; but to go with them all the way, even unto the end of the world. What more do we need? All that we have to do is to follow Christ, and obey His commandments.

God's people are a tried people; and only those who are true unto the end, are going to be saved. Our temptations are only tests to try us and fit us for greater things. If we suffer with Christ, we shall also reign with Him in glory.

Let us watch and fight and pray, that we enter not into temptation. Let us be true unto the end, and by and by we shall receive our reward.

MUCH IN LITTLE.

In the Cathedral of Lubeck, Germany, is the following inscription:

"Thus speaketh Christ, our Lord to us:
Ye call me Master, and obey me not;
Ye call me Light, and seek me not;
Ye call me Way, and walk me not;
Ye call me Life, and desire me not;
Ye call me Wise, and follow me not;
Ye call me Fair, and love me not;
Ye call me Rich, and ask me not;
Ye call me Eternal, and seeks me not;
Ye call me Gracious, and trust me not;
Ye call me Noble, and servis me not;
Ye call me Mighty, and honor me not;
Ye call me Just, and fear me not:
If I condemn you, blame me not.

THE WAIL OF THE PESSIMIST.

A pessimist is one who looks on the dark side of things. He thinks everything tends to evil. This is the philosophy of despair. There were many such philosophers in the time of David. The psalmist says, "There be many that say, Who will shew us any good?"

Things which are good are often overlooked. discarded and despised by those whose understanding is always darkened, and the understanding is always darkened when God is excluded. Paul tells us that the power of the finest discernment is love. It is not intelligence, nor culture, nor education. These have their office and work, and a noble office it is. But it is not the brightest genius, nor the strongest intellect, nor the best disciplined mind that sees most clearly the deep things in life. Love is equipped with that delicate instinct which feels its way to the heart of things. Nothing like love can discern between the evil and the good. The finer our love the richer its revelations. If our love were perfect we should easily discern superior beauty and splendor in things which appear repulsive to those whose love is shallow and selfish.

God is love. Open the door to Him, and the understanding shall be illuminated from above. Then shalt thou see and appreciate the best things. No one can see the good that is everywhere so long as he is out of tune with the good. So long as one has an eye and a heart for the bad he will see the bad. No Christian is a pessimist. No one who is consciously walking with God shall ever ask in despair, "Who will show us any good?"—Ex.

CHRISTIANITY IN BUSINESS LIFE.

Men are asking everywhere this question: "Is it possible for a man to be engaged in the activities of our modern life, and yet be a Christian? Is it possible for a man to be a broker, a shop-keeper, a mechanic—is it possible for a man to be in a business of today and love his God and his fellowman as himself?" I do not know what transformations these dear businesses of yours must undergo before they shall be true and ideal homes for the child of God, but I do know that upon Christian merchants and Christian brokers and Christian lawyers and Christian men in business today there rests an awful responsibility to prove—if you can prove it—that these things are capable of being made divine; to prove that a man can do the work which you have been doing this morning, and will do this afternoon, and yet shall love his God and his fellow-man as himself. If he cannot, what business have you to be doing them so poorly, carnally and unspiritually that men look on them and shake their heads with doubt? It belongs to Christ in men, first, to prove that man may be a Christian and do business; and, in the second place, to show how a man, as he becomes a greater Christian, shall purify and lift the business which he does and make it the worthy occupation of the son of God. —Bishop Phillips Brooks.

MISSING THE FLAWS.

A large part of our own failures in life comes from seeing flaws and failures in others that we do not need to see at all. The keen-sighted pessimist does a great deal more harm than even the easily fooled, often mistaken optimist. For the man who looks for flaws in other people's lives usually leaves those flaws worse than when he found them by the notice and attention that he gives to them; and this leaves him worse off himself. The man who lives so much in the sunshine that he won't see other people's flaws helps those flaws to die and gathers new sunshine and strength in so doing.

"Don't look for flaws as you go through life,
And even when you find them.
'Tis wise and kind to be somewhat blind, and Look for the virtues behind them."

Virtue-hunting means virtue-finding; and the right things that we hunt for most eagerly we add constantly to ourselves. But the best part of this getting is that it is all in the interest of others. —S. S. Times.

ANNUAL ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT OF N. C. STATE C. E. UNION.

(Delivered at Burlington Christian Church, April 1).

Our Convention in High Point last April was termed by all who attended it as highly successful and the steps taken at that convention looking toward the future year were regarded as eminently hopeful and prophetic of great accomplishment for the year that is just closing. We found that we did not lack but twenty-five societies of having the 75 new societies organized to round out the standard set for us by "Atlantic City 1911." We thereupon resolved that we would put forth an extra effort to organize these 25 new societies during the year that is just closing, and also to induce at least 75 societies in the state doing work, but not affiliated with the Union, to affiliate with us. We also gave our approval to the project of a publication for the State Union, and entrusted the working out of this project to Rev. R. E. Steel of Spencer and Miss Bays of Charlotte.

What has Been Done.

We did not regard the attainment of these ends as impossible for our Union and were hopeful that we might be able to report everything realized to the full extent, before this meeting, but we have learned in life that we should not call our hopes our facts, and it has turned out thus in this case. At the time of the High Point Convention the President of Elon College was very sick and soon after the convention was carried to the hospital and was unable, by reason of his continued illness, to enter upon his duties as President before September. During all of this time the work of his office devolved upon the President of the State C. E. Union, and he was unable to do the work that he had planned to do during the vacation season for the State work. Since September, the duties which he has had to perform in connection with Elon College have been much more onerous than usual, and the time has not been at his disposal to direct and prosecute the interest of the State C. E. work, as he had planned. Realizing that this would be so, and feeling that the good of the State Union demanded it, I, therefore, as President, called a meeting of the Business Board of the State Union in Greensboro, on the 7th day of June, and therewith tendered my resignation as President, assigning as the reason for this action the facts set forth above. The Business Board did not see fit to accept the resignation and insisted that the office be continued by me, even though I might not be able, with the time at my disposal, to accomplish the ideal set before us by the High Point Convention. With this understanding, though my judgment was against it, I agreed to continue as State President.

This explanation has not been made by way of an apology, but by way of explanation simply, and to encourage the Endeavorers of the state to believe that the failure to make progress as we had hoped is not due to any general dearth of interest in C. E. in the State, but to the simple fact that the necessary work to attain these ends has not been and could not be forth-coming. The opening for C. E. in North Carolina was never more hopeful nor has the society ever made more progress, nor met with such consideration as it now meets with at the hands of church-folk and the public generally, and all that is needed to make the work loom large and larger in the future, is the time and effort devoted to it by a capable official.

We have to report that nine new societies have been organized during the year. Four of these have been reported to the United Society in Boston, which leaves us twenty-one new societies yet to be reported before we shall have attained the full quota for "Atlantic City 1911." Of these twenty-one, five have already been organized but have not been reported. These five having been organized through the influence and instrumentality of our first Vice-President, Mr. William C. Rourk, of Wilmington. As State President I have been enabled to furnish C. E. items to the State papers from time to time, and weekly items to the Christian Sun, and the Methodist Protestant Herald. In addition to this, articles have been written for the Herald of Gospel Liberty and the Christian Endeavor World The two pamphlets which were written and published last year on behalf of the union work, have been mailed to a number of addresses, and have it is hoped, been instrumental in helping forward the work in a small way. The names of these pamphlets are "How to Make C. E. Effective" and "Christian Endeavor—What it Stands For." A few of these pamphlets are yet on hand and can be had free of charge at the Literature Table. I have also been privileged to make several public addresses before Endeavor Societies, Unions, and Denominational Conferences, during the year, but have not been able to present the claims of the society in as many places nor on as many occasions as it would have been very profitable for them to have been presented.

Late in January the Business Board met in the city of Greensboro and outlined the program of this convention and decided to enlist the assistance of an expert in C. E. work from outside of our state, to make a ten day pre-convention campaign in the state in the general interest of the work, hoping that thereby the 16 societies still lacking to bring up our "Atlantic City 1911" quota would be forth-coming through a campaign of this kind. We were very fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. C. H. Hubble, D. D., Adrian, Mich., who is the General Secretary of the Young People's Movement of the Methodist Protestant Church in the United States, and also President of the Michigan State C. E. Union. Dr. J. F. McCulloch, of Greensboro, kindly consented to relieve me of the arrangement of Dr. Hubble's itinerary in the State, for which I thank him. We feel that this itinerary of Dr. Hubble through our state has accomplished a vast deal of good in creating interest and enthusiasm. It has also had practical effect in the organization of five societies with four others to follow shortly.

In addition to the above methods of administering to the interest and needs of the society this year in the state, a large number of personal letters have been written by the Secretary, by the Treasurer, and by the Press Superintendent, and also by the State President, and while we have not, as we said in the beginning accomplished what we had hoped to accomplish, still we feel that the year's work has not been wholly ineffective.

Next Steps.

The first thing for us to consider with reference to outlining our policy for the next year is to make sure that we shall meet to the full the recommendation of "Atlantic City 1911." As we heard last night from Dr. Hubble, this means not only the organization of these new societies, but also a large and perceptible increase in Missionary activity; special effort for evangelization in our societies, increased efforts for the betterment of our Christian citizenship, and more consecutive striving for general publicity. It is the specific business of the State Union to look after the first of them, that is the organization of the required minimum of new societies, but this cannot be accomplished unless it has the hearty co-operation of the local societies, and we bespeak for the State Union this hearty co-operation and believe that it shall have it. The last four items, Increased Missionary activity, Evangelization, Christian Citizenship, and Publicity are largely in the hands of local societies and the hope is entertained that they will enthusiastically and sincerely undertake the realization of these four ends in their local membership. This is a missionary age and to the general interest in missions the active enthusiasm of millions of Christian Endeavorers scattered throughout the world has contributed very largely. We also need evangelization and there is no more fruitful field for envangelization than among the associate members of a progressive society. If the type of American Citizenship is ever to be raised, it must be done in the formative period of the youth, and surely Christian Endeavor societies occupy a stagetic position with reference to the young life. I think I need not insist that publicity in regard to religious matters is real service for the Master. The county and state papers are uniformly courteous to the C. E. society and will be only too glad to publish in their columns items of interest and progress as they may be furnished from time to time. The surest way to bring these ends to fullfillment is to have in every society committees that shall deal specifically and intelligently with these four lines of work. The Missionary Committee may be charged with the opportunity to increase Missionary activity. The Lookout Committee may take upon itself as a special object of work Evangelization, and committees on Christian Citizenship and Publicity should certainly be created if they do not already exist. These might well be called Temperance and Press Committees.

But there is another in which "Atlantic City 1911" should appeal with great force to every loyal Christian Endeavorer and that is the obligation to attend this great Convention this July. This promises to be the greatest convention yet held by the Christian Endeavor Society in our country. The city of Dallas, Texas, for instance, will run a special train through to Atlantic City and also other states will have special cars bound for this convention. North Carolina owes it to herself to have many present at this gathering where some of the greatest thinkers and public speakers, not only in the United States but also in the world, will appear on the program and no doubt many will avail themselves of such a rare opportunity. The railroads are anxious to give us special rates and I will be very glad, as Transportation manager for this state, to have all who expect to attend this convention report themselves to me at the earliest possible time.

Secondly: We should consider what our duty is with reference to the Christian Endeavor Headquarters Building, to be erected in Boston as soon as sufficient funds have been given for this purpose. Dr. Hubble at the request of Secretary William Shaw of the United Society, is to present this matter to this convention at such a time as he may deem wise and proper. It may be well to state that the $5.00 given by an Endeavorer or society for this purpose entitles to a life membership in the Building Union. This is a worthy enterprise representing a worthy cause, and deserving of our support, for an organization that has done the good in the world that the C. E. Society has, certainly deserves a building commensurate with its dignity and merit. The income from this building, just as the income from the C. E. World and Publication Department of the United Society, minus expenses, will be used in the furtherance of the cause of Christ throughout the world. Mr. E. H. Stockton of Winston-Salem, was requested at our last convention to take this matter in charge and he will no doubt make a report at this convention.

A third step which we need to make is in the direction of a surer and completer appreciation of the value of Local Unions, whether they be city, township of county unions. We have an excellent local union in the city of Greensboro, but so far as I know, this is the only local union in N. C. There are good openings for such organizations in Winston-Salem, High Point, Raleigh, Wilson, Wilmington, Asheville, our convention city, and many of the smaller towns, of the townships, and of the counties in the state, ought certainly to have hese beneficial auxiliaries, which have done so much throughout the world to uproot selfishness and narrowness and bigotry, and to enthrone liberality and congeniality and liberal Christian fellowship. Two societies can make a good local union and if they come together in this co-operative effort, it will not be long before there will be three societies in such a union and then four and then more.

The fourth step which claims our attention in the way of progressive Chris-Endeavor in N. C. is the bringing into affiliation with our state work of all denominational societies for Young People doing similar work. Such societies are found in large numbers in the Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist and Free Will Baptist Church, and all that many of these societies lack in the way of active co-operation with the State Union is a cordial invitation froth State Union to officials of these societies, asking that they co-operate with us. The St. Paul Convention, which has gone down in history as the great fellowship convention of Christian Endeavor, requested that overtures be made by the officials of United Society to the officials of the denominational societies looking to this end. The Baptist Young People's Union accepted these overtures with readiness and general acquiescence and agreed to affiliate with C. E. under the title "Baptist's Young People's Union of Christian Endeavor." Many Westminster Leagues and Covenanter Bands have also added the phrase "of Christian Endeavor" to their names and so become members in good standing of the older society, which is the mother society of all the denominational societies for young people. It remains for us to make effective in our own state this movement on the part of the United Society in the way of Christian Fellowship. Such affiliation ought to be of mutual advantage; for the problems of the young people in religious matters are identical in all the churches, and the Baptist's Young People's Union and the Westminster League, the Covenanter Band, and the Epworth League can all learn from Christian Endeavor and Christian Endeavor can learn from them.

In the fifth place, we must have a medium of communication between the members of this body which shall bring the state work into direct relationship to the local societies, if we are to push the work to large success. The members of the Business Board are thoroughly persuaded that the State Union will never come unto its own until we have such a medium of communication. We constantly call upon the societies for money and give them nothing in return, but a personal letter or two and a few blanks, together with the invitation to send delegates to the State Convention. Such a policy does not warrant us in the hope of greater accomplishments, and so a North Carolina Christian Endeavor publication is an imperative necessity.

This is not the place to outline what such a publication should undertake, for that is properly a matter for its editors, but it would not perhaps seem presumptuous to suggest a few things relative thereto. It might include for example, a brief, pointed, suggestive thought provoking treatment of the topics of the quarter. It might also include contributions on live C. E. matters and methods, notes and personals relative to the work being undertaken in the State would be likely to occupy some space. The different state officers would well have space allotted to them. It would contain book reviews of helpful publications treating on Christian Endeavor themes and a few pages of advertising matter, to help defray the expenses.

The experience of other state unions points to a quarterly rather than to a monthly or weekly publication. I should suggest a 16 page folder, 6¾ inches by 10 inches, actual printed space 5½ inches by 8¼ inches. Such a publication I am told by printers can be had for $25.00 an issue, 500 copies per issue; total $100.00 per year. Where can we get this money? The societies should be asked to subscribe for it for their pastor, and officers and the chairmen of the committees. The subscription price would be fifty cents to the year, with club rates for five, ten and larger numbers of subscriptions in any local society| Any Society which contributes as much as $5.00 per year to the State Union work should be given 10 copies to be mailed to such individuals in the society as they see fit to select. The subscription price to all others should be fifty cents the year. I believe that in this way with the advertising which could be secured, such a publication can be made self-supporting. Miss Bays and Brother Steele, who attended the Virginia State Convention in Lynchburg this spring to see if some arrangements cannot be made by which the two states could conjointly publish such a Christian Endeavor paper will be heard in regard to this matter at this meeting.

In the sixth place, I wish to bring to the attention of the Convention a matter which has been suggested to me by the Honored President of the World Christian Endeavor Union, Dr. Francis E. Clrak. Dr. Clark requests that we do something in a practical way to help the colored people of North Carolina to introduce and make effective in their church work the Christian Endeavor Society. There are a number of colored societies in N. C. now and we have written to them unwittingly from time to time and requested that they send delegates to this convention, only to be compelled when we found that such delegates would come, to tell them that we could not admit them. Real missionary work of an effective kind can be done in this way and I hope that the convention will see fit to adopt some measure looking to the development of Christian Endeavor among the colored people of North Carolina.

In the seventh place something ought to be done to develop C. E. in the North Carolina State Prison. We once had a strong and flourishing society in this prison, but for some reason it has died. I recommend that the Christian Endeavor Society recently organized in the Christian Church of Raleigh, N. C., be requested to look after the organization of such a society in the State Prison.

Finally, I would call the attention of the Convention to a much needed Next Step in the prosecution of our work, the creation of the office of Field Secretary. All the other State Unions that are making progress are doing so through and by the efforts of such an official. We must have such an official in North Carolina sooner or later and the sooner the better. If we had such an official, he would be the logical editor of the Christian Endeavor publication, which has been recommended above. It should be his duty to go from place to place as he might be invited and as his judgment might lead him, to give inspiration to societies already organized and to assist in the organization of new societies. The traveling expenses of this field secretary should be paid by the communities to which he may minister and the state union should undertake to raise $100.00 to pay on his salary. Of course, we could not accomplish much with so small a salary, but we could accomplish something and hopefully work to the time when we could have a Field Secretary in the field all of his time. I sincerely trust that at no distant date such an arrangement shall become effective in our State Union work.

PROGRAM OF THE TENTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BRANCH OF THE WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE M. P. CHURCH.

The tenth annual meeting of the North Carolina Branch of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society will be held in Grace Methodist Protestant Church, Greensboro, N. C., on April 20th and 21st.

Efforts have been made to get representatives from every church in the State as matters of importance are to come up at the meeting and a most interesting program has been arranged. Rev. A. G. Dixon, of High Point, will address the meeting on Thursday evening at 8:15. The following program will be carried out:

THURSDAY MORNING, 10 O'CLOCK.

OUR BIBLE SCHOOL.

Our class has been so quiet this week that we can't tell whether some have gone to sleep or not. If so, wake up and let us finish Numbers next week. We would like to know whether we are going too fast or too slow. Nobody has asked a question about the book of Numbers. Is every thing clear to all? If so, well.

Mrs. Norman comes with the following question in advance of our reading, but yet admitted and referred to our one ministerial member, Rev. W. F. Kennett:

Questions.

31. Isa. 45: 9, "Woe unto him that striveth with his maker." What does the word striving mean other than resisting the Spirit and grace of God? How else can one strive with his Maker? and is the woe pronounced of eternal duration? You will pardon for going beyond the week's lesson, but when reading last night we were much impressed with this verse and have sought an early solution.

Of Interest To Ministers.

A friend reminds us and requests us to state that the laws of 1909, chapter 440, article II, section 63, item (2) on page 725, among other specific exemptions, contains the following: "Minister's private libraries." In listing property for taxation the ministers will remember that their libraries are exempt, and this is as it should be. -Greensboro Christian Advocate.

Who waits for opportunity,
And, when it meets him, takes it,
Is not as good a man as he
Who doesn't wait, but makes it.

CHILD LIFE IN CHINA.

By Bertha Miller.

I do not know who said it, but the impression has gone out that Chinese babies and children do not cry. I only know that those who live in Shanghai and its neighborhood do cry, and usually keep on crying till they get what they want. When they come to the Margaret Williamson Hospital, it is a surprise to them to learn that they are not allowed to cry unless they are in pain, or very sick. The first lessons they must learn are not to cry, and to obey. When once these two lessons have been learned, and they learn them very quickly, they are, almost without exception, dear, good, loving children —very bright and cheery is their "Good morning, Isung" (doctor,) for we have taught them the English good morning, and if we are busy and do not happen to hear them, they keep on saying it until we do and speak to them. It is not only in the morning, but as many times as we happen to see them throughout the day, they make a little bow and say, "Good morning, Isung."

As for amusement, they are very happy for hours with only a little picture card. Their happiness is full, if it happens to be a doll or some little toy, which is treasured with great care, and taken home to show mother, father, and sister.

I wish the dear people who so kindly send all our lovely dolls, picture books, cards, and games, could see the bright little eyes sparkle as they get some trifle for their very own. It is hard to deny even the old women, who beg hard for a card, or doll, or toy. We usually laugh and ask them if they are children, and tell them that we cannot give them to "grown up folks," as we should not have enough to go around if we did.

I wish you could see the children going to school, for all who stay some time in the Hospital, and are able, go to one of our day schools close by. They are very careful of the little blind sister. One morning I heard a little boy whose father had died only a short time before, crying. I went to see what could be the trouble. He had never gone to school, and did not want to go.

One of the little girls was saying to him, "Here, don't cry, you may carry the bag of books and we will lead you." So little Blind Sister took one hand, and she took the other, and off they went, tears forgotten, happy as they could be.

But when it rains they must ride, for the roads are very muddy, and their shoes are made of cloth, so I hear them calling at school time to the 'ricksha man to please come take them to school. As many as four or five get in one 'ricksha, the larger ones holding the smaller ones. Then off they go laughing, and shouting back "We will see you soon, good bye." It is a picture one cannot forget.

No wonder the Master said, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." Do you wonder that after a number of months of such happiness a little slave girl who has never known anything but hard work, scoldings and beatings, often cries and refuses to go back with her mistress, when she comes to take her home?

It makes one's heart ache and wish it were possible to keep them all, and teach them more about Jesus, who loves them so.—Missionary Link.

THE ANTI-OPIUM CAMPAIGN IN CHINA.

(Appeal to England by Chinese Women.)

China has already suffered from the poison of opium, through inability to restrict its importation, for about fifty years. We are sure that your merchants at first only thought of gain, but never anticipated that its poison would have so cruel an effect upon us. Our government began to prohibit the planting of opium a few years ago. This prohibition is being made more and more strict every year; but the amount of opium which comes from abroad still increases. From examination of the Imperial Customs Report, we find that the amount of imported opium in 1908 was 40,600 chests, but in 1909 increased to 42,082 chests. We prohibit our countrymen from cultivating it, but that which comes from abroad is more than before. How can we entirely stop it in seven years' time? Your countrymen believe in the true God. We know that God loves all people of the earth alike. Your government does not allow your own countrymen to smoke opium, but forces our government to import tens of thousands of chests a year, and seems unwilling to see us give it up. Alas! our smoking opium may, indeed, be to the profit of your merchants; but as it is to the ruin of our countrymen, we do not see how they can stand before God, who loves the people of the whole earth.

We suffer directly because, alas! a very large number of our countrywomen, especially in the western provinces, have become addicted to its use, and are thus slaves of a habit from which it is impossible for most of them to free themselves. Besides this, it is said, that every year tens of thousands of women and young girls, because of the sorrows which come to them, take opium, because it is easy to procure, so as to end their lives.

Then there are the indirect effects from which we women suffer.

First, let us speak of the evil of opium in the relation of wives to t[illegible] Hitherto the education of women has not flourished in our country. It is still common for all women to depend upon their husbands. But when men destroy their reputation, lost their virtue, their property, and their health by smoking opium, and finally die without having accomplished any work in life when they might have been a power, alas! can you imagine the pitiful position of their wives?

Second, in the relation of mothers to their sons. Our tender-hearted mothers love their sons just as your countrywomen love theirs. We are sure it has, and will continue to move you to think of these poor mothers seeing their sons destroy their reputation, their self-control, their families, and even their own lives. Alas! how can we comfort our hearts? We are sure that your countrywomen who have sons could never endure to listen to these pitiful words.

Third, in the relation of girls to their fathers and brothers. The unmarried girls all depend upon their fathers or brothers. Now their fathers or brothers cannot protect even their own lives while they smoke opium. Of course, they have no power to protect their daughters or sisters. Moreover, they are sometimes obliged to sell their daughters or sisters for the sake of getting money to buy opium. Although their daughters or sisters become the lowest kind of women, they can do nothing to help them, because opium has robbed them of their power of protecting their family. Alas, poor girls! How cruel a position it is!

The merchants of your country forced our country to import opium. Our government being very weak dare not forcibly resist. But our people as a people hate the opium, and also hate your merchants for selling it to us. Our country at that time was an autocratic government, so we could not say anything about the matter. Now our country is preparing a constitution; the people are beginning to share in the conduct of the government. Members of your parliament have said, "The Chinese do not hate opium." We assure you that this is a mistake. We trust that your merchants will give heed to our cry, instead of consulting their own advantage; for surely to trade in any commodity which carries ruin to body, mind, and soul of any people, and gradually bring about its downfall, cannot eventually be to the advantage of these merchants themselves.

If you do this for us, then we know that all our countrywomen will remember your country's kindness and never forget it as long as the world lasts.

—Texas is to vote on a constitutional amendment for State wide prohibition on July 22.

MY WORK.

There's a message that thy Savior
Speaks to thee,
Saying, "Tell it to poor sinners
Straight from Me."
There's a talent in thy keeping—
Oh! with prayer
Use the gift thy Lord hath given
To thy care.
There's a place in life's great battle,
Soldier, see
That no other win the victory
Meant for thee.
There's a corner in God's vineyard,
'Tis for thee;
And the Master says, "My servant,
Work for Me."
There's a niche in God's own temple,
It is thine;
And the hand that shapes thee for it
Is Divine.

A CHRISTMAS EXERCISE IN CHINA.

Those of our readers who have experienced the trials and tribulations of training a lot of children for some public performance will appreciate this little story taken from an article in the Christian and Missionary Alliance written by a missionary in China. How much alike children are all over the world. Here is the story:

We had been working with the little boys and girls of our two schools for some days, getting them ready for their part in the Christmas celebration. It is not an easy task to train forty-five children from heathen homes to sing and recite, and to get up a programme that would be worthy of such an occasion when all the church members and the children's parents and friends, besides outsiders, are invited to come to our chapel to see and to hear. The little ones, day after day, had come to us singly and in groups to be drilled in reciting their Bible verses or verses of hymns, and we had practiced the hymns that all were to sing over and over again. Like American boys and girls, when they first begin to recite, it is in a monotonous, sing-song way, as though it were being ground out of a hand-organ, and we have to go over it with them many times until they speak slowly, distinctly, with expression, and loud enough to be heard by those sitting in the rear of the chapel. The six little girls who recited a hymn about using their hands, feet, lips, ears, eyes and hearts for Jesus, were taught to point to those different members of the body as they spoke, and they certainly had plenty of physical culture exercise before December twenty-fourth when they had their celebration. They learned to locate their hearts at that time and they know now that they are not in their stomachs.

The last week before Christmas was a strenuous one. We had the children in the chapel every day, drilling them in rising and sitting at the sound of chords struck on the organ, marching to and from the platform, and making bows to an imaginary audience. The little man about three feet high who headed the line and led the boys to the platform and back to their seats at the organ signal was a little general. He did his part well and called forth expressions of approval from the women's side of the audience on the twenty-fourth. One remarked that he had "wisdom."

Finally the great day arrived. We had planned the children's celebration for Saturday, as Christmas day came on Sunday. We had told them to wear their New Year's clothes (which meant their very best) for the occasion, if they had any; if not, to put on the best they had. At any rate, they should be clean. It was a pretty sight to see some of the little ones as they came in their bright colored garments, just as spic and span and nice as could be, as far as outward appearance went. I am sure the boys thought so, too, by the way they looked at them, nudging each other as little Hsi-tsi, one of the prettiest, came in, dressed in a pretty satin garment and new embroidered cap with long red silk tassel hanging over her shoulders. The boys are not supposed to look at the girls in China, but on this occasion how could they help it!

The Christians had worked hard to decorate the chapel, and it looked very pretty, with long ropes of greens and holly berries and chains of different colored paper extending around the walls and over the beams.

The children, we all agreed, did well. There were one or two breaks, but it rather added to the interest. When four little girls got to the platform to recite, little Oli did not wait for the signal chord which meant for them to clasp their hands, and the second chord for them to make their bow to the audience, but started right in with her recitation. This was a breach of good manners which Gin-tsi, who stood beside her, could not stand. Oli had gotten bravely through the first line. She had been speaking of using her hands for the Lord and was just about to point upward, to make the thought of the second line clear, when she received a poke in her side from Gin-tsi's left elbow. She stopped short and looked at the one who would dare to interrupt her. But Gin-tsi was getting ready for her bow, and the organist took in the embarrassing situation and struck the first chord. Then Oli understood. They clasped their hands in front of them and at the sound of the second chord made a low bow, Chinese style. A smile went over the audience, but the good name of the girl's school had been saved.

Chi Jow, one of the older boys, had not been to school the day before when the children had special drilling in making bows. So when twenty-five boys were on the platform waiting for the signal to clasp their hands in front of them, Chi Jow was gazing out the side window. The second chord was struck and the children's heads went down toward their feet; but Chi Jow's thoughts were far away. Suddenly he became conscious of the fact that something unusual was going on and turned around just as the heads came up. His face was a study!

While the last hymn was being sung two baskets heaped full of packages wrapped in red paper were brought in and the children's eyes fairly danced as they beheld the bright array. They contained Chinese cakes, candies and peanuts; and one of these packages, two oranges and a pretty picture card, was given to each child. It was a very happy day for these little ones, who do not have much real joy in their lives.

DIVINE PEACE.

Peace upon peace, like wave on wave,
This is the portion that I crave;
The peace of God which passeth thought,
The peace of Christ which changeth not.

Peace like the river's gentle flow,
Peace like the morning's silent glow,
From day to day, in love supplied,
An endless and unebbing tide.

Peace through the night and through the day,
Peace through all windings of our way;
In pain and toil and weariness,
A deep and everlasting peace.

O, King of peace, this peace bestow
Upon a stranger here below;
O God of peace, Thy peace impart
To every trembling, troubled heart.

Peace from the Father and the Son,
Peace from the Spirit, all His own;
Peace that shall never more be lost,
Of Father, Son and Holy Ghost.

—Horatius Bonar.

"Be true, let the holy watchword ring,
Be true to your trust, be true to your glorious King.
Be true whether friends be false or few,
Whatsoe'er betide, always at His side
Let Him find you true.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

Somehow my notes from Lebanon charge were lost. I take the liberty, even now, to say that this charge is taking on new life. The members by an overwhelming majority have decided to build an up-to-date church on a fine corner lot in Mechaniesville which was purchased last year. This seemed the only thing to do. The center of population has so changed since old Lebanon church was built that the church was some distance to one side. The new church will be centrally located and both pastor and people are enthusiastic.

At the last session of Conference Halifax was left unsupplied till Bro. Gerringer could come to the work at the close of the present term of the Theological Seminary. Brother C. L. Whitaker has been kind enough to preach for them some for which the people are very grateful. March 25-29 was spent on the work. They are hopeful and are looking forward to the coming of Brother Gerringer with happy anticipation. The laymen on the work the looking after the business of the church and at the Quarterly Conference, held at Ringwood, March 17, there was evident a spirit of real intelligent business interest. I think the coming pastor will find the work ready for him.

The past few days have been spent on Roanoke Circuit. Although the pastor is principal of Enfield graded school because of his clear presentation of facts and strong defense of the truth in his sermons he is popular and the people hear him gladly and are edified thereby. Some conditions are peculiar to this section and it is clear that nothing short of a strong man can successfully meet conditions here.

150 in main school; 46 at Woolsey Hall.

There is much enthusiasm in the preparation of the Easter service gotten out by our Home Mission Board.

One new member last Sunday—Bro. Hill of Ohio.

Class No. 14 is much distressed over the departure of their teacher, Mrs. H. L. Stratton. She was a great help to the entire school.

J. S. W.

Concord.

Our services at both Fair View and Concord churches were fairly well attended on last Sunday.

Our special evangelistic services will be begun at Concord church on the first Sunday night in May. Brother Moton will come to us on Monday and conduct the services. Pray for us!

Brother J. S. Parker and family have our sympathy in their deep sorrow, which was caused by his son William Nathaniel Parker, being killed last week in Alabama. May God give the consolation so much needed at this time.

Pastor.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

Dr. C. H. Hubbell visited Graham on March 30. There was not a very large number in attendance to hear his splendid address at night, yet it is safe to say that lasting impressions were made. C. E. societies, both Junior and Young People's, will be organized soon. We so much appreciate the visit of Bro. Hubbell.

Last Sunday was a red letter day for Graham. The largest Sunday school in the history of the church, being even 100 present besides babies that were not counted. The badge system has been introduced which it is believed will be very helpful. At the preaching hour our first Cradle Roll service was observed. A number of mothers with their babies were present. The babies behaved nicely and the mothers enjoyed the service. We have enrolled 23 babies on the Cradle Roll all of which were given certificates last Sunday, more than half of them being present to receive them. We had the best congregations, both morning and night, we have had this year. Mrs. Cox of Haw River, Mr. George Isley and family, of Mt. Hermon, Misses Velna and Mary Wills McCulloch and Mr. Dixon of Greensboro, and Miss Jessie Williams of Asheville were visitors who worshipped with us at the morning service. Miss Williams gave us some very encouraging words. The basket collection on last Sunday was the largest this church has received on any one Sunday. These are among the things at Graham that are indeed encouraging and promising. The prayers of God's people are asked that this work may be so worthy and so full of merit that we may be able to show Jesus to those with whom we come in contact. This can be done only by making a whole-hearted effort, being true and thorough, and having the Holy Spirit to guide in every step.

Next Sunday is the regular preaching day at Haw River. We are praying for and expecting a good day.

Geo. L. Curry.

Reidsville Church.

Received by Rev. C. A. Cecil and his people, $18.00.

This was so kind and helpful. Bro Cecil, it might encourage us and it did.

Bro. Robt. Griffin, not a member of the M. P. Church, $5.00 . He gave it too, without the asking.

Thanks.

C. E. M. Raper.

Midway, Haw River Ct.

Bro. Raper filled his regular appointment the fourth Sunday. He preached an interesting sermon from the parable of the sower. It was enjoyed by a large congregation.

We met last Sunday and organized Sunday school. There were seventy-eight present. Bro. L. R. Dixon was elected Supt., A. J. Dixon, Sec. Teachers, Class No. 1, S. J. Kernodle; No. 2, G. S. Kernodle, teacher, A. D. Shelton, asst.; No. 3, Ella Apple, teacher, Brona Apple, asst.; No. 5, Mrs. E. J. Elmore, teacher, Jennie Apple asst. We hope to have a live S. S. this year. We are glad to have Bro. Dixon and his family back in our Sunday school. Bro. Dixon was our Supt., for a number of years before he moved away and we gladly welcome him back. And yet we were sorry to give up Bro. Kernodle, who has served us so faithfully for several years. He was elected circuit Supt. and we hope he may do much good.

There is a great deal of sickness in our community. Several of our Sunday school girls are sick. We hope for them a speedy recovery. Also Bro. A. D. Hopkins who has been unable to attend church for some time. Hope he will soon be able to come out.

Brona Apple, Reporter.

Hobb's Chapel, Greensville Ct.

Bro. Ashburn filled his appointment last Sunday with an excellent sermon. The people are showing appreciation by coming out every service from far and near. We are very glad to have Bro Ashburn for our pastor; we always welcome him to our homes. Although we were sorry to give up our former pastor, Mr. Fogleman, for he was a faithful and devoted pastor, and we hope he will visit us in the future.

We will have our Easter service the first Sunday in May. Sorry we could not be ready by Easter, and we hope to have a nice service also collect a large sum for the good cause of Home Missions.

Pray for our success.

Yours in His name,

Dear Herald:—As this is my week to report, and I always like to see something from our church, I will write a few words.

Our pastor, Rev. W. F. Ashburn, filled his regular appointment here last Sunday. He preached an excellent sermon. Being a beautiful day a large number were present. After service the Lord's Supper was administered. We were glad to see so may witness a good profession.

Our S. S. is moving on very nicely; we have a very large attendance nearly every Sunday. I am sorry to report very much sickness in our neighborhood. Our second quarterly conference will be held at Wesley's Chapel Saturday before the 3rd Sunday in this month.

I will close by saying we are hoping for a prosperous year. May the blessings of the Eternal Father be with the pastor and his work.

Yours for Christ,

Beatrice Chambliss, Rep.

Mizpah, Haw River Ct.

Our beloved paster, Rev. C. E. M. Raper, filled his regular appointment here Sunday. He preached an excellent sermon from Acts 4: 31: "And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spoke the word of God with boldness." We were glad to see so many present.

Our Sunday school was organized Sunday. Officers and teachers were elected as follows: Supt., C. W. Huffines: Asst. supt., Horace Jones; Sec., Tom Hill; Teachers—Advanced quarterly, Annie Stallings; Int., Ora Wilson; Our Children, Mrs. S. S. Wilson.

We trust our Sunday school will be a success.

It was decided last Sunday to have prayer meeting twice a month, the second and fourth Sunday nights.

Miss Treva Raper visited Miss Berta Stallings Saturday and Sunday.

Mrs. Jane Coleman is on the sick list. We trust that she will soon be well again.

Much success to the Herald.

Rev. T. A. Williams filled his appointments last Sunday at Baltimore, Stony Knoll, also Union Hill. Had large and attentive congregations at every place. The people all like him very much and seem to appreciate his services. He will begin his special meeting at Union Hill the fifth Sunday in April. They are going to get new lamps for the church before the meeting. Hope all the readers of the "Herald" will pray for the success of the meeting that the church may be revived and many souls be saved. I have been visiting my aunt (Mrs. T. A. Williams) for several weeks; am having a nice time. I find the people to be very kind and sociable. I feel safe in saying the people are well pleased with their new pastor and his family. I have been attending S. S. at Pleasant Hill; they have a very good Sunday school. They are going to have Easter services; hope it will be a success.

I close with best wishes to the Herald and its readers.

Our pastor filled his regular appointment at this place yesterday, the second time that he has preached at our church since he was assigned to this work, as he preached the first time at Oldtown Moravian Church.

Though Bro. Owens is just a school boy, yet he can preach well, and we all like him fine. Yesterday he preached an excellent sermon from the text, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavey laden, and I will give you rest." Matt. 6: 28.

Our S. S. is doing very well. It is small, only 39 on roll, but they are interested in their work. We have been practicing for the Township S. S. Convention which will be held at this place the 4th Sunday in this month.

Uncle Monroe Hunter has been absent the last few Sundays on the account of ill health. Part of Bros. Baity's and Hines families were kept at home yesterday on account of scarlet fever, and mumps. We hope that they may all be well soon again.

Success to the Herald.

Our pastor filled his appointment yestoday. A good many out to hear him. His subject was the duty of the members of the church and that they should have fellowship and be at peace with one another.

The Sunday school met and organized on last Sunday. Mr. R. F. Ingram is supt., Joseph Dean, assistant, Rufus Nelson, sec, Mrs. Rosa Ingram, first teacher, G. A. Ingram for infant class, and so on.

We have some sickness in our midst. Miss Bettie Satterfield is suffering with rheumatism. She can scarcely walk at all; hope she will soon be better. Her sister, Mrs. Fitts, with whom she lives, is almost past going. May the Lord bless them in their affliction.

We are hopeful of a good Sunday school and that much good will be done at this place.

With best wishes to the editor and all the readers, I close.

At this time we have lots of encouragment in our church. Having reorganized S. S. the 3rd Sunday in March with much interest; the following officers and teachers were elected: Supt., Z. T. Garrett; Ast. Supt, C. W. Finch; Sec. and Trea., W. Polk Garett; Librarian, R. O. Grissom. The teachers are as follows: Class No. 1, R. P. Cunningham; Class No. 2, E. L. Garrett; Class No. 3, Miss Mary Finch; Class No. 4, Mrs. R. P. Cunningham; Class No. 5, Mrs. W. F. Robertson. S. S. began last Sunday with an enrollment of 38, being the maximum start for years. Eleven of the thirty-eight were married people. Wasn't this a good sign? We are anticipating the most interesting and most benefiicial school this year that we have had for some time. Next Sunday Bro. Bethea is to fill his regular appointment at our church. Of course we are expecting something appreciative. When he was with us last he made arrangements before beginning his sermon that if he failed, not think bad of him on account of his having been confined to his bed with lagrippe and he said that it generally affected the weakest part and that that semed to be his head, but after the service some one declared that he had best have lagrippe next time because of his having done so well. Bro. Bethea is never off the track. One of our faithful members, Mrs. N. A. Garett, was made to feel considerably sad last week because of the death of her father, Mr. Geo. Davis. Mr. Davis was an exceptionally good man. Her mother preceded her father to the grave 26 years. Mr. C. W. Finch and family have gone or soon will go from Henderson to their home near this church to live. Mr. Finch will be expected to take special interest in the S. S. this year. This may be a simple question, but ask yourself if every member of your Sunday School were just like you, what would your S. S. be?

IN MEMORIAM.

"Not changed, but glorified. O Beauteous language
For those who weep,
Mourning the loss of some dear face departed,
Fallen asleep;
Hushed into silence, never more to comfort
The hearts of men;
Some, like the sunshine of another country,
Beyond our ken.

O dearest dead, we see thy white soul shining
Behind the face,
Bright with the beauty and celestial glory
Of an immortal grace.
What wonder that we stumble faint and weeping
And sick with fears,
Since thou hast left us—all alone with sorrow
And blind with tears.

Can it be possible no words shall welcome
Our coming feet?
How will it look, that face that we have cherished,
When next we meet?
Will it be changed? So glorified and saintly
That we shall know it not?
Will there be nothing that will say "I love thee
And I have not forgot?"

O Faithless heart! the same loved face transfigured
Shall meet thee there,
Less sad, less wistful, in immortal beauty
Divinely fair.
The mortal veil, washed pure with many weepings,
Is rent away,
And the great soul that sat within its prison
Hath found the day."

"MOTHER SORABJI."

By Mrs. L. S. Gates.

We are permitted to reprint from an Indian paper this touching tribute to one of the best known of India's Christian women, prepared by one who knew her intimately.

Of the notable women who have made a name for themselves in India "Mother Sorabji" will rank among the highest.

The appellation "Mother" was given to her by many loving friends, and these included English, Parsee, Hindu, Jew, and Mohammedan, for her friendships were cosmopolitan. She was honored in her life; and now that has gone to her heavenly home, every one who knew her will rise up and call her blessed. She was so widely known that letters from over seas, simply directed "Mrs. Sorabji; India," have been delivered to her. Now that this noble life, well-lived and honored of the Master, has ended, we would perpetuate her memory in every way possible. A life of such rare beauty and so filled with good works, should be an inspiration to every person, especially to every woman in this land.

Franscina Sorabji was born at Ahmednagar, December 13, 1833. Her parents were of South India origin, and she spent the most of her girlhood in the beautiful Nailgherry Hills. There, no doubt, she enjoyed and learned to appreciate the beauties of nature, a quality which remained one of the charms of her life. Her garden was always her delight, and at her funeral the flowers culled from her own garden made many a wreath and floral emblem to lay upon her coffin.

Not many Indian girls have the good fortune to be helped by a sincere English friend, as Franscina had. But coupled with this outside help was her own keen intelligence, responsiveness and desire to learn, which made the most of all outside helpful influences. Thus was she able to rise above the insufficient educational methods for girls which prevailed as far back as the forties. By her own spirit she changed into pure gold whatever came to her.

At the age of twenty, marrying one of the first Christian converts from Zoroastrianism, she began to bear bravely the sneers and taunts of those who were fighting Christianity. Once, while passing along a street of Bombay, one of Mr. Sorabji's relatives spat upon the couple. He in great grief bemoaned that she should have to suffer these taunts. With a beaming countenance she assured him it was a joy to be worthy of suffering for the Master, and she was glad to share with him all the trials. It was a long fight, lasting many years. He saw family, friends, and fortune slipping from him, but never did he turn back, nor did the faith and courage of his wife fail him.

After joining the Church Missionary Society they were sent to Nasik where in connection with Rev. W. S. Price they founded the Christian village known as Sharanpur, a mile and a half from Nasik. The little village was a most interesting experiment. It had its mission rooms, its church, and its industrial school, where lads cut adrift from their homes learned trades which helped them to live industrious, frugal lives. It is interesting to know that the coffin in which at the last she was laid, was made at this same industrial school, and that the young men who made it put extra work into it, polishing it as well as they could, because of their love for one who in their grandfathers' time had worked for the boys. No case was allowed in the school; Indian crafts were taught; and all that was done, was done with the purpose of enlarging their field of usefulness for India. Here the boys were trained as carpenters, masons, bookbinders, and builders of transport wagons. The light vehicle known all through the Deccan as the tonga was built first at Sharanpur, and owed its improvement in design to Mr. Sorabji.

Those were the days of the great slave traffic. British officers were kept busy trying to rescue the poor creatures along the Arabian coast, and many of these boys and girls were sent to Sharanpur, where they were taught trades. After a slave boy had finished the course, he was set free—with his trade. Some of the boys returned to Africa with the traveler Livingstone; and it was some of these Sharanpur boys who went, with the remains of their old leader, to England.

While her family was growing up, Mrs. Sorabji gave her energies to the training to them, teaching her babies by a kindergarten system invented by herself, making their lives interesting and progressive. What she learned from her own children, she was eager afterwards to apply to the advancement of her fellows in the vast Indian Empire. She was familiar with the life of the young; in her own family she began the experiments and efforts which she later continued for the improvement of India.

When Mr. Sorabji was sent to Poona, she decided that in healthy climate was the place for her to start her new plans. In 1876 she began what later became the Victoria High School. She was not discouraged that only seven pupils came to her at first, but their nationalities were a foreshadowing of the influence she was to have over those of different races. These included Parsee, Jew, Hindu and English. The first day the little Brahman girl pulled her garments closely about her in order to avoid defilement; but after a few minutes she felt no fear.

Mrs. Sorabji visited England in 1886. There she interested many English ladies in her plans, and was able to set her own school on a firm basis as well as to turn the hearts of many toward an interest in all foreign mission work.

In the course of time, in addition to the Victoria High School there were started several primary schools for Hindu and Mohammedan children and an Anglo-Vernacular school for Parsees as feeders to the high school. The pupils from these schools number into thousands. Any ordinary human being might have broken down under the accumulation of duties, but Mrs. Sorabji was not ordinary. Her loving sympathy was extraordinarily active.

She was the most forward of educationalists, the most keen of Indian reformers, and the most earnest of Christian missionaries. Her work in the last department can never be measured; it lives in the hearts of many who looked to her for encouragement in various lines and who also received from her a help in their religious life such as they would not take from anyone else.

When out driving, the writer has frequently seen her stop the carriage, that she might speak to some Parsee student or Brahman woman. After a few general words of enquiry about friends—and she seemed to know the whole family history of each one, so kind was she in her thought—she would speak some loving word of enquiry about the soul's condition. It was spoken in such manifest sincerity that not the slightest offence could be taken; and the cordial "Good-bye, Mother" at the close would show that a deep feeling had been aroused.

A strong personality has departed from us. A loving mother-heart which reached out and touched all who came near, has stopped its beating. Upon whom will the "mantle" of "Mother Sorabji" fall? May there be many, who, reading of her faithful, efficient life, shall say, "I want to be like her."

The grandest work that can be singled out is the rearing of her seven brilliantly intelligent daughters and one son. In addition to this family of remarakable powers, countless others outside her immediate home rise up and call her blessed. While they mourn the loss of a mother whose going makes this world seem lonely, they can look forward to the heavenly home which by her presence will seem more lovely.—Life and Light.

LETTER FROM MR. HEININGER.

Kalgan, China,
Feb. 16, 1911.

Dear Friends:—Probably many of you have long before this heard of the plague which has been raging in parts of China. For a month now we have been having more or less excitement over the plague news. The excitement has been more or less according as the word has been more gloomy or more hopeful. We are still in the midst of the uncertainty though we have had time to think things over and get our bearings.

So far we have been as far as we know free from the plague here in Kalgan. Two suspicious cases have come to our attention. Two weeks ago two Mongols in the employ of Mr. Larson of the British and Foreign Bible Society reported the death on the street of a Chinaman with symptoms similar to the plague. A week later Mrs. Heininger and I saw a man stricken in the street. Because of the violent nanature of the contagion fearing it was plague we did not stop to make very exact inquiries of the by-standers. Since then we have had no word but there is no way of learning of isolated cases here. Of course should there be an epidemic the news would surely reach us. So far the plague has not reached us and has only in a general way affected us. We have been a little more careful of where we went and have rather restricted our labors. Moreover there has been a good deal of uncertainty and we have met the trouble and the quarantine many times in our mind.

This plague has been raging in Manchuria, the northeastern part of China and really not a part of "China Proper" but the territory from which the reigning family in China comes and so united under the same rule as China. Over seven thousand have already lost their lives in that region from this disease including two foreign and several native physicians who gave their lives in an effort to stamp it out. On the whole the Chinese government has been quite aggressive in their efforts to stop the plague. They have invited the co-operation of the missionary physicians and of the foreign officials. The disease, however, has spread to several places in the province of Shantung and to Tientsin, Paotingfu and Peking in this province. However it has not as far as I have learned reached great proportions in any of these places.

In Peking the authorities have been especially vigilant even burning down the houses where there have been plague cases. Outside of this place though the officials are many of them indifferent and careless about the danger. We have been unable to learn much through the officials here and they seem to be quite certain that no such harm could come here. We are closer to Manchuria than some other places which have had cases of the plague but the direct road is very mountainous and so there is practically no direct intercourse. If the plague should gain a foothold in the cities to the south of us we are almost certain of its reaching here for the railroad makes intercourse easy. However we pray that this city may be spared and that the peril may be checked all through the land.

The plague is very violent—practically no one gets well from it. So the only hope is in avoiding it. Death often follows in a few hours after a person is stricken or at most in a few days, though there are several days between the time when a person is exposed to the contagion and the time when the first symptoms are disclosed.

There have been several things to keep us busy during this time The work has been going on much as usual save the interruption which a Chinese New Years' festivities brings. However a heavy snow made this year's callers rather few. Of course our studies occupy the most of our time.

The church papers have been having some things to say about the missionary work and the recommendations of the Japan missionaries. In regard to one matter it might be well for me to explain my position. The Board of Foreign Missions referred to my letter in which I offered myself to them for work in China if they desired to follow the suggestions of the missionaries in Japan. The Board declares their willingness to employ me if I care to work in Japan instead of China. Perhaps some may not understand why we have not ere this accepted that offer. It is not because we feel a call to China rather than to Japan or because we think that there is greater need of giving one nation the Gospel rather than another. There is no place like the mission field to make one realize that Christianity must conquer every nation and its messengers must seek out every sinful soul. Were I at home I would as soon accept an appointment to Japan as to China. But I am not at home. For fifteen months I have worked on a language which will be the vehicle to carry the Gospel to many millions of heathen and when I am beginning to be able to use it I do not feel at liberty to withdraw from this work and go to a land where I will have to begin at the bottom again. Any man sent out from America could be ready for service in Japan about as soon as I could. So it is not a question of the field but of the circumstances in which I am placed. Of course word from the W. F. M. S. that they can not carry out their plan to enter China will mean that the situation is different. We have no such word as yet. The answer that the members of the auxiliaries give to that question by their gifts is more powerful than any word that can be said here. If the W. F. M. S. wants Methodist Protestant missionaries preaching the Gospel in China there must be the larger giving which the larger work demands. In a certain sense we can say the Methodist Protestant Church is in the very opposite position from myself and wife in regard to the choice between these fields. The church is in Japan and has its claims which have been growing during these thirty years of service. Of course we feel that the W. F. M. S. is in China too. For have they not sent us out? Are their promises to us not equally sacred and binding? Few of you who have not thought upon these problems know what some of these decisions of the next meeting of the Board will mean to the work. May every one pray earnestly that the officers and all the rest of us who must help decide these momentous questions as regards the future of our foreign work,—may all pray that we may be led of God in these decisions. The colleges of the church and the unevangelized at home have their claims upon your support but where is there so vast a claim as that of the unevangelized millions of these lands upon the Christian nations? What will the W. F. M. S. do about the two million here at our door in China whom no one else is looking after? And you, reader, answer by your support of the work.

Yours for Christ,
Chas. S. Heininger.

WRITE A LETTER TO MOTHER.

If every man and woman in America who is separated from an aged mother would sit down and write her a long, intimate letter tonight, what joy there would be when the postmen deliverd those missives!

It is so easy for busy, tired men and women to forget the anxiety with which venerable parents await delayed messages from their children.

Wanderers over the face of the earth often fail to recognize the pain they cause a loving mother by failure to write her a cheerful letter.

No cruelty is greater than that of the boy who fails to write his mother a weekly letter.

Newspaper officers, police headquarters and city officials are showered with heartbreaking enquiries from mothers who seek information about their absent sons.

They invariably say: "He is a good boy."

Pathetic excuses are offered for his failure to write.

The mother says he must be ill, or possibly may have been killed.

Sitting in her lonely home, the aged parent hopelessly turns to strangers for news of the son, who should have kept her fully advised of his movements.

The best Valentine any man can entrust to Uncle Sam is a long letter to his mother, telling of his successes and his failures, his hopes and fears, and, above all, reassuring her of his love and affection.

She doesn't care for a fancy card. Cupid and all his endearments have become a part of her life, and are embodied in the children she has loved, nurtured and sent prayerfully into life's battle.

Write mother a letter. Put your heart into it. Tell her your innermost secrets. Encourage all your friends to do likewise, and you will carry sunshine into lives which are moving swiftly toward the shadows cast by the setting sun.—Nashville Tennesseean.

Mt. Pleasant.

Bro. P. E. Parker, the M. E. pastor, was with us last Sunday and delivered an excellent sermon. Our Sunday School is getting along very well; there were 41 present last Sunday. We hope to add many more.

Bro. J. R. Stone will give an egg hunt for the benefit of the church at Mt. Pleasant on Easter Monday evening at three o'clock. The public cordially invited to be present.

Much success to the Herald and its readers.

Reporter.

Mt. Pleasant, Uwharrie Ct.

It is a great pleasure to me to read the reports from the churches. Our S. S. is improving; we had two new scholars today. We hope to have more in the future. Our attendance today was 43.

I want to thank the Lord for sending our worthy pastor, Bro. Joel Trogdon, among us, a man full of the Holy Spirit. I am glad our former pastor, T. A. Plyler, has got to a good home.

G. F. Cashatt.

Friendship, Haw River Circuit.

We had prayermeeting fourth Sunday at eleven; good attendance, and a good service. All seemed to enjoy it very much. We organized Sunday School on that day. It began the first Sunday. There were about 42 present. Mr. W. H. Chilcutt and Mrs. Stanfield have been sick; they are better. We were glad Mr. Chilcutt was able to be with us on Sunday in Sunday School. There will be preaching next Saturday at eleven and conference in the afternoon. Sunday is our regular preaching day. We hope to have a large congregation.

Denton.

Yesterday was a fine day for us; two hundred out to hear our pastor. He told us our Father's business and how we should obey our Father like the little maid of Samaria, point out the leprosy Healer. We are of the opinion that this leper did not wait for any persuasion at all, although when he arrived face to face the bidding seemed too simple. Another good word was spoken by his servant. The night service was also a success; 2 professed faith and were saved. 13 joined our church. Mr. J. A. Tucker comes to us from the M. E. Church. May the choice he made prove a blessing to himself and the company he has chosen.

There wer 64 present in S. S.

We are still nursing our dislocated shoulder; seems to be very stubborn, especially at night. Hope to regain strength early.

Our pastor expects to hold services tonight and probably for several in enough interest is shown.

Commencement proper, May 19th. Mr. Editor, your presence desired at Denton High School.

(The editor appreciates this kind invitation, but fears it will be impossible to accept it).

From Virginia

In 1907 Mr. George H. Leary was serving this work as pastor. In May he had a forged check cashed in Richmond of fifty dollars, and went to San Francisco, leaving his family at Emporia. He had not sent or come for them. Some time ago his wife went to bed with a severe headache, and never knew anything else. A lady there went to see about her, and found her unconscious. They wired him of her illness: he responded he did not have money to come with. He was running in town as engineer. The good ladies there in town went and bought shoes and clothes and put on her little children and made arrangements to send them to the orphanage after her death. But he came and took them away. The people did not think he ought to be allowed to have them after such neglect. They had one girl and she had married since he went away and is living in N. C. When he and children met at train they did not know each other; children had grown, he had been gone for nearly four years. When he went away he had two boys employed there in a factory in town, one of which was very small. Three small ones and the girl. The youngest two I am sure are under seven years of age. At the time of her death three of the children had employment. Soon after he left them the people in town sent her a supply of groceries with a command to go to her people where she came from. Her reply was she didn't want to go.

His first two years over here he lived by the writer. Seemingly there was not ever a kinder man to his family than he was and they all seemed so devoted to him and his wife would speak so nicely of him. But he exhausted his credit up here and moved to a new community. In one year he did the same there and moved to Emporia. But his reputation was there first, so he did not meet with credit luck as before. He put his two oldest children to work and in May left to try an unknown country leaving this poor woman and children who ever since had been objects of pity. The man who cashed the check for him in Richmond came on to Emporia and she made arrangements at factory. Each month a certain portion of their earnings should be sent him of which I think he lost something on the amount to help her. Why he had not ever sent for them or came before has been one of the great mysteries of my life. While Mr. Fogleman was on this work, he wrote to him to come after his people. What could life be for me to be separated in a distant country from my family even surrounded with more of this world's goods than a life could consume. Poor children! they will so much miss mother as there is no love so great as mother's. I truly hope when her life ended, she entered into the heavenly joys of which earth has no sorrows that heaven cannot cure, for surely, she had her share here.

A Tribute of Respect.

On Saturday morning, April the first, at five o'clock, the death angel visited the home of our beloved Pastor, J. E. McSwain and claimed for his victim his dearly beloved wife, Sister Mc.Swain. She had been in bad health for quite a while, but never gave up till Friday evening, and Saturday morning she fell asleep, and went home to live with Jesus. She was a devoted wife and mother and would always greet you with a sunny smile, and make you feel a cordial welcome to her home. She leaves to mourn their loss a husband, two children, father, mother, three brothers and two sisters, a host of friends and relatives. May God bless and comfort the broken hearted husband and help him to realize that our loss is her eternal gain. It is so hard to give up our loved ones, but still we know God doeth all things well. Her remains were carried to Gastonia, N. C., and laid away to await the resurrection morn. May God comfort the bereaved family.

Died at Her Home.

Mrs. Sallie Norman Smitherman was born Nov. 12, 1855; departed this life March 29th, 1911. She was married to David Smitherman Dec. 6, 1855. Their union was blessed with 8 sons and 4 daughters, all living to mourn their loss except two sons. She has been a member of the M. P. Church at Baltimore for a number of years. She was a kind and loving mother, and a good neighbor and was loved by all who knew her.

She said time after time during her sickness that she was willing to go any time the Lord should call her. We believe that she died in the faith she had professed. While she will be missed especially by the children, we realize earth's loss is heaven's gain. May the Lord bless the bereaved ones and may we all live such lives that we too can say when death comes, I have fought a good fight, and am now ready to go.

THE COUNTRY MINISTER.

"I wonder if we estimate aright the noble sacrifice, the pluck and endurance of those Christian ministers who preach to scattered flocks in the country places. We know how great is the strain upon the vitality made by the demands of a city parish. The pastor of a city church ministering to crowded congregations twice a Sabbath, at the call of outside functions, visiting the sick, fulfilling obligations, furthering civic reform, and doing to the utmost of his capacity the work of the Lord, wears out and sometimes drops in the meridian of his power. Yet the tasks laid upon him are not more excessive nor is his life more strenuous than that of the man up-country, who preaches. it may be, to several different congregations, visiting the sick, burying the dead, responding to every call for help in a circuit of 30 or 40 miles, when the weather is inclement and the temperature a little above zero,. Rain or shine, cold or hot, he must be there, and be on time, let the roads be as they may,—ten miles between appointments. Such a man may easily travel in the teeth of a blizzard sixty or seventy miles a week in winter, in the performance of a single duty. His heroism is noted by the recording angel, although in the quiet austerity of his life he never regards himself as in the least extraordinary. The salary of the country minister may be any sum between $200 and $600 a year, with the usual condition, let us hope, of a house and a bit of garden. From the homes of country ministers have emerged men and women who have reached the front rank in scholarship and influence. The country manse sends out its sons and daughters early inured to self-denial and early accustomed to plain living and high thinking. They become explorers, professors, doctors, lawyers, editors, governors, ministers and sometimes merchant princes. A country pastor, talking with me a year or two ago, said that from his quiet parish he is annually sending to the nearest large city young people who carry away from the home church and Sunday school preparation to resist the tempter and his wiles, while in brains, physical health, and courage they were fitted to forge ahead and become leaders. He pointed with justifiable pride to the success of those who had already started from his parish to find employment and preferment in the places they sought in town." I have preached long enough and lived to see many men and women now leaders and holding high and responsible positions, I preached to when they were little boys and girls. It fires my zeal too. "The country minister burning his steady light for Christ and humanity, is in the advance guard of those who shall make the future strong and splendid. He puts himself behind his work, he asks neither fame nor praise nor money. His feeling is that it is enough for him to follow in the footsteps of his Lord, though the pathway may be rough and the feet may bleed." "It is the way the Master went; shall not the servant tread it too?" "Do you realize the value of a good pastor? Though a great deal of useful work is accomplished by other agencies, the churches are now, as they have ever been for generations, the greatest factor for good in a community. The ministers are the directors of their activities, The generals and commanders of the forces that make for righteousness. In every good word and work they are foremost. An able, earnest pastor is a valuable asset to the community at large, as well as to his own church. He is a builder and is more valuable than factories or even than schools, and just as the loss of a good pastor to a community, is a calamity, so the coming of a new minister brings a new force for good into the community. Righteousness exalteth a nation, but unrighteousness is a reproach to any people. There is nothing so costly, nothing so wasteful, as immorality. We pay the bills in jails, hospitals, and crimes of a thousand kinds, in ruined lives, in the transfiguration of men and women who should be an asset to the community into a heavy burden. A good pastor is a substantial acquisition to the forces that are fighting for the upbuilding of the community, that must fight continually in order to preserve it from the constant menace of evil. The fight goes on, as one brave soldier falls another steps into the rank to take his place. Now do we really appreciate the good pastor and his work and influence? Or do we feel that he is a charitable subject, who must be supported by the community? His value many times is never felt till he is gone. Let me say, stand by him, help him, and make him feel his welcome.

C. E. TOPIC FOR APRIL 16—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

(The Resurrection, Rom. 6: 1-14).

(Easter Meeting).

The Scripture: Have one to read or recite and another to comment. This is a most beautiful passage and ought to yield a helpful commentary.

The Leader: The only death is sin. The only tomb of the soul is sin. A man may be alive and still in a sepulcher. He may be dead physically and yet live spiritually. It is possible for us to be dead to sin and alive to Christ in this present life. As he rose from the dead, so can we by His help rise from our dead (sinful) selves to higher things. The Easter Season is appropriate for the observance of the greatest event in history, our Lord's resurrection; because as He came forth at this happy season, so does nature typify His forth-coming by re-robing herself in a new coat of green and scarlet and white and purple.

Special Work: Essays of 2 or 3 minutes each on such themes as: "The Origin of Easter;" 'How Best to Keep Easter;" "The Death That Is Life;" "Life That is Death:" "The Proofs of Christ's Resurrection."

Easter Poems: Have two or three short Easter poems recited.

Questions To Be Answered Voluntarily:

What is the real meaning of the Resurrection?

Of what does it assure us?

How does Easter remind us of it?

How does it remove the fear of death?

How can we have the Easter spirit ever with us?

What did Paul say of the Resurrection?

How is regeneration like the resurrection?

What did Christ say of the resurrection?

Why do sinners fear death?

Why should Christians not fear death?

Why should Easter be a joyful season?

What is it to be "dead in sins?"

What is it to be "hid with Christ in God?"

Account of Christ's Resurrection: A beautiful closing exercise would be the reading from one of the gospel narratives the account of the Resurrection of Jesus.

Scripture Verses: Under such words as "death, grave dead, sin, make alive, nature," an abundance of appropriate verses can be had by consulting the concordance.

THE POWER OF TRIFLES.

A few years ago the Grand Trunk flyer going East was in hard luck, says the Ottawa Citizen. At Napance the steam box on the big engine got overworked, or something, and refused to continue the journey. The timely arrival of a freight train helped. The cars were shunted to a siding and the freight engine brought into commission on the express, taking it as far as Brockville, when another large engine was secured.

Now comes the peculiar part of the trouble of the train. When about twenty miles out of Cornwall it ran into a sea of peculiar flies. There were millions of them—perhaps billions—but the train was going so fast it was impossible to count them.

The cars became quite dark as the train ploughed through the mass of insects and then the train came to another sudden stop. The engine was full of flies. The little things were ground into a mass in the driving rod. They were in everything on the engine.

The train had been ploughing through the flies at a mile a minute for several miles. The track was covered with crushed insects and the engine wheels balked at going round on it. After a little persuasion and a lot of cleaning up the train went upon its way again.

On arrival at Montreal the engine presented a truly curious spectacle. The bars of the cowcatcher were filled right up with flies. On the front of the engine they were several inches thick."

A few flies would have made no impression on that flyer of an express, but the many brought it to a standstill. I have sometimes wondered what the combined efforts of God's people in any given city would accomplish! Many an express train of sin and iniquity would be stopped. The combined shout of the Israelites brought down the walls of Jericho (Joshua); the united prayers of the early Church secured the outpouring of the Holy Spirit; the four "togethers" of Ezra accomplished the service of the Lord; the persistent and united action of the builders under Nehemiah succeeded in building the wall.

THE ORIGIN OF THE MISSION BAND.

The idea of setting the children to work for missions originated with Mrs. Samuel E. Warner of the Woman's Missionary Union in the year 1861. Six years later there were one hundred mission bands scattered throughout the country. In six or seven years more the number had increased to two hundred and seventy, in twenty States of the Union, and in one hundred and twenty-five cities and towns.

WELCOME TO CHINESE STUDENTS.

Early in September a special train left San Francisco bearing seventy-five of the choisest students of the Chinese Empire, sent here by the government to begin their course of training in American universities. When they landed in San Francisco they were welcomed by a joint committee of Chinese and American students representing the Young Men's Christian Association. For three days they were shown the sights of the city. Fifty of them attended church on Sunday. When they took their train eastward they found copies of recent magazines, baskets of fruit, catalogues of the great universities. In many cities the Y. M. C. A. had arranged services of welcome for the party. Christians are asked to pray for the conversion of these picked men to Christianity.

THE FAITHFUL SUPERINTENDENT.

We took occasion to write in these columns recently of the great and good work many faithful Sunday-school superintendents were doing without reward and without any thought of reward. They labor through the years, attending their schools promptly and regularly winter and summer, and often in face of depressing circumstances and with disadvantages and discouragements facing them in their work.

When the lines were written we were wondering if there were not such superintendents amongst us, and we have now before us the testimony of one such superintendent." "I am writing this," runs the letter, "to assure you that at least one humble superintendent has been encouraged by your article in The Sun on 'The Faithful Superintendents.' I am one of them who does not know all there is in the books and does not always have time to prepare the lesson as I would like. I have to face all the problems mentioned and many more. I know I am not big enough for the position and I often feel like I want to get out for fear I may stand in the way of progress. But such words encourage me to press on, and do the best I can. I believe the preachers do not know how much good it does us poor unlearned, uncultured church workers to know that they appreciate our feeble efforts.

I have been Superintendent of a large country school for five years. I believe I see great possibilities in the work, if they only had a bigger leader. I ask you to pray God to send one to take the place and do the work that I know well enough needs to be done."

Out of such a spirit as that God develops wonders in our Sunday-school work, and blesses with His approval the faithful ones who toil and labor without reward or the hope of reward, for the advancement of His kingdom.

It is not the amount of learning, the amount of culture, the amount of scholarship we carry into a work that measures the success of it, but it is the amount of loving loyalty, devoted energy and consecrated effort we carry into it that God uses and will use to bless, increase and multiply.

Again we say, God bless the many faithful Sunday-school superintendents, who, hurried and burdened with their affairs all the week, take some of their time and thought for the great work laid upon them and who without reward or even thought of reward go to their schools every Sunday to do and to give the best they have and know and can.

THERE'S A CALL IN THE AIR.

There's a field that is wide and a harvest that's white;
There's a noonday that's swiftly passing to night
And the harvest is wasting, for the reapers are few,
And the Lord of the harvest is calling for you.
There's a cross and a crown and a grave rent in twain;
There's a Victor o'er death who forever shall reign.
And He giveth the crown if the cross you will bear,
He'll pilot you safe through the Valley of Fear.
There's a call in the air, and it comes from afar;
There's a message of peace and a gate left ajar.
And the call is for workers—for you and for me—
And the message is, "Come," for salvation is free.

—The hearing against coca cola in federal court at Chattanooga, Tenn., is still on. One physician of Atlanta testified that he had examined 7,000 school children and had found only 26 who suffered from nervous diseases. He said that he spent from 15 to 20 minutes in examining each one. When confronted with the figures showing it would require the work of a doctor ten hours a day working 233 days to do that, he modified and said the examination required from 2 to 5 minutes to the child. After that one would like to know really how many children that doctor had examined.

Enough has been shown in the hearing, which ever way the verdict may be rendered, to prove the hurtful and dangerous effect of coca cola, and already the sales have greatly fallen off. People are entitled to know the nature of the stuff they drink, and the coca cola investigation is helping in that direction.

—H. W. Kohlsaat, pubisher of the Chicago Record-Herald testified to the Senate investigating committee at Springfield, Ill., last week that he knew $100,000 had been used to procure the election of Lorimer to the United States Senate, but would not give his source of information.

NOTES.

Mr. Bradshaw's Solution.—From the mid-points of the sides of the triangle, draw vertical lines meeting horizontal lines from the midpoints of the shorter sides of the rectangle. These cut off two of the eight parts required. Connect the vertices of the two angles formed with the mid-point of the lower base, cutting off two more parts. Connect this point with the vertex of the triangle, and the other four parts will appear. It is easy to prove all the eight parts equal.

—The long dead-lock in the New York legislature has been broken and James O'Gorman has been elected United States Senator to succeed Chancey M. Depew.

—James Tillman, ex-Lieutenant Governor of South Carolina who notoriously shot to death Editor Gonzales of Columbia a few years since, died of tuberculosis at Asheville, N. C., April 1.

—Jack Johnson, the colored pugilist is serving time in a California prison. He is the "hero" that much of the country went wild over when he knocked pugilist Jeffries out. Our observation is that professional pugilists are a sorry lot.

—The massive and costly State capitol of New York at Albany was well nigh destroyed by fire March 29 and damaged to the extent of $5,000,000, besides the great loss of valuable State papers and documents.

—The Champion Lumber Co., of New York, capitalized at $5,000,000 bought more than 100,00 acres of timber lands and two railroads in Western North Carolina last week. The property is in Haywood County.

—John C. Brown, of Efland, died at St. Leo's Hospital last night. His back had been broken by a falling tree.

—The Clymer Machine Works has made a cotton chopper and cultivator invented by R. L. Hartsell, of Smith's Ford, for which the claim is made that it will do the work of seven men. It will be drawn by two horses and operated by one man.

—The Speaks case is on for trial now in Guilford Superior Court.

Avent.—I want to join Bro. Williams in a word regarding Bro. T. V. Avent of Nash County. I was my privilege to be his pastor for two years just previous to his death. I can truly say of him, "A good man in Israel has fallen." He was a friend to his pastor, a ready supporter of his church, a highly respected citizen, a kind neighbor and a most devoted father and husband. His devotion to his wife, who preceded him to the good world, was touchingly beautiful. His death is the earthly end of a useful and good life, but the beginning of a larger and more blessed existence unhindered by sin and known limitations. And so we may say of him,

"His day has come, not gone;
His sun has risen, not set;
His life is now beyond
The reach of death and change,
Not ended—but begun.

May the benedictions of his spirit linger lastingly with his children and the uprightness of his life be an inspiration and comfort to them.

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary. (G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass.) surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built. The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers, under the supervision of Dr. W. T. Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reenforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonyms, pronunciation, have received unsparing scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fullness and clearness. In size of vocabulary, in richness of general information, and in convenience of consultation, the book sets a new mark in lexicography.

—"One thing is stale in this country," says Governor Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, "and that is the making of money. One thing is not stale, and that is, the task of the lifter. All that is worth while in life is the spending of one's self for the good of others." This is good doctrine, and sounds strangely like a twentieth century echo of the Sermon on the Mount.—Exchange.

THE BRANCH MEETING—AN INVITATION FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The coming session of the Woman's Foreign Missionary of our church to be held in Greensboro April 20-21, promises to be the best the Branch has ever held. This is very gratifying indeed. The officers are planning to make the meeting the most helpful and beneficial in results possible. We have a very carefully arranged program, and the Greensboro ladies are making every preparation necessary for the entertainment, convenience, and comfort of their guests while in Greensboro. We expect a large delegation. Indeed we are hoping for representation from the churches throughout the Conference whether they have a foreign missionary society or not. We invite every one who is interested in this great work to come to this meeting and learn what has been done and what can and ought to be done.

If you are not interested or even if you are opposed to the organization, come to this Convention and let's talk it over. If you can convince us that we are wrong we will frankly acknowledge it, get on our knees, ask the Lord to forgive us and quit. If we can show you that you are wrong all we ask is for you to get on your knees, ask the Lord to forgive you and begin. Most sincerely,

Mrs. A. G. Dixon.

EASTER.

We celebrate Easter often without duly appreciating the mighty event to which it points—the resurrection of Jesus. This event is fundamental to our faith as Christians. If Christ be not risen, we are yet in our sins and without hope of deliverance. Death, darkness, and despair await us. Take from us our belief in Christ's resurrection, and you rob us of hope of any desirable immortality.

This Easter, let us think of the priceless value of a faith based on Christ's resurrection and Christ's promises. Let no one rob us of this faith. Let no one take from us our Christ. He is risen indeed. He is alive forevermore, and because He lives we shall live also. Bless His Holy Name!

THE MARYLAND CONFERENCE.

This largest Conference of our denomination had its annual session last week, in Federalsburg, Md. Its meeting is always on occasion of interest.

Rev. J. M. Sheridan was re-elected president, this being his fourth year, we believe,—a compliment of which he is worthy.

Dr. Lewis, by unanimous request, made a statement regarding the negotiations for church union. The editor of the Methodist Protestant thinks this was out of order, as no final agreement has been reached by the commissions as to a basis of union. (It seems to us, however, that it would not be good policy to go on and submit a plan that would be rejected. It is better for the commissioners to know as well as they can what the churches would expect and demand. A serious division might result otherwise.)

The Conference adopted the following report on Moral Reform:

"The increasing violations of the sanctity of the Sabbath are justly arousing Christian people to inaugurate measures to preserve and protect it against heartless commercialism and godless pleasure seekers. In our cities and towns there is a growing tendency to open shops, stores, saloons and places of amusement, under all sorts of pretexts, in utter disregard of all Sabbath laws, and all Christian sentiment. In our national capital the disregard of the Sabbath day is coming to be a national shame. Hundreds of shops, stores, moving picture shows and theatres are in full blast, enticing the young, catering to the pleasure seeking crowds, and to the intemperate, the debauched, and the idle classes, and neutralizing the efforts of all the moral and religious forces of the church and community. We, therefore, heartily endorse the effort of the Lord's Day Alliance to promote the better observance of the Sabbath, and commend the organization to our people throughout the Conference District."

A NEW ARRIVAL.

There has just come to our office a thing from which we expect a great deal of service, though thus far it has given none, but required a great deal. It is a new Model 5 Lino-type Machine! Soon it will begin to "put in," and the Herald will be better, we trust, and some day larger because of its coming. At any rate, we gladly welcome it, with all its 2,500 pounds of metal and its many hundred parts.

—Bro. J. F. Gerringer, of Lexington, and Miss Lela Ward, of Gibsonville, were married at the home of Mrs. Allred, Miss Ward's aunt, in Greensboro, on Friday night of last week, the Herald's editor officiating. We wish them much happiness.

No questions and no answers received this week. We fear we have been going too fast to become interested in details. Shall we go more slowly through Deuteronomy? Let us try for next lesson the first twelve chapters.

DO YOU WANT LIFE?

Some people are always expressing a desire to live and are afraid to die. They are doing all they can to make the body live and lose sight of the fact they have a soul already perishing for life. If you love life, and truly want to live forever and ever, you can have it by drinking at the Eternal fountain, but as long as you drink at the poisoned pools of this world you can never satisfy your thirst for life, but drink death in every drop.

SNARES.

The other day I saw a frightened bird fly into a wire net that was placed in the yard. The bird's bill was securely fastened in the net, which prevented it from making its escape. At the first sight of the bird's entanglement, I went to rescue it. But before I could place my hand on it, the bird had torn its bill almost off. Taking the bird out of the trap, which proved fatal, I thought how much like this we find along the way. Open snares stand out on every side to catch us as we pass. Have you ever stopped to think of the nets along the way to catch the youth of this age. The saloon, the near beer joints, the card table, the social cup, popularity of profanity, and many other things stand out ready to swallow up the innocent boys as they leave the tender care of mother and father. "Watch," should be the slogan of the young man of today. Lives that were caught in some of Satan's nets are all around us. How pitiful they look! When a young man gives over to vice and sin, the pleasant smiles of his boyish face soon dissapear. A few wrinkles soon play upon his brow and he meets his friends with an ugly face and countenance. The heart is first seen in the face of a man which is a true index to his soul. There is always an escape from the snares. But too late is often the result.

BIBLE IMAGERY.

Some books of the Bible abound in rich imagery; but any physical likeness of God is forbidden. One of the offensive things in some modern pictures, even in many church buildings, is the image of the being the worshippers adore as God.

The imagery of the Scriptures is sometimes exceedingly beautiful.

Christ is likened to a Lamb slain; or to the Lion of the tribe of Judah. He walks among the golden candlesticks arrayed in beauty.

The pastors, or ministers of the seven churches, are likened to stars.

The seven churches are seven candlesticks.

The general church is likened to a woman clothed with the sun, the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars. It is also likened to Jerusalem, the city.

Paganism is likened to a dragon.

The boss of a false religion, or a perverted true religion, is likened to a beast, a leopard (in derision of religious regalia).

The false church is likened to a harlot, and Babylon.

Salvation is likened to a river of life, or to a tree of life.

Our election is signified by a "white stone."

In the book of Revelation the style is bold, the imagery celestial, and the theology heavenly. It treats of heaven and worlds eternal. Those who scorn the book because their own minds do not "run on" the things of heaven are of the earth, earthy. The book treats of God, the Savior, the redeemed who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, the great and triumphant battle with sin, and the tremendous privileges of the righteous. The subject is one that interests all great minds: for there is nothing that so lays hold on human attention as the attaining to moral or spiritual worthiness.

Ministers of the gospel cannot hold their congregations by philosophising on ethics, or discussing with formidable logic and expressing, questions of what is right and wrong. That is a small matter compared with putting a man, the man himself, into a condition of worthiness. Enable a man to get into a right relation to God, make him a right man, and he will determine for himself the right thing.

The Bible is the book that does this, if the reader submits to it. Oppose it, and you lose the instincts of right and wrong. Oppose it, and you turn to sin; temptation becoming too strong for you.

The book of Revelation is one that saturates the devout reader with a sense of divinity. Its imagery comes from familiarity with spiritual thoughts. The physical is instinctively translated into the spiritual; the material objects becoming figures of the immaterial. Thoughts become bold, without irreverence. The reader becomes a seer himself, and sees.

The book of Revelation was written by the hand of an expert in righteousness, and he is unwise who discards its study because of the difficulty. The greatest study of man is righteousness; not merely questions of right and wrong. For they have been discussed for thousands and thousands of years, even from the beginning. The question, the question of most tremendous significance and thrilling interest is, how to become righteous. The imagery of the book of Revelation helps solve that problem. The preacher that helps make men good men secures the congregations.

TWO VISITORS.

This morning an elderly gentleman, perhaps seventy, came to the office where I was at work. He told me his name, and I gave him a seat. His conversation was on wicked things and expressed with wicked words. His conversation soon told me that his life had been spent in sin. The hard expessions on his face told the sad story of his heart, while his feebleness pointed to his short time to spend here.. The bloom and vigor of his life spent for satan and in the pleasures (?) of sin. Still the God of mercy and love is calling:

"Come home, come home;
Poor sinner, come home."

What a great Savior we have, when He is willing to take the fragments of our lives, fit and prepare them for the holy courts of His Father's house. We have been great sinners, but we have a great Saviro to carry our sins to.

But peculiar as it was, within an hour or so from the old man's departure, another elderly man came in. He was treated as the first. But his conversation was of a different tone and on a different subject. Although as old as the first he wore a sunny face and his smiles were like those of a child. My talk with him soon led me to the fact that his life had been given to the Master at an early age, and he had lived in sweet fellowship with Him who is able to save and keep. Both of these men living in the same community, always followed the same occupation. Some inquiry gave me the information that each man's children had led the same lives as their father.

Young men, as we start out on life's journey, let's stop to think how the end will be. Stop to give our lives to Him who saves from sin.

"My soul is happy in Jesus,
For He is precious to me;
His voice it is music to hear it,
His face it is heaven to see."

A GOLDEN TIME.

Three shall come from out this noise of strife and groaning
A broader and a juster brotherhood;..
A deep equality of aim postponing
All selfish seeking to the general good.
There shall come a time when each shall to another
Be as Christ would have him—brother unto brother.
There shall come a time when brotherhood grows stronger
Than the narrow bounds which now distract the world;
When the cannons hoar and the trumpets blare no longer,
And the ironclad rusts, the battle flags are furled;
When the bars of speech and creed and race which sever
Shall be fused in one humanity forever.

—Sir Lewis Morris.

WORKING TOGETHER

If the work of the Lord in any community could be done by one man independent of every other person and despite all the opposition all others might raise there, then there would be no need to make an appeal for cooperation. But as it is no work however small can be done by any individual without some sympathetic co-operation of those around. One can really pray better insilence in the midst of those who are in sympathy with such conduct than with those who are opposed to it. Now when it comes to engaging in some enterprise for the Lord we need the hearty support and sympathetic co-operation of all others who profess to have an interest in such work. "There's no time for idle scorning" nor for unkind criticisms, nor for holier than thou attitudes, nor political policies in the work of God these days. The work is great and time is precious, life is passing, character is shaping and destiny is being sealed as our months are flowing into years.

While many of our middle aged and older people are playing like children their golden hours are fast disappearing and the opportunity to save their own and another's soul is gone. The big boy problem may be a big problem in the Sunday school but there's a bigger in many of our communities, and that is the problem of getting that big boy's daddy to do some real, definite service for God. And I am one who believes that when we can get the older heads to planning for Christ, the younger ones will furnish the brawn and enthusiasm for the job. The kingdom of God is large in the field of its operations, there are many departments and quite a complexity of affairs furnishing so many different tasks and affording work for all kinds of talents. It is therefore not to be expected that either male or female, old or young alone should do all the work. Neither is it to be required that one man or woman be proficient in doing the work of every department, but let a man find his work and having found it do it with his might. And as the companions of Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall around about Jerusalem labored, let us build before our own door. And too, let us so plan and build that all of our work will fit perfectly.

The work of God in the world is the salvation of the world, which work He has committed to men's hands, therefore he who saves one soul from sin is doing the work of God, it matters not how he did it. Whether by sermon, or song, a kind word, a small gift, a look of love or a rebuke uttered in season, by visiting the needy and the sick, or by always living a godly life before men. Let no man despise his reward, neither let him forget that he has a part with every other good man in saving the world. Magnify your opportunity and your work. Always remembering that we are laborers together with God.—Rev. R. M. Andrews in Vance Methodist Protestant.

HOW GOD USED A PICTURE.

The Conversion of Kamamizu Matsutaro.

In the September issue of The Missionary Tidings, Rev. A. Youngren, of Osaka, Japan, tells the remarkable story of the conversion of a man who, twice convicted of theft, was undergoing sentence of penal servitude for life, doing service in the mines of Hokaido with other prisoners, who spent in drink and gambling all that was allowed them as wages. From Mr. Youngren's narrative we extract the following:

One day when he returned from work he noticed two or three fellow-prisoners looking closely at a picture. He approached them and for the first time in his life saw the picture of the crucifixion of Christ. With scorn he asked what kind of a crime that man had committed. One of the men having more or less knowledge of the story of the Cross, replied that this was the Son of God, the Savior of the world, and that He died thus, not for any crime of His own but for the crimes of other men. This appealed to him as ridiculous; but again his exponent proceeded to show that if this person wasn't what He declared Himself to be, He died in behalf of a lie. and he challenged the scorner to show that any man, good, bad or indifferent, had ever died in behalf of a lie. Men, said he, will lie to cover up crime, but no one will deliberately tell a lie for the sake of obtaining penalty and that of the severest kind. This pointed argument was too much for him, and inside of ten minutes he not only believed the story, but also experienced a real change of heart, according to his own testimony. He immediately secured a Bible, to the great surprise of the prison authorities. He began to study the Scriptures and learned that a Christian must not drink "sake." True to the light received he gave up the habit, and as a result was healed of an internal disease caused by strong drink.

At this time he was transferred to another prison, where he met many of his old acqaintances who almost forced him to drink "sake," but he refused.

An incident now occurred which helped to shape his future. While at work in the coal mine one day a voice in his soul whispered "Danger;" but as nothing around him appeared different from the scenes he had been accustomed to for years, he did not heed it. Then all at once he felt a strong hand pull him backword, when down came a rock which would have crushed the life out of him had he not been thus miraculously saved. He fell on his knees and gave thanks to God. Two similar insidents occurred at different times later.

He now received the conviction that God had a mission for him in the world, and although from a human point of view there was no hope of his ever realizing such pleasing dreams, yet he began to study his Bible with that in view. All his spare moments were put in at Bible study, insomuch that the official in charge one day jokingly remarked, "Well, Kamamizu, here you are studying your Bible again earnestly as if you intended to become a preacher." He replied that God had given him the conviction that some day he would be a free man and be permitted to tell the world the wonderful things that God had done for him, though he did not intend to become a preacher. The official in question now assumed a sober mien and in a friendly manner advised him to dismiss such hallucinations from his mind. "For," said he, "you expect an impossibility." He then reminded him that his sentence implied fourteen and one-half years above life penalty, and even if such an unlikely thing should happen as a pardon being granted him, yet he was deprived forever of his citizenship, and certain provisions of law made it impossible for him to address a public audience. This was sad news to him, yet he consoled himself that God could change the laws of Japan. This was actually done. A few months before he received his pardon the criminal code of Japan was changed so that all the privileges of citizenship are restored to pardoned felons.

Kamamizu learned his prayer-life amid adverse circumstances. He used to rise fifteen minutes earlier than the other prisoners and spend that time in silent prayer, but the official in charge sternly forbade him to do so. He replied that he must pray, even if it took his life, and the result was that he was punished by being ordered to stand barefooted in the snow fifteen minutes. He obeyed, and never had he experienced such joy as that which now filled his soul when he was permitted to suffer for Jesus' sake. The officials marvelled that he could feel happy under such circumstances, and from that time he received better treatment than the other prisoners.

He was now transferred to the Tokaichi prison, which contained about one thousand inmates. The life among the prisoners here was wretched, and not a single one read the Bible. His heart was stirred and he began to pray for the conversion of four men with whom he came in contact. Finally two of them were saved, and he solicited them to join in daily prayer in behalf of a revival. This was in March and they continued until December, when his two companions became discouraged and gave it up. He still continued in desperate earnestness until February, and from that time a most marvelous work of grace was wrought among the prisoners, the result of which was the conversion of about six hundred of the inmates and not less than nine hundred attended Bible class regularly.—"The Missionary Witness."

NATURE STUDY.

This is the time of the year when this work may be commenced with advantage. The buds are beginning to put forth and grow. The peach and pear trees are in bloom and it will not be many days until the earth beneath our feet will be carpeted with beauty. The flowers will soon be found everywhere and such a world of study and investigation as will be spread out before us! The book of natural history will be opened wide and will call loudly for study and interpretation.

The Flowers.

What can we learn from them? Of what value may the teacher make them to the student? We study Latin and Greek. They are dead languages and they will remain dead forever. Higher and nobler languages have taken their place. But when we study the language of the flowers, we study the language of beauty. It is the voice of nature speaking to us in her varied tones of beauty and color. How many of us go through life without ever having heard this language. The simple things about us have never grasped us by their charm. We give attention to those subjects that will be of no value to us except the mental training we get from studying them and let the common things among which we move go without a moment's thought.

Their Lessons.

The first lesson we may learn from the study of Nature is the lesson of training in observation. Pupils' powers of observation need a thorough and constant training. We live in a world of beauty, but how dull it looks to some of us who have never been trained to see! The most delicate combinations of form and color are all about us. Beauty from its simplest form even to noblest sublimity is everywhere. Life, yes, every day of it, may be filled with the beautiful and the true, and no place need be given to the morose and ugly. But we as bungling teachers have failed to develop those powers of observation that we should develop in our pupils, and so they lead clouded lives, shadows fall athwart their pathway, the morose, morbid and distorted fill the lives and souls of men where joy and beauty should reign.

Their Names.

How many teachers, much less pupils in the public schools know the names of the common flowers about us? Perhaps we may find one of this class from time to time, but I fear the number is few. And yet their names are so easily learned. There are a number of manuals that are so simple that any person who reads carefully can understand. Among these I would mention Reed's Flower Guide to the Wild Flowers East of the Rockies and Dana's How to Know the Wild Flowers. The former of these gives some two hundred different kinds of flowers in their natural colors and also good descriptions. The latter gives a very large numebr of illustrations in black and white and very full descriptions and explanations. Any teacher with these books at hand can make flower study intensely interesting and profitable.

Uses of Flowers.

Do you ever have them in your school room to smile upon you when you would frown? Does a handful of violets ever grace your desk? Might not a little attention paid to God's beauties beautify the school room each day and add joy and happiness to the lives of teacher and pupils alike? Once there was a very naughty boy in school. His teachers could do nothing with him. He would not study and he was a constant source of annoyance. Teacher had followed teacher and all had tried to help the boy, but in vain.

What Happened.

Finally another teacher came. Her disposition was sweet and she had a kind heart. She was timid, and yet she was firm. They prophesied that she would stay but a few weeks at most. But she did stay. In one corner of the room she placed a little table and some cheap shelves. A few chairs and cushions were also placed there. Some lovely books were placed on the table and on the shelves. A copy of Raphael's Madonna was framed and hung upon the wall. The corner was called "The Beauty Corner." The children were encouraged to bring any inexpensive thing of beauty and place on the shelves and table of "The Beauty Corner." Flowers came in profusion. They were tastily arranged and the corner was indeed a thing of beauty. God's finger prints were there. His paintings in lily, rose, anemone, star flower, arbutus, and a hundred other flowers were lavished in abundance in "The Beauty Corner."

The Effect.

Soon a change was noticed in the characters of the boys and girls of the school. The teacher said little about what the children ought to do. But the manners of the children became softer, their dispositions sweeter, and they daily became more considerate. The bad boy who had been the terror of the neighborhood had also been brought under the spell of "The Beauty Corner." One day, after some weeks had passed, the teacher called this boy to "The Beauty Corner" and told him of how she had heard that he had formerly been so rude and asked what had brought about the wonderful change. Pointing to the flowers and the picture the boy exclaimed: "How can a feller be bad with all those things looking at him?" The Beauty Corner had done its work. The life of the wayward one had been appealed unto and touched by beauty and the dark and sinful had been driven out.

Have you a "Beauty Corner?"

Might not this idea help us as teachers to appeal to the deepest depths of a life covered with the follies of evil? No beauty can compare with the beauties of nature and of nature's works. And if we will soften the lives and characters of the pupils we teach by bringing them into contact with nature through and by means of nature study, how great a work will we be doing. Let the beauty corner idea find a place in the school room, in the work of the school, on the playground and everywhere.

SYSTEMATIC STINGINESS.

There has been so much said on the subject of liberality, that perhaps it would be well for us to take up the other side of the subject; for really there are more people who practice systematic stinginess than systematic giving or liberality. Giving is an annual practice if practiced at all. You have heard perhaps of "God's Annuals"—those who get religion at each August meeting. Well, sometimes they are more regular in their "getting it over again" than some who make sport of them are in giving for the keeping up of that which they have vowed to support.

Systematic in withholding, because it is a regular thing to withhold. Spasmodic in giving for this is done when everything is favorable. God's word says, "let every one of you lay by him in store on first day of week as God has prospered him," while systematic stinginess says, "let every one lay by him in store as God has prospered him and keep it by him as long as possible and only give it out when his honor as a member of the church is at stake." There are a number of people whose aeroplane seems to be pointed heavenward who seem to think that if some neighbor member has prospered more than they, that they should not pay any but let that one do it that has made the most out of his business. Very often the prosperous one pays for the stingy one and prospers more and the other never seems to have sense enough to see that his neighbor is being blessed because he honors God with his money. Then the man who pays is the one the stingy man talks about and says he tries to run the church, has no religion and didn't get his money honestly. The fact of the business is one prospering by his liberality, the other is dying of systematic stinginess. He talks of heaven and heavenly joys, but you might write a parody on his life like this.

Old Crabby had an aeroplane,
Its wings were white as snow,
They're gathering up the fragments now
Because it wouldn't go.

No church member sails heavenward long who withholds from God that which should be given to his cause.

Indeed the stingy man may accumulate but there are many who like the man on board the sinking vessel who piled his gold all around him that he might die rich. His gold was arranged systematically but not in a way to save him.

We should rejoice that God's plan is only according to our ability and not according to the ability of another.

Giving according to our ability enables us, when we do it for God's glory, to enjoy as much of his presence as any one. So much that we are made efficient in the very things that God would have us do and we get joys out of the Christian life.

We read of a company of Spaniards who in their thirst for gold had found quite a good deal. But their enemies came upon them and when they tried to escape by swimming a certain river those who held on to their gold went to the bottom and were lost. There are many professed Christians today who are hoarding up gold, lands, stocks, bonds, pleasures, while many are dying for the bread of life. But the worst of it all is this. When the last great stream must be crossed instead of these things being a help they will weigh down the soul that has leaned upon them. Missed the joys of the Christian here, missed heaven in the end which of course means all. "There is that withholdeth, but it tendeth to poverty." "Cast thy head upon the waters and thou shalt find it after many days." Such a contrast in these two passages. Such a contrast in the life of the person who is systematically stingy and systematically liberal. "Not slothful in business fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

LATE CHURCH GOERS.

Late church goers never accomplish much in the religious world. They may sometimes be fairly good morally, but never go beyond that.

Not until one becomes thoroughly interested in a thing can he make a success of it. Late church going speaks for itself, for visitors and worldly people will not take in a church where the members have the late going habit. If one is not showing interest in his own church how can he expect others to do so?

People who go to church late lose the most important part of the service. Some would not think so, yet it is true. How often we notice people staying outside of the church, waiting for the "last song" before they go in to hear the sermon. Did you ever think how much one loses by such acts as this? The object of the devotional service is to prepare the hearts and minds for spiritual thought, and the sermon's object should be to create that thought. So when one goes into the church not having been thrilled and inspired by the music of some good hymn, not having bowed in reverence and devotion before his Almighty God, nor having listened to the reading of the eternal truths of God's word, he cannot nor will not be much benefited and uplifted by the best of sermons.

Not only does going into the church late cause the guilty one to lose, but it greatly disturbs the would-be hearers. Sometimes when the minister has commenced his text and is proceeding with the sermon, the audience is disturbed by some late goer strolling down the aisle with a self conscious air, looking for a choice seat, or some little fluttering damsel wearing a "made up" smile dashing in to be seated in a conspicuous place. People who do this remind us of a back-woods-man who goes to town about once a year—he imagines everybody is watching him. This class of late goers may be called the purposely late goers, but whether purposely late or carelessly late they are committing a great sin and are causing others to be deprived of hearing the Gospel preached. When one is disturbed one or two times by people going late to church, he might as well have stayed away for the good the service has done him.

Again the "late goer" causes the preacher to become confused, and to neglect and omit some of the most important facts of the sermon. Many times we have noticed preachers almost entirely fail in the delivery of their sermons, and the people thought the sermon had not been well prepared, or the fault was in the preacher when the real cause was some one coming in late, attracting the attention of the audience, and drawing the minister's mind away from the thought he was discussing. If you want to get the true value out of church service, be on time; if you want others to enjoy the service, be on time; and if you want your preacher to give you good sermons and to the point, don't be going in late and disturbing him.

Quickly Converted.—A number of Servian conscripts, on entering Belgrade barracks to serve their time, announced themselves as atheists so as to avoid attendance at church. The commander got them to clean out the yard and stables every Sunday morning while their comrades went to mass. The atheists have now asked to be instructed with a view to conversion to the national creed.—Belgrade Correspondence Pall Mall Gazette.

New York, April 11—Sam L. Lloyd, the well know puzzle expert, died today at his home in Brooklyn from a stroke of apoplexy. He was 70 years of age.

For man years Mr. Lloyd had been known throughout the country for his popular problems for the amusement of newspapers and magazine readers. In his unique calling he had built up an estimated fortune of more than $1,000,000.

Dear Herald:

Bro. Ashburn filled his regular appointment the second Sunday afternoon. He gave us a fine sermon. On account of bad weather the attendance wasn't as large as it possibly would have been. Our Sunday school is progressing nicely and a great interest seems to be manifested.

There will be an Easter exercise at our church the fifth Sunday in April. We invite all to come that will.

We are sorry to say that Mrs. Rebecca Robinson died at her only son's home, Mr. G. F. Robinson, at Jetts, Va., Thursday, March 24, 1911, and was laid to rest in the family burying ground, to await the resurrection morn.

We shall sleep but not forever,
There will be a glorious dawn!
We shall meet to part, no never,
On the resurrection morn.

M. P. Girls.

Bethesda, Yadkin College Ct.

Our Sunday school is moving on nicely; 78 in attendance April 9th. Our pastor, Rev. H. L. Powell, filled his appointment yesterday, giving us a very uplifting sermon.

Bro. Fred Leonard is not imrpoving very fast. Fred is a young man with a good disposition, and we hope that he may have a long and useful life, and be a blessing to the cause of good.

Mr. Leon Clodfelter, from Winston, visited his parents, Mr. and Mrs. I. Y. Clodfelter, last Sunday and came out to church. We are always glad to have our boys come home and to church.

Mrs. Joe Brinkley visited in Thomasville last Saturday and Sunday. On Sunday, March 26th, the relatives and friends numbering 108, met at the home of Mrs. R. J. Wagner and gave her a surprise birthday dinner. The table was laden with many good things to eat. There were 25 cakes or more, also Mrs. Wagner received several nice presents. The day was enjoyed by all.

Mr. Billie Gruble has moved near Bethesda church and we are glad to have him in Sunday school. He is taking a great interest in church work since he joined.

Mr. Geo. and Albert Berrier and Mrs. Mary Clodfelter and daughter from the new M. P. church near Bethany, worshiped with us at Bethesda yesterday.

Easter greetings to the Herald and its readers.

Chas. M. Yokley, Rep.

Winston Station.

The attendance at Sunday school and preaching services yesterday was very good. The pulpit in the evening was filled by Mr. Owen, a young man from Yadkin College. He preached a splendid sermon, his subject being "Friendship." Those who heard him were well pleased.

The annual birthday party given by the Ladies' Aid last Tuesday night, by request, was repeated Wednesday night; though with very threatening weather both nights it was a gratifying success, as well as an enjoyable event. A delightful program was carried out. Some of the most pleasing features of the evening were the very humorous recitation by Mayor O. B. Eatan; Miss Olive Abernethy's reading entitled: "Sam Jones' Funeral," pretty vocal solos by Misses Anna Farrow and Mary Sue Henly, beautiful duets by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Martin, and Mr. and Mrs. Amos Huls. Much of the evening's success is due to the management of Mrs. W. B. Speas, president of the society, and Miss Nina Hester, who had charge of the music. The proceeds of the evening were thirty-two dollars which will be added to the new church fund. The new individual communion set has arrived and will be used at the next communion service.

One accession to the church by certificate since our last report.

Our beloved pastor, Rev. R. C. Stubbins, filled his regular appointment the first Sunday. It was a beautiful day, and we had a larger attendance than usual, at both Sunday school and preaching services. Bro. Stubbins preashed especially to the young people. We were very glad to see so many present. He gave us a fine sermon from the text: "And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." His sermon was spoken of as a fine one. I am glad to report that our Sunday school is moving along nicely; it has increased from 13 to 24 in the last few Sundays. It seems that the lessons are being studied more and learned better than usual. We are very much indebted to Rev. R. M. Andrews and Rev. R. C. Stubbins for their untiring efforts to advance the Sunday-school interest. We are glad to report that their efforts have been productive of good. I am glad to report that Mr. Asa Paschall's wife and little daughter have returned home from the hospital. Hoping this will be a year of much success. Best wishes to all.

Hope Church, Chatham Ct.

Sunday school was organized at this place first Sunday in April with forty-one members. Mr. Riddle was elected Supt., with Mr. Cheek assistant; Miss Roxie Dixon, Sec. and Treas.; Misses Callie Dunlap, and Jennie McRae, and Madames Underwood and Glosson teachers; Miss Dunlap organist.

This church is situated near the growing town of Bonlee, and the prospects are good for a live successful Sunday school here.

April 9th, Rev. Mr. Bowman preached an interesting and helpful sermon from the text: "Behold the Lamb of God," to an attentive congregation.

Dr. Swain is to be with us and preach for us on Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock, April 28th. We are planning for our special meeting to be held second Sunday in August. A. L. H., Rep.

Mt. Moriah Church.

I like the title of our church paper and love to read its pages. It is a good church paper and should be in every Methodist Protestant home.

On the 2nd Sunday at 11 o'clock A. M. Rev. Ely Mullis gave us a very helpful sermon. His text was St. Luke 2:45 And when they found him not, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him. Brother Mullis made a fine sermon out of this text. His line of thought was traveling through this world without Jesus.

I am sorry that some one is trying to discourage Brother Mullis by telling him that our church is a hard place. Brother Mullis, may the Lord bless you and our church, ever remembering that the Lord will bless those who are faithful to the end.

We read by faith the walls of Jericho fell; may we ever have this faith.

I am glad to say that his sermons are filled with power from on high. We have had better services so far. Brother Mul-

THE ANTI-OPIUM MOVEMENT.

Fifty years ago last October 24th the Treaty of Tientsin was signed by the Chinese Government. This was the closing act of the war between England and China known as the opium war. One of the stipulations of the treaty was that no opposition should be made to the importation into China of opium under control of the British Government. The object was to make a market for opium which was one of the chief products of India; and as India is under British control, a rich revenue would accrue to that Government from the sales made.

Some of the Chinese people were at the time opium users, thus there was a ready market for the drug. Many,however, were opposed to its use, and have made efforts from time to time to get the treaty changed so that opium might be abolished. The quantity of opium on sale, and the profit made on it, have led to large increase in its use, so that the Chinese Government has become alarmed on account of the injury being done to the people, and has been trying for some time to prevent its use, even if they cannot prevent its importations.

Heading the anti-opium movement in China are the missionaries and native Christians, together with many leading scholars and officials of all ranks. In this they are aided by the Christians in England who have keenly felt the shame of the crime committed by the home government upon a defenseless people. October 24th, last, was observed by the Christian Anti-Opium Societies of England as a day of humiliation and prayer in commemoration of the signing of the treaty. A full account of the transactions of the day was prepared and sent to China, where it was translated into Chinese, and printed in the papers throughout the Empire. The International Reform Bureau of Tientsin, China, has for some time been sending out reports on the progress of the anti-opium movement. In the last one received a communication from the Sec. of the Bureau, Rev. E. W. Thwing, of Tientsin, speaks of the effect the action of the Christians in England in helping to throw off the opium yoke has had upon all classes of Chinese. He says:

"In many a news column of the native press, a real sermon has been preached by telling of the earnest work of the Christian Anti-Opium Societies of Great Britian. The Chinese reader has not realized that he was listening to a gospel message, he has thought only of the patriotic side of the question. But he has been deeply moved on hearing that the Christians in England, because of a righteous cause, should urge their Government to suffer a heavy loss, and at once return to China the right to totally prohibit the importation of opium. It has been a significant fact, that the resolution in connection with the observance of Oct. 24th, the anniversary day of the signing of that treaty which included opium, has given first place to the strongly expressed desire that China be released from all obligations to receive opium, as an article of trade. The great strength of the present anti-opium movement in China, is no doubt its patriotic side. The cry: "Give back to China her right, as a sovorign nation, to prihibit the opium poison!" is a popular one. And this cry has extended all over the Empire from north to south, and from east to west. But it is a fact, of immense importance, and one that will have tremendous bearing on the future of Christian Missionary work in China, that this cry came first from the Christian people of England. And many Chinese are saying today; "It is not the Government wishes to give us back this right, those interested in the trade are not urging that it be discontinued, but the Christians in England, and the Christians everywhere, are sawng that China should be free." This is something that the Chinese can understand, it is a real view of the central idea of Christianity to save men from sin and evil. The telegram received in Peking on November 23rd, giving the official statement issued by the United Christians of the British Empire, concluded with these words; "China may feel assured in this battle for the right, that she will have the support of the United Christians and of God who doeth wonders." And as has been mentioned once before another letter, H. E. Tuan Fang, former Viceroy of Chihli, and High Commissioner on the opium Commission, said: "The spirit of the anti-opium movement is the spirit of Jesus Christ, to save men." Hon. L. Chang, Chief of the Fourth Division of the Imperial General Staff, Peking, and Secretary of the National Anti-Opium Society, said in a letter, sent January 1st, 1911, to the English Anti-Opium Societies "We cannot describe our thankfulness to the English Christians. They are throwing off the principle of gain for their own country, and are working for world righteousness. They are giving no heed to the opposition of the opium traders, and are earnestly entreating their Government, and praying to the true God to free China from Opium. If this work is well done it is evident proof to us that the Christians can really glorify God and do good for the world." This Chinese gentleman is not a Christian himself but he sees that the real power of the movement comes from the teachings of Christ.

The excuse has been made by the British Government for not discontinuing the sale that the Chinese officials themselves are not sincere in their request to have it discontinued. Rev. Thwing gives several articles from special correspondents to show that the Chinese are in earnest in their efforts to suppress the sale and cultivation and use of opium. In one place he quotes:

"The Throne has shown the greatest possible attention to this matter of the suppression of opium smoking and Edicts have been repeatedly issued ordering the discontinuance of the habit. Many no doubt have done their best to carry out orders, but it is highly probable that others have acted otherwise. If negligence is condoned in this regard opium smoking will never be stamped out. Therefore we again issue commands to the effect that in future in no region where poppy growing has been stopped may re-planting be resorted to and persons who have discontinued the habit may not again indulge. Viceroys and Governors are to give strict warning in terms of the Imperial Orders to those who have not yet ceased to smoke to quit the habit. There must be no delays allowed. District Magistrates who are negligent and careless in carrying out the orders of their superiors will be heavily punished. The Tuchihpu and the Minchengpu are hereby ordered to make thorough investigations to follow up the matter in order to secure real results, and to show forth the desire of the Throne to eradicate this evil from the people."

The British Government further makes the plea that India cannot be expected to suddenly stop a trade in which so many of her people are engaged, but promises to gradually discontinue the business through a period of eight years. In January a telegraphed dispatch was received in Peking from the Indian Government stating that only 36,000 chests (or 4,875,879 pounds) of opium will be sent to China this year, and that there will be issued special certificates for this opium. And, also, that China might close her ports to other uncertified opium that might be presented for sale. On this communication a Chinese paper thus comments:

"We think you India for your kindness, in providing so much opium for us this year. However, new China has decided that she does not wish for any more of your 'black poison.' Please take your opium to England, or to some other country that wants it. We thank you very much for your suggestion, but have decided to close our ports to all opium, certified or uncertified alike."

THOUGHTS.

By Ivan Panin.

What counts against a man is not so much what he is not as what he does not try to be.

Two great mistakes: to think one's self young at thirty, to think one's self old at fifty.

Two men are wise: who knows how to turn his failures into success, who sees even in his successes only failures.

Two things make a speaker powerful: his hearers' feelings, which they bring; his own doings, which he has left behind.

What is insinuated into our systems lasts longer than what has been hammered in. A screw holds faster than a nail.

Whether you shall be unfortunate depends also on others. Whether you shall be unhappy depends mostly on yourself.

Who loves truth even in the little will soon love her as a whole: who hates truth even in a little will soon hate her as a whole. Even a small hole held before the eye gives a view of the whole landscape; even a speck upon the eye shuts off the whole view.

Men have to find not because it is lost, but because they are lost.

Who has little sense himself displays it nowhere so much as in the suspicion that others also have no more.

Perfect work requires not so much the perfect man as the whole man.

To seek virtue for sake of happiness is to dig for iron with a spade of gold.

It is the mark of a great reader that he finds in the book more than was put therein.

LOSS OF RELIGIOUS STRENGTH

Sampson lost his strength while he carelessly rested his head upon Delilah's lap and slept. He did not discover the loss until his strength was needed. Through carelessness and inactivity many unconsciously lose their religious strength. On examination these people find that their religion is like "Lump's" fish.

His name was Columbus, but we called him "Lump." His mother, an old negro woman, did the housework. "Lump" had a good time, as all boys do on the farm—when he was not at work. While fishing one day, "Lump" caught a large speckled trout. The sun was hot, so he ran a string through the fish's gill, dropt him back into the water, tied the string to a bush, and went on down the creek, fishing.

I, too, was fishing, and coming down the creek, I noticed the string. Of course, I pulled it out. I took the fish off the string and put on a very small one I had caught in his stead. Then I hid in the bushes and waited for "Lump." As he came up the creek he was whistling, but by the time he got hold of the string, to pull the big speckled trout out of the water, you could see his white teeth, for he was grinning big. Suddenly everything changed. The expression of surprise and disappointment on that black face can not be described. He made a thorough examination of everything, saying slowly, as he proceeded: "Well, dis am de place, and dis am de bush, and dis am de string, and, I reckon, dis am de fish: but it am swinked up awful."—Rev. R. S. Satterfield, Cordell, Okla.

WINNING IN A NOVEL WAY.

Heavy rains preceded the day of the Sunday-school excursion. Three hundred eager boys found the ground too soft for ball and the stream too high for rowing. It looked like a day of disappointments, when, with a following of twenty boys, I approached an old quarry filled with water and saw a large bull-frog. Quickly making a tripod of the fishing-hooks in my pocket, and attaching it to a rod, I drew it over the back of the frog. In a moment he was in the air, while twenty enthusiastic boys shouted in glee. One little fellow emptied his lunch kettle and put the captive in. Nearly forty large frogs were captured that morning; before the last ones were pulled out nearly every boy on the grounds had joined the cheering party.

Now for the sequel: Six months later I entered a home and the mother said to me: "John goes to your Sunday-school now, I can't get him to go anywhere else. He said to me: 'I'm going to Mr. Dager's Sunday school, 'cause you ought to see him catch frogs.'"

I do not see clearly the psychological connection between catching frogs and teaching Sunday-school; but fifty boys joined my school through that frog experience. This is certain: Be a leader of the boys in their chosen amusements, and they will be ready to follow you along the path of your choice.—The Rev. Forrest E. Dager, Philadelphia, Pa.

OUR THEFT OF TIME.

The dentist raged. "That woman had an appointment with me at 10 o'clock, and she came at 9:30, as she was in a hurry to go shopping. Then she sulked because I had another patient in the chair and she had to wait."

"Some people don't realize how busy you are," I ventured placatingly.

"Well, I guess not. And now this other fool female who had an appointment with me at 11 hasn't turned up. I expect another patient in fifteen minutes, and if I submit to Miss Eleven-o'clock, the whole day will be dislocated for me. I could wager a pewter dime that she will come in like a whirlwind and——"

The door opened, and, sure enough, the whirlwind entered. It was a smiling whirlwind, hobble skirt, picture hat, powdered face, radiant eyes, and a tongue mellow with apologies. Ten minutes later, when the next patient arrived, the whirlwind departed in cloudy and unsettled weather.

O Punctuality, thy name is not Woman, nor Man! That is, generally speaking. Yet things are getting better. We are beginning to see that we have no more right to put ourselves into other people's lives and steal their time by our unpunctuality than we have to put our hands into their purses and steal their money. In both cases we take away from them something of value—and time is really the most valuable, for it cannot be replaced.

The habit of unpunctuality in meeting engagements is a species of theft. Business men have no use for the employee who saunters to his desk five minutes late. When we keep twenty people waiting for us at a church or Endeavor meeting we are filching their time. To be honest we must be "on the dot."

Promotion came to a young man in a European capital because of his punctual habits. He was due every morning at nine in the government offices, to reach which he was obliged to pass the king's palace. From his window the king noticed the same young man pass his window at 8:57, with unfailing regularity. He began in sport to set his watch by the youth. Then he inquired about him, found him as faithful and energetic as he was punctual, and urged his advancement in the service. People notice things.

The punctual man never need to spurt and "catch up" with neglected work, and thus he saves himself a world of worry.

His habit has, furthermore, a value for character. He is ready for emergencies. If special calls come to him, he can rise and meet them, for his work is well in hand. Besides, he has himself in hand, too. It is a good thing to kill off that serpent of selfish ease that lurks somewhere in the dark places of most minds. —C. E. World.

THE SHORTEST SERMON.

Th practical import of the entire Bible, expressed in two words "Please God," which Samuel B. Letson has made the basis of what he calls the shortest sermon, is as follows:

To please God is vital.

To please God, man was created.

Pleasing God is man's highest function.

Infinite wisdom must demand that man please God.

Does any sermon comprehend more than please God?

Has any sermon less verbiage?

Does any command mean more?

Is any purpose better?

Is any resolution wiser?

Is any exhortation more timely?

Does any man know a better course of action?

Is not pleasing God the highest human wisdom?

Is not pleasing God the Christ life?

"I do always those things which please Him."—Jesus.

Does not pleasing God include perfect morals and the square deal to all men?

May we all so please God as to accomplish our greatest usefulness and highest joy!

No bar to pulpit use.

PRAYER AND WORK.

The Rev. Dr. Norman M'Leod, who was a big, burly man, was once in a boat with a thin, little, frail-looking brother minister. As they were crossing the Highland loch, one of those fierce, quick mountain storms came down, and the boat was in danger. "Brother," said the little minister, "let us pray together." "Na, na!" said the Highland boatman; "the wee one can pray, but the big one maun tak' an oar!"—Rev E. J. Hardy.

HENDERSON CHURCH.

Mr. Asa Hardee who has been taking a graduate course in embalming in Raleigh has completed the course and returned home. We are glad to have Asa back with us, he is one of our best young men. He will join his father, D. W. Hardee, in the undertaking business after May first.

Mr. Ed. C. Hayes who is taking a course in engraving and watch repairing is making such fine progress that he will not have to stay as long as he at first thought he would. We shall be glad to have Ed. hang out his sign in Henderson.

Mr. Francis Satterwhite, who has been suffering with an attack of pneumonia, is able to be out again.

We are glad to have with us Miss Marie Vinson of Littleton and Miss Mattie Ross of Greensboro. Miss Ross is making the season as Mrs. O. O. White's milliner.

The series of sermons on the Lord's Prayer came to an end with the first Sunday night in April, the series consisted of seven sermons and have been kindly spoken of.

The second quarterly conference convenes first Wednesday night in April.

One new member received during March.

A Christian Endeavor Society has been organized, with Miss Mary Young as president. They gave a social recently which was well attended and much enjoyed. The pastor has received a pounding since the last report. The Ladies' Aid Society Church Social didn't have a fair chance, as the weather was very bad, we hope this will be repeated soon.

VANCE CIRCUIT ITEMS.

Mr. J. P. Saterwhite is still very ill but we hope he will soon feel better. Bro. Satterwhite is one of the best men we know and is loyal to his church under all circumstances.

Bro. Willie Floyd is not expected to live many days at this writing; may God comfort him in these last hours.

Mr. Clyde Satterwhite who has been attending school at Whitsett is at home on account of the illness of his father.

A Ladies' Aid Society has been organized at Flat Rock and we expect for it a successful future.

Miss Josie Reavis won one of the pianos in voting contest at Henderson.

Miss Bessie Satterwhite won the free northern tour offered by Durham Sun contest.

Miss Josie Reavis was elected delegate to High Point S. S. workers Convention—April 26-28.

Miss Annie Pleasants and mother attended County S. S. Convention at Union Chapel from Flat Rock, also Mr. Kemp Hester.

We sympathize with Bro. Asa Paschall; his wife and little girl are away in the hospital at Richmond for treatment for throat trouble; hope they will return much benefited.

The little boy of Bro. Ed. Paschall that has been ill with pneumonia is up again.

Bro. Kalstron and wife expect to move from New Hope to Henderson very soon.

No one has sent us any news from Dabney this time.

Mt. Carmel Church, Granville Ct.

The Sunday school at Mt. Carmel has unfortunately been in winter quarters since November. On Sunday, March 19, we reorganized with a good turn-out and encouraging prospects for a flourishing school this summer. Some of us declared our intention never to go into winter quarters again. The following are officers:

Mr. Z. T. Garrett, Supt., Mr. C W Finch, Asst. Supt.; Mr. W. P. Garrett, Sec. and Treas., Mr. R. O. Grissom, Librarian. The following teachers were elected:

Mr. R. P. Cunningham, advanced class. Mr. E. L. Garrett, 1st intermediate class., Miss Mary Finch, 2nd intermediate class. Mrs. W. F. Robertson, Card class.

Miss Maggie Finch will serve as organist after her return from the B. F. I. in June.

A Cradle Roll has been organized with twelve members. We are hoping and praying that our people will stand by the Sunday school and make of it the success that it should be. Too often the older people look on the Sunday school as something that belongs exclusively to the young. They are faithful to the church, but fail to see the necessity of going to Sunday school. This we believe to be a great mistake which we trust something will speedily remove from the minds of our other wise faithful people. It is a good thing to see people send their children to Sunday school, but it is a beautiful thing to see them go with their children to Sunday school.

Mrs. C. B. Finch has been quite sick and is now at Southern Pines for medical treatment. It is hoped that she will be able to return by the first of June. Her husband visited her the 18th and 19th. He found her doing as well as could be expected.

Miss Lily Robertson is sick at this writing.

Mr. Phil Short has had grippe but is better.

Mrs. W. G. Murphy died at her home near Mt. Carmel, Friday, March 24th, and was buried on Sunday at Sandy Creek Church, Franklin County. Her funeral was preached by her pastor, Rev. G. M. Duke, at 2:30. Deceased has been ill for a number of years with tuberculosis. She leaves a husband, six sons, one daughter, one sister and three brothers. The family who are faithful members of our Sunday school have our deepest sympathy.

Miss Mary Green Falkner died March 17th, at the home of her half-brother, Mr. Rufus Clark, near Mt. Carmel Church. She was buried in the family burying ground on Sunday afternoon. Pneumonia was the cause of her death. We extend sympathy to the family.

Sincerely,

Mary L. Finch, Reporter.

NOTICE.

The members of the auxiliary of Grace Methodist Protestant Church, Greensboro, extend a cordial invitation to the women of the church in North Carolina who are interested in Foreign Missions to attend the Branch meeting which will be held April 20-21. Whether you are a member of an auxiliary or not, come and learn the workings of the W. F. M. S. Free entertainment will be provided for all who wish to attend the meetings. Pastors are also invited. Their advice and co-operation are needed. We hope to have a large attendance and a profitable meeting.

Mrs. J. F. McCulloch, Com.

C. E. TOPIC FOR APRIL 23—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

(Sabbath Benefits: Isa. 58:1-14).

The Scripture: Have the Pastor read this beautiful chapter and give a five minute comment thereon. A sermon can be preached on any one of these verses, but please don't have them at this time. Brevity is a virtue all C. E. workers and especially talkers need to cultivate.

The Leader: The chief advantage or benefit to be derived from the Sabbath is in the training, the education, it gives us for the life to come. A professional man—a teacher, a doctor, a lawyer, a preacher, will give 25 years to life preparation, to live on the average 15 years more. But many chafe under the restriction of giving one day in seven—a total of ten years if we round out three score years and ten—to preparation for Heaven, where we are to live forever. It even becomes necessary in a Christian land for the strong arm of the civil law to enforce Sabbath observance. What a commentary on the materialism of our day! Surely we should not begrudge one-seventh of our time here to preparation for an endless existence in the paradise of God!

Special Work: Have two or three minute essays on such themes as:' "The Origin of the Sabbath;" "Why We Keep Sunday Instead of Saturday as the Sabbath;" "The Experience of the French With a Ten-day Sabbath."

Scripture Verses: If the leader cares to hand out Scripture verses to be voluntarily given with a word of brief comment, let him consult the concordance under such words as: Sabbath, Reverence, Worship; Rest, Work, Peace, Joy and Thanksgiving.

Questions to Excite Thoughts, Which Shall Be Voluntarily Given: How can we get benefit from the Sabbath?

How does attending Sunday school give benefit?

How does the preaching service?

How does the C. E. prayer-meeting?

What about Sunday letter-writing?

Sunday visiting?

Study on Sunday?

Sunday excursions?

What is meant by saying, "the Sabbath is a day of rest?"

What did Christ say of the Sabbath?

How can we make our Sabbaths a blessing to others?

What feature of the Sabbath helps you most? (To several.)

How may we have every day a Sabbath?

What is meant by the saying: "Every day will be Sunday bye and bye?"

Christian Endeavor and the Country Church.

(By Rev. C. E. Newman.)

I know not why this topic was assigned to me unless it be that I have had something to do with Christian work in both the town and the country. There are problems to be met and solved in all religious movements in both the town and county church. There are some common to both and others known only to the one.

I believe, however, that the needs of both are quite similar. I doubt to-day if the importance of the country church is always recognized. True, the town church has many advantages for doing efficient work. Yet there is that specific work that the country church must do.

Our town churches have been built up largely by support from the country church, and I venture to say that the larger number of adult recruits to our town churches are added by transfer from the country.

While Christian Endeavor had its birth in the town church it has long since made its way into the country.

Has it proven the same helpful agency there as in the town? And what is there about the Christian Endeavor to commend it to the country?

Its purpose is to deepen the spiritual life and quicken religious activity. In the country we have the different denominations with different doctrines. Those not familiar with the fundamentals of C. E. may fear its inadaptability to work among these different religious bodies and its tendency to discourage doctrine, and believe the denominational society can better meet the needs.

Thirty years of marvelous growth of Christian Endeavour prove that it meets every fundamental need and has the advantage over the denominational society.

In the country church we need active Crristians, those who have that life communicated by the Son of God; thus becoming partakers of the divine. so that no longer it is he that lives but Christ that lives in him.

The Christian Endeavor encourages continuous expression of this inner life by repeated confession in the prayer-meeting from week to week. I believe many a Christian who otherwise would have made a useful man to his church has become scarcely more than a drone because with profession he has stopped. We hear people sometimes express regret that they cannot be active in religious meetings because they were not trained when young. Others complain because they have not the gift of speech in public or in prayer. In the Christian Endeavor prayermeeting, the gift of speech is not sought ofter or the logical prayer but a simple confession of one's love for the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Then the great need is that young Christians should become familiar with the word of God by frequent reading of the Scriptures. The covenant pledge of the Christian Endeavor insures this. But Christian Endeavor does not stop with acknowledging faith and declaring allegiance, with renewing one's love and strengthening one's allegiance and bracing one's self against temptation. It encourages constant service.

Service.—It is not only a place for service training, but it affords opportunity for real Christian service. And when the young Christian learns that there is a work for him to do, a work that he can do, and enters into that wark he is saved to the church. The denominational society can certainly meet both needs mentioned. Confession of faith and service for the Master. But these fundamentals in the C. E. have brought about a broader fellowship than any other organization has ever done. It rests on that which united believers rather than that which separates them. At the great annual feasts of the Jews it is said that each forgot his distinctive tribal badge in the greater honor of being an Isralite. The Christian Endeavor movement from being interdenominational has become interstate, international, intercontinental and some one has suggested intermundane. And when the Christian Endeavorers come together they come together in a meeting like this or at Atlantic City in July, or the greatest gathering to be later at Sydney. Denominational differences are forgotten for the time being in the realization of being children of a common Father, citizens of one kingdom.

But it is not to be feared for one moment that this broad, liberal fellowship is calculated to lessen our zeal for our own church. Fidelity to our own church and zeal for its works is a fundamental. The C. E. does not exist for itself but for Christ and the church.

Its confession of love is for Christ, the head of the church. Its service is for Christ, its bride. And its fellowship made possible through loyalty.

Christian Endeavor encourages the importance of sound doctrine but in fundamentals only. It leaves the details to be determined by the individual conscience, illuminated by the word of God. We can readily see why it is so very adaptable to the needs of all evangelical denominations. It draws the young people nearer to Christ and into fuller participation of that life which proceeds from Him. It is not undenominational, but interdenominational. Among Congregationalist, congregational, Baptist, baptistic; Methodist, methodistic. No outside authority legislates for any local authority. No contributions solicited. It seeks not yours but you.

In the country church as well as the town church we need trained workers. Men and women who are not ashamed to confess their love for Christ and who will show their faith in active service for Him. We also need a fellowship that will bind Christians of all denominations together in zeal and loyalty to the great cause of the Master, and when their fellowship is cultivated and fostered instead of luring people from their own church it rather creates a desire to know more of the church of their choice.

How make the C. E. a Success?—Somebody must push it and it takes a good deal of pushing. Opposition is now met because people do not understand the broad principles and real purpose in the movement. Christian Endeavor has gone and will continue to go in the country church if we will but make it

A few days ago I heard a man say that the Sunday-school is not only the auxiliary of the church, but also the church of the near future, that in it are our officers and officials boards of a few years hence. I thought how true but if we add to the church with the live active Sunday-school the Christian Endeavor society, with its helpful influence and activity we have the church of the future approaching more nearly the ideal church than that of any period during the modern era.

DR. LEWIS' DEFINITION OF SANITATION AND HYGIENE.

"In the battle of life, just as in actual [illegible] brought into action—offensive and defensive. Sanitation may be compared to the former and hygiene to the latter. In sanitation we wage an active crusade against the germs of disease—we burn them with fires, we poison them with antiseptics, we demolish their strongholds of filth, and in every way actively pursue them to their death. In hygiene we strengthen our fortifications and look after the well-being and equipment of the garrison, so that we can resist almost any attack. The human system is supplied with those defensive forces known as the power of resistance or immunity, and by obedience to the rules of hygiene—of right living—they insure us against many attacks of disease."

—It seems that the Lorimer case is to be re-opened. Clarence S. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Company, testified on April 5, before the Senate investigation committee that he had been approached and asked for $10,000 to help reimburse those who had put up a $100,000 to secure Lorimer's election.

Mrs. Bettie Abbott, died March 23rd, 1911. She had been in failing health for several years. She has been a faithful member of Gillburg Church for several years. Before that time she was a member of Mt. Carmel.

I have known her for a number of years, and know she was a true Christian woman, loved by all who knew her. She loved her church.

May God comfort the bereaved husband, sisters and the other relatives, friends and neighbors. Weep not, friends, Sister Abbott has only paid the debt we all must pay sooner or later. Burial services were conducted by Rev. R. M. Andrews and Bro Stubbins, in the presence of a large attendance. BISHOP KILGO ON CHURCH UNION.

Rev. W. F. Ashburn sends the following, clipped from a daily paper report of a sermon by Dr. Kilgo:

Unity of Christian churches, that goal so earnestly sought by many modern leaders, received positive discouragement for Bishop John C. Kilgo, of North Carolina, in his sermon at Broad Street Methodist Church yesterday morning. It is distinctly un-Christlike, he said, to attempt to bring all Christian people under the banner of ecclesiasticism.

Christ, said Bishop Kilgo, did not intend that all men should be alike or develop fruit alike. He said that the flowers of the field are not all of the same color and shape, but present myriad forms of beauty. So it is with Christian people. It is intended that they display varying virtues and bring forth different fruit.

Illustrates Point.

"Shall the hand," he asked, "object to performing its functions because it is unlike the foot, or the foot because it is not like the hand? Shall the ear refuse to hear because it is not the tongue, or the tongue to speak because it is not the ear? If the human frame were all ear how would it speak? If it were all hand, how would it walk? Each member has its own uses, its own beauty, its own duties, its own possibilities.

"They who talk of church union fail utterly to perceive the conception of Christ Himself.

"In stead of church union, I hope on the contrary, to see the day when each man shall be a church unto himself, developing his own powers and responsibilities."

Cheap criticism of the church and of membership on its rolls was deplored by Bishop Kilgo, who said that during the past few years he had felt more than ever impelled to preach on the subpect of the privilege of belonging to a church.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

Can anything good come out of Australia? Why not? Australia is now peopled by civilized men who have the advantage of a new situation in which to apply an old civilization. Improvements are to be expected in such a case. Australia has solved the problem of Bible instruction in the public schools, and its system is now recommended to the rest of the world. What the system is may be inferred from the following parts of their school lawe:

The New South Wales Act, Clauses 7, 17 and 18, provides:—

7. In all schools under this Act the teaching shall be strictly nonsectarian, but the words "Secular instruction" shall be held to include general religious teaching and distinguished from dogmatical or polemical theology. Under this clause the school teacher in school hours gives selected Bible lessons from a book provided for the purpose, but is not allowed to give sectarian teaching.

17. Any minister of religion is entitled in school hours, on days to be arranged with the school committee, to give children of his own denomination, separated from others, an hour's religious instruction.

18. Any parent may withdraw his child from all religious teaching if he objects to such religious instruction being given.

The principles of the New South Wales system of Bible instruction, have been adopted by the State of West Australia since 1893, Tasmania 1868, Queensland (by a State Referendum) in 1910, Norfolk Island 1906, and now the leaders of the Bible-in-School Parties in Victoria (Australia) and New Zealand wish to adopt same, and desire the Government to take a Referendum on the question.

THE CATHOLICS AROUSED.

Tom Watson, the agitator, has agitated the Roman Catholics. Not many can do it, but he has done it. They generally treat with silent contempt newspaper attacks upon them, but Mr. Watson through his "Jeffersonian Magazine" has provoked a reply. To those who know Watson's style, it is sufficient to say that the reply is in kind. It is a pamphlet written by the Rev. Lucian Johnston, and published by the International Catholic Truth Society. It is an appeal to the Protestant men of the South, "the sole aim to dissuade thoughtful men from accepting as true calumnious statemants of one individual in Georgia." The statement is also made that "scarcely a week passes that some poor priest or indignant Catholic layman does not send to this Society a pamphlet or magazine article, or leaflet, which rivals in mendacity and scurrility the worst ravings of the discredited Georgian; these new productions and reprints are sold at a low price or distributed gratis by the thousand; they find their way into hundreds of thousands of homes from British Columbia to Texas."

Of course no true Protestant approves of falsehood, and if there is no ground for opposing the efforts of the Roman hierarchy, opposition should cease. We believe the chief cause that provokes all this attack from Protestants is the belief that the Roman Catholic Church still holds the view that the temporal power of the various nations of the world should be subordinated to the control of the pope of Rome. Roman Catholics must not be surprised if they are opposed as long as there is any reason to believe that they are trying to get control and keep control by force of arms. Protestants do not believe that might makes right. They believe in a separation between church and state. Let Catholics make it clear that they also believe in this separation, and they will have little difficulty in getting along with their "separated brethren."

HOW TO INCREASE ATTENDANCE OF SUNDAY SCHOOL.

We must try to make our Sunday schools more interesting. Since attending the Sunday School Convention at High Point I am fully aware of the fact that I really never knew just how to have a good Sunday-school in a community before, but since Mr. Lawrence has so plainly told us the real need of good Sunday school it makes me feel that we ought to try harder this year to increase the attendance of our S. S. Oh, that every member of our Sunday-school in North Carolina could have attended the S. S. Convention in High Point and heard those splendid addresses on how to increase the attendance of our S. S. The Sunday-school in the life of a church, and community when properly conducted, and where a church has no S. S. it is most sure to go to destruction. It takes old people as well as young to run a Sunday-school. Mr. Lawrence told us the real importance of having the different departments in our S. S. and it impressed me very much and especially the "Home Department." Why more of our people do not attend S. S. I do not know. We have small congregations, great masses of the people who do not attend at all; many only attend now and then, or on special occasions; and we have many honorary members who only pay us a visit once in a while, taking no interest whatever in the public worship of God. Why is it? Is it because our Sunday-schools are not interesting? I fear it is. We do not put as much study on the lessons as we should and therefore no teacher can make a lesson interesting to her class until she has made a special study of it herself. As Mr. Lawrence told us in his splendid address at the S. S. Convention that an incompetent teacher was a drawback to a S. S., and that no person was prepared to teach a class in the S. S. who is not willing to put five hours study on the lesson. The teaching in the S. S. we all know is not as efficient as it should be. To improve this teaching is one of the chief objects of holding these S. S. Conventions and it is important that we should attend them. I fear the present generation is not being brought up to attend S. S. and church as they should be, and yet most of our converts and members are secured through the Sunday school. If people never acquire the church-going habit in their childhood and youth, how can we expect them to attend regularly when they come to manhood and womanhood. Where did the children get their religious training before S. Schools were started? Can anything ever take the place of a good S. S. in a community? What is more beautiful than to see fathers and mothers and men and women and children reverently worshipping God, the hearing of our great hymns in mighty choruses, expressing the highest religious experience and aspiration and listening to the devotional exercise of the Scripture by men trained and set apart for the purpose? The S. S. is the "Children's service" and any meeting of any sort that takes its place is out of place. It is usually found that children can repeat as much of the average sermons and tell the text as well as their seniors. The machinery of the Sunday-school has been greatly improved in our times and it has become a most important agency for carrying on one side of the work of the church. It is doubtless reaching more people than ever before and is capable of doing a vast amount of good if all the opportunities which the modern S. S. presents can be completely utilized. Let us all strive to make this the best year of our Sunday-school work. I am sure we can if we will put forth the effort.

REVIVAL PRINCIPLES AND METHODS.

BY A PASTOR.

Much is being written to-day on evangelism, and rightly so; but, singularly enough, the principles and methods of revival work received scant attention. Yet there is much loose thinking along this line, hence a definite discussion of the ways and means of evangelism would prove invaluable. Although the views herein expressed are very positive, they are not intended to be dogmatic. The writer would welcome a wide discussion of these topics, no matter how much other views differed from his own.

If men were under ideal conditions from infancy up, a revival would be unnecessary. But sin has induced a deadly inertia that must be overcome, and this is best done in a period of revival when all hearts and minds are concentrated on spiritual things. Among Christians we find four classes defined by their attitude to evangelistic effort.

1. Those who want and are satisfied with an annual protracted meeting characterized by a spectacular flourish, caring little how superficial the work really is. They are charmed by the man who can make them feel happy, little dreaming that this happiness is often only a kind of hypnotic spell cast over them by a strong mind while they are in a passive, receptive state. True happiness is a result of duty done and of the Holy Spirit's work in the heart. But thousands are going to our revival meetings simply desiring to be made happy while they listen to some noisy speaker who appeals to a crude imagination or to the memory of a joyous conversion in the long ago. Such Christians are drifting into fatal error. This class is large in numbers and generally well-meaning, but suffer from ignorance. They deserve not our censure, but our sympathetic help to higher conceptions of Christian life and duty. However, any person, whether evangelist, pastor, or layman, who consciously encourages such superficiality, should be dealt with.

2. Those who desire a revival state the year round, and usually dispense with any special period for evangelistic effort. This class includes some of our consecrated and intenigent leaders, and they point to some large Churches where members are received nearly every Sunday. How often we hear the remark, "We ought to be in a revival state all the year!" Such an ideal is impossible under existing conditions. Human progress goes forward in successive waves. We cannot always be on the crest, not even spiritually; but taken through the course of years, we can easily see the rising tide of spiritual life. Let us not vainly hope in the fact of divine law to spend all our time on Pisgah tops of glory and joy, but gladly remember that the Christian pilgrim makes progress on the upward way by passing through valleys of service and climbing mountain sides of toil. The great work of the Church is soul-saving, but no less great is soul culture or character-building.

3. There are those who oppose special special evangelistic meetings altogether. This class is usually well educated, devout, and sincere; but they have revolted so completely against the utter hollowness of much of our revival effort that they fail to see the necessity for any such work at all. They emphasize the proper training of children in religious matters, and rightly so. They think adults should give good heed to the regular preaching of the gospel and quietly begin the Christian life, at the proper time uniting with the Church. They fail to see the necessity of periodic concentration of effort in harmony with the law of action and reaction.

4. The last class recognizes the superficial character of much revival effort, the impossibility of maintaining a high standard of continuous revival work, and yet the necessity for some revival effort periodically in response to the law of human progress. A dead-level Christianity is out of the question.

It follows, therefore, that the evangelistic program must have a vital place in the organic work of the Church. Spasmodic and irresponsible revival meetings are generally a detriment.

The professional evangelist meets three serious hindrances in holding meetings: (1) A lack of preparation for the revival effort. It takes a week to warm up the Church. It does not pay to start a meeting on the spur of the moment, except where the Holy Spirit clearly leads to such action. Even there the Spirit has made the necessary preparation among the people. In one such meeting, that unexpectedly started in a prayer meeting, I saw over one hundred souls saved. But, as a rule, the time for a revival meeting should be determined on weeks or months ahead. The intervening time should be well spent in thorough preparation. (2) A disposition on the part of both pastor and people to leave the work to the evangelist. If he fails to get results, he is the one censured. This tends to make the evangelist superficial in methods and work, while the people languish in spiritual inertia. The real success of a revival is measured by the number and faithfulness of those at work therein. Nowhere does money count for so little and personal effort for so much. (3) The evangelist's own lack of an intimate knowledge of local conditions. It is a dangerously popular error that a stranger drawing a bow at a venture is the most effective leader in attacking the strongholds of sin. Such an attitude smacks of moral cowardice. The world should not have the slightest reason for calling the pulpit a "coward's castle." It is incontrovertible that the local pastor in a spirit of love can aim with certainty and firmness at the evil conditions, and hence he is the better man for it. To be sure, he will make some enemies, but as a true man he will stand his ground faithfully, and his influence in the community in which he lives will be greatly enhanced thereby. To live and work thus among one's own people will more than supply the human need of a "moral equivalent for war."

The pastor who goes to assist his brother pastor in a revival meeting meets these three hindrances, though the first two are not likely to be so serious as in the case of the evangelist. But the pastor who is his own evangelist ought not to meet any of these hindrances. However, the evangelist can concentrate on his sermons and methods to a degree that a busy pastorate will scarcely allow.

Altogether I regard the professional evangelist as the least desirable helper in a revival meeting; yet there are extraordinary times and conditions that make the assistance of a sane evangelist most desirable. But the need for him is exceptional. The better man to help in a meeting is a brother pastor whose head and heart are busy with the multitude of pastoral duties. His presence in the revival is far more normal, and he comes with all the freshness of an evangelist. But many leaders, like Dr. C. L. Gooddell, insist that the pastor is his own best evangelist. In many instances this is true, but there are obvious reasons why it doesn't always work. Still the crying need of the Church to-day is pastoral evangelism.—Christian Advocate, Nashville.

A SHORT SERMON ON LOVE.

The following short sermon on love, selected and translated from the French by Van Hermit, is worthy of a most careful and prayerful study on the part of every Christian.

"You have only a day to spend here on earth; act in such a manner that you may spend it in peace.

"Peace is the fruit of love; for, in order to live in peace, we must bear with a great many things.

"None is perfect; each has his failings, each hangs upon the other, and love alone renders that weight light.

"If you cannot bear with your brother, how will your brother bear with you?

"It is written of the Son of Mary, that 'having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end.

"For that reason, love your brother, who is in the world, and love him unto the end.

"Love is indefatigable; it never grows weary. Love is inexhaustible; it lives and is born anew in the living and the more it pours tself out the fuller its fountain.

"Whosoever loves himself better than he loves his brother, is not worthy of Christ, who died for his brothers. Have you given away everything you possess? Go and give up your life also! Love will restore all to you.

"Verily I say unto you, the heart of a man that loves is a paradise on earth. He has God within him, for God is love!

"The wicked man loves not, he covets; he hungers and thirsts for everything; his eyes, like unto the eyes of a serpent fascinate and allure, but only to devour.

"Love rests at the bottom of every pure soul, like a drop of dew in the calyx of a flower. Oh, if you knew what it is to love!

"You say that you love, and yet many of your brothers are in want of bread to sustain their life, in want of clothes to cover their naked limbs, in want of a roof to shelter themselves, in want of a handful of straw to sleep on, whilst you have all things in abundance."—Pittsburg Christian Advocate.

—The M. P. Church was crowded last Sunday night with an attentive congregation, which enjoyed the sermon of Dr. W. E. Swain, President of the M. P. State Conference. The sermon was one of the ablest ever delivered here.—Siler City Grit.

A SUGGESTION.

I wish to make a suggestion to our Sunday-schools. Some of them may not like the plan, and may object to it, but I for one want to see it carried out. Our Denton Orphanage is in need of more funds, and the suggestion I wish to make is this: Let every Sunday school set apart one Sunday in each month for that collection to go to the Orphanage; say the first Sunday in each month, and it being understood that this Sunday's collection is for the Orphanage, all should strive to make it as large this Sunday as possible, and by this means the little orphans would secure lots of money for clothing etc., from other little children who are able to do something through the week and make a penny or even five cents to send to help these little ones who have lost their papas and mamas.

I am quite sure that the collections on the other three Sundays would be sufficient to buy literature for the schools, and none would feel any burden whatever.

I don't know how many Sunday-schools we have in North Carolina, but I will say if we could get one hundred schools to give one Sunday's collection to the orphanage, and it certainly would average $1.00 to the school, we can readily see that they would get $100 every month from the little children who drop in their pennies, and no one would feel it. Of course we older ones ought to drop in more than pennies.

This is of course separate from any pledge any church or circuit may have made to the orphanage. I would like to hear from others on this. We have no Sunday school in Star, but I wish to say that what few members we have here will join in and take a collection one Sunday in each month for the orphans.

I am sure this is needed, and it would be appreciated by those in charge, and at the same time help the little ones, and we certainly would not feel any worse by having done so. M. F. Vuncanon.

—From reports received from over 725 churches, with a membership of over 312,000 communicants of twenty denominations, and from 208 cities and towns in 12 state in various parts of the country, out of nearly 7,000 deaths in 1910, over 700 or 10.4 per cent were caused by tuberculosis. This means 2.24 deaths for every thousand members or communicants.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.
THE MISSION SCHOOLS.

Christian education is essential to the life and progress of a people. Intellectual attainments, material prosperity without good morals can neither safeguard nor develop the vital interests which insure order, prosperity and permanency.

The Asiatic faiths have never adequately met the requirements, and they cannot meet them, now that marvelous changes ars taking place throughout the Far East. Added to this is the growing dissatisfaction on the part of Orientals with the effete religious systems of their fathers, and with the ideals and objective set before them, and consequently grave concern is felt today by the leaders, especially in Japan, who gauge the trend of national aspirations and movements, and their foreshadowings.

In the Japanese Diet a member declared the cause of the anarchist outbreaks was "a general degeneration of the young men of the country, and the inclination of the people towards moral corruption." The Prime Minister asserted that such was his own feeling in regard to the matter, and the Minister of education expressed his anxiety in regard to the whole matter.

An ex-Vice Minister of Education states in his book "Education in Japan" that "Religious education is a very important thing, because it is religion that constitutes the foundation of the spiritual life. If people are educated only by the moral sentiment, they may be said to have passed a good life, but there will be something wanting. Unless they grasp the spiritual life in its completeness they lack the foundation upon which the highest and best type in formed."

One writes, "The late Prince Ito said that students educated in Christian schools were more reliable than those educated without religious influence, and he chose as his private Secretary a pronounced Christian. When he went to Korea to administed the affairs of that country, he selected a man who was conspicuous for his Christianity as the head and founder of a judicial system. Christian men have also been sought for other and responsible positions in that land.

The managers of what is considered the best managed railroad in Japan have for many years selected Christian men for positions of responsibility. This, and much more could be written, only emphasizes the clear, imperative call for the church here in America to at once properly equip existing Missiion schools, and establish them in other unoccupied centers. Nothing else can take their place or do their far reaching work. Government schools may be more numerous, better equipped, etc., but Christian education, a part of the great evangelistic force of the church, can only be imparted by its own adherents whose lives and teachings exemplify the great truths and principles they propagate.

That work energetically prosecuted will now yield large returns by raising moral standards, and shaping the career of many of the men who hereafter will be actively identified with the nation's affairs.

Our own Yokohama School of English (Night School) with its 200 young men ought to be enlarged, and be given better facilities for greater work in that rapidly growing city to which many young men annually flock .

Our Nagoya College is steadily gaining recognition for its work, and large classes are now graduating—24 young men this commencement; 45 are in next year's class —and 300 or more are now enrolled. The urgent needs are a plot of ground, a Science Hall, a church in order to properly fulfill its mission.

A number of students and two teachers at the College, and several at the Yokohama school were baptized this year, and the religious interest has been well sustained by Bible classes, chapel services, regular worship and special addresses. Here are more than 500 young men entrusted to our care annually, and this imposes a great responsibility. All our pastors and members ought to fully appreciate this great opportunity to help evangelize Japan by winning young men to Christ, and securing native ministers through these two institutions which cost the church less than $5,000 per year for their combined expenses.

The Children's Day Services.

The editors of our church papers have kindly commended the Service prepared by the Board for use by our Sunday schools, and they urged that all the schools use it. They will be sent free of all expense to Methodist Protestant schools. It was specially prepared for them, and contains pictures and information dealing exclusively with our missionary work in Japan, and the music is unusually fine. We wish every school to get it, if they only read Presidents Lewis and Tagg's greetings, the Scripture readings, and pages 10 and 12 which tell about the work, and, of course, make an offering for Foreign Missions. Orders ars reaching us by nearly every mail, and are being filled the day they are received. It is time to send in yours. Do it now. Be sure to state how many copies you need, and give name of your charge and Conference as called for on the order card.

Special Missionary Service.

We are publishing a special service this year entitled "A Vision," prepared by a committee of the C. E. Society of our Lynchburg, Va., Church. It is, of course, original, and was rendered with such signal success in Lynchburg that it had to be repeated.

It is not to take the place of the regular Children's Day service. It is too extensive to be used in connection with that Service. It would be better to render it on a week night. It will be found serviceable by the C. E. Societies for raising funds for the support of their Missionary. Sunday school classes of advanced grade can use it for securing additional funds for the Children's Day Offering. It can be used at any time of the year in the interest of Missions. It will be from the press in a week or so. More about it later.

That profitable investment again.

A layman of Iowa, and a Maryland lady each takes a $5.00 share. Previously reported, $931.00 , making a total of $941.

The need is great. The appeal is to you.

MISSIONARY TRAVELOGUES—AN OPPORTUNITY FOR CHURCHES AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES.

Rev. E. A. Marshall, who has just given a series of addresses in connection with the Laymen's Missionary Movement in Chicago, is in his ninth year of service as the Instructor in Missions of the Moody Bible Institute of that city, which has sent over five hundred men and women to the foreign field.

The Institute has a collection of over one thousand stereopticon slides of missionary interest, made from photographs taken by Mr. Marshall in two tours 'round the world. He uses these in his popular lectures which he is planning to give in other parts of the country during the coming Fall and Winter.

The Institute will be pleased to make dates for him with churches, Christian Associations, or young peoples' societies, the design being to spread missionary information and awaken interest. The lectures will be without cost other than that incurred for necessary expenses. Application may be made directly to the Institute.

A GOOD MOTTO.

Miss Harris, of Oxford, just from the State Sunday-school Convention at High Point, gives us the following motto from Mr. Marion Lawrance:

Good, better, best!
Never let it rest,
Till the good is better
And the better is best.

Answers to Assigned Questions.

Question 34. We do not know enough of the life of Sihon, king of Heshbon, to be absolutely sure of a correct interpretation for the term "hardened." But is it not reasonable to presume that we may interpret it in the light of similar passages where more of the facts are known?

We are told that the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh that he would not let the children of Israel go, but not until after Pharaoh had hardened his own heart twice. Besides, Pharaoh had oppressed the children of Israel very severely and he deserved punishment. Could not God put it into his heart not to let them go in order that He might use that method of destroying the Egyptians on account of their great wickedness, and show His wonderful power, not only to the children of Israel, but to the whole heathen world? I think that God could do this and yet tempt no man.

And, again, the Word benefits those who heed it, but hardens the spirit of those who reject it. In either case we may be sure that it is man's fault that his heart is hardened.

Moses had thought to have passed peaceably through King Sihon's territory, but it seems that God intended that Sihon and his people—who we believe were wicked—should be destroyed, and the spoils given to God's chosen people.

R. A. Swaringen.

38. What evidence do you find in Deuteronomy that Moses did not write the book?

Lesson for Next Week.

Joshua, first twelve chapters.

St. John the Divine.—On April 19 an event was celebrated in New York that has caused no little comment, one way and another. On the day named more than four hundred priests, visiting clergy, laity and bishops, of the Episcopal Church, met in sacred conclave, vestured in rich robes of Church, and with solemn rites and ceremonies consecrated as much of the Cathedral of St. John theDivine as is ready for service. The papers report it a magnificent and inspiring scene, which, because of its richness, will not soon be forgotten. The church house has now been in building for about twenty years, and it will take a much longer period than that yet to complete it. So far there has been an expenditure of $3,000,000, and the plan calls for an expenditure of $10,000,000, and the actual cost may be more than that. "Only the choir, the ambulatory, and two of the seven chapels of the Tongues are complete.'

Of course there is criticism of such expenditure on a house of worship of such a kind, especially in a city where there is reeking poverty and squalid misery and untold suffering for want of the actual necessities of life.

But there is another, and it seems to us a greater side of the matter.

It is possible, highly probably in fact, that not a dollar that went into this massive church edifice, or one that will go into it, would have gone for the relief of human misery in New York or elsewhere. Again it is possible that gifts to this church have made the givers more open-hearted and more ready of approach, and so have served to increase rather than diminish the gifts to needed charity.

But better than all these, and outweighing other considerations, is the fact that even in a city and in a civilization where the people seem feverishly bent on pleasure and money getting, this great edifice of polished marble and enduring granite show there is yet left an abiding, an eternal interest in the things of the spirit. Even the great moneyed classes of New York are not all mad at money hoarding, for if they were they would not be giving their millions to erect a house from which no one is to derive private gain or gilded treasure. St. John the Divine at least represents a tribute of men of business to spiritual affairs. And the beauty and solidity of St. John the Divine must remind those who see it and worship there of the beauties and glories of that house not made with hands, eternal and in the heavens.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Denton.

We are getting along very well with our work. We have had about fifty conversions and reclamations, and about fifty have been added to the church since Conference, and we have had an old time revival in the church and community. I never saw the laymen work better in a revival meeting than they did at Denton. The members of each denomination, both young and old, went to work like they wanted a revival, and they got it by working and praying for it. It was a touching scene to see the dear little orphan children converted and being received into the church. Miss Mabel Williams and Miss Etta Auman deserve much praise for the good work they have done and are doing in the orphan's home. Rev. G. L. Reynolds and his co-workers are to be highly praised for the good work they have done in the school. They have all done most excellent work this year; I am sure that our church appreciates them and their work, and will continue to show their appreciation of them and their work by continuing to co-operate with them in their good work. I want to extend my heartfelt thanks to Bro. G. L. Reynolds, J. H. Hulin and the pastor of the M. E. Church at Denton, and all the good laymen for their hearty co-operation and efficient help in the meeting at Denton. May the Lord continue to bless them all. I also want to thank Bro. J. R. Peace, a member of the Baptist Church, for $25.00 he gave me a few days ago, and Bros. W. E. Hill and Shaw for a nice pair of shoes. May the Lord reward them for their kindness to us. I am glad to say that I have such good people to serve, I see signs of life and kindness all over my work. God bless all you dear people. I mean to serve the very best that I can. Continue to pray for me and work with me and we will succeed in doing some good.

We had our president with us the first Sunday in February, and he preached us three good sermons, and gave us some facts about our church that I am sure we needed, and I believe they have done us all good. Bro. Swain spoke about our church like he was not ashamed of her smallness; he talked like he loved her principles and was proud of them. He made some of us feel like we were glad that we were Methodist Protestants. The way to make others love our church is to let them know that we love her first.

Our second quarterly conference will convene at Pleasant Grove on Saturday before the 2nd Sabbath in May: all day service; preaching, 11 A. M., and quarterly conference at 3 P. M. Let all the members be present and make it a good day for our cause.

The following are the names and amounts that have already been given to our new church at Denton:

J. M. Daniels,	$100.00
J. T. Sexton,	100.00
A. A. Hill	75.00
J. R. Peace	75.00
G. Morris,	75.00

Sarah A. Morris,	5.00
A. M. Hamilton,	5.00
J. E. Varner,	5.00
L. F. Ross,	5.00

A number have said they would pay more if it was needed, other have said they would give but have not named the amount yet. We hope to begin work on the church soon.

I was called to Gibsonville a short time ago to be at the funeral of Sister Emily Davidson. The call come about 9 P. M.: it was a sad shock to me, and I know it was to the family. I served as her pastor for about two years, and I can say she was a mother to us. She always had a kind word for her pastor, and wanted to know about the pastor's family, and would almost always send something to the family as I would go home from Gibsonville. I thank the Lord that it was my happy lot to serve her as pastor.

She joined the M. P. Church while I was pastor at Gibsonville. She gave me her reasons for uniting with our church and they were good. I always felt at home with Brother and Sister Davidson. I never can forget their kindness to me. Brother and Sister Dividson have raised a most noble family. Brother Davidson has great reason to be proud of all his children for they are worthy children. Sister Davidson leaves two as noble young men as I ever met. I feel sure that they will do honor to the name of their parents. Brother Chamness was not at home much of the time while I was there, but I heard of his work before he left home, and it was good. Brother Dwight was one of the most faithful young men to his church and pastor that I ever served; and Brother B. Davidson stood by me like a father the two years that I was his pastor. God bless you and yours, Brother Davidson, you have my prayers in your troubles. We need not look for departed ones here; but we will overtake them over on the other shore.

I was called by telegram to Monroe Saturday night to witness the death of Miss Pansey Hamilton, the sister of Mr. L. A. Hamilton. We could not go until Sunday morning; she was dead before we reached Monroe. We attended the funeral services at Marshville Monday. Mrs. F. C. Hamilton is spending a few days with them in their sorrow.

Dear Readers:

You may think since there has been no report from Shiloh this year that they are asleep or dead. This is not the case, however. They are very much alive. Our Easter service was a success. The weather was so unfavorable that it looked as though the service would be defeated. The children did well. So well some of us wondered what they would do under more favorable circumstances. The collection was $13.56. W. C. Lassiter.

Siler City.

The second quarterly conference for this circuit was held last Friday at eleven o'clock with President W. E. Swain in the chair. The attendance was not as large as it should have been, but the country people are exceedingly busy now, on account of being so far behind with their farm work.

We had a good conference though, and we were very glad to have Bro. Swain with us. F. W. H. Andrews, of Hope Church, and G. E. Matthews, Siler City Church, were named as nominees for delegates to Annual Conference.

President Swain preached for us fifth Sunday night to a large congregation. His sermon was fine and enjoyed by all present.

The graded school will close the middle of May. The sermon is to be preached on Sunday, May 14th, by Rev. J. F. McColloch, and the adress on Tuesday, May 16, by Gov. W. W. Kitchen.

Best wishes for the M. P. Herald and its readers. G. E. M.

Pinnacle.

The Easter services were very attentively listened to by a large audience. The collection amounted to $6.00.

The S. S. has purchased a nice little library of 38 very interesting volumes. The books are being read by young and old alike, and we think a lasting good will grow out of it. Miss Maggie Mickey was appointed librarian. Our average attendance for March was 51; for April, 59. I tell you, you will have to work if you take the banner away from us, whoever you may be.

Our pastor filled his appointments well, each sermon being better than the preceding one.

Gentle Spring has come at last, so let us each a new life begin.

Our reporter, Sister Brona Apple, is spending some time in Greensboro, so, by her request I will send in a short report from this place. Bro. Raper, our pastor, was with us last Sunday and delivered an excellent sermon from St. John 28:18, to a large and attentive congregation. We are always glad to have Bro. Raper with us. Sunday was Communion day and we were glad to see such a large number partake of the Lord's Supper.

It was decided last Sunday that our protracted meeting would be held commencing the fourth Sunday in July; hope all Christian people will remember us in their prayers, especially for this meeting.

Our Sunday school is moving along nicely. 78 present last Sunday; collection, 46 cents.

Prayer meetings on second Sunday are not attended by as many of the church members as should be, but there are a faithful few who are always ready and willing to do all they can for their Master.

Success to the Herald and its many readers. Ella V. Apple.

The second quarterly conference will convene at Mt. Zion on Saturday before the first Sunday in June. Come and look after the business of the church.

Pastor.

St. Paul's.

The second quarterly meeting convened April 29th. The business was attended to in harmony. Bro. D. W. Misenhimer and E. A. Honeycutt were nominated as delegate to the Annual Conference.

Sabbath school report very good. Steward's reports right good. As to Class-leader's report, have neither report nor Classmeeting. I'm sorry that the Classmeeting has so near died out. Brethren, we ought by all means go back to the old land marks because Classmeeting is the backbone of religion. Take prayer-meeting and class meeting from the church and you have got the practicable part of our worship out of the church.

St. Paul is looking up some. We received five into the church the 23rd and the names of two yesterday, We had five penitents last night and one young man was converted, and there is quite an interest in the church. I'm working and praying for a sweeping revival this year. Pray for us that the Lord will do great things for us.

Yours in love,

E. A. Plyler.

The fact that we have not reported in a few weeks does not neccessarily mean that we are not alive and doing some work in that part of the vineyard, but simply that the reporter has failed to find time to get a report written.

Our S. S. attendance for the past three Sundays was 220, 234 and 128, respectively. Last Sun. was a very bad day and a few were prevented from attending. The attendance during April was 1025, or an average for each Sunday of 205. The total amount of the collection was more than $46.00.

On the fourth Sunday morning we were favored with a fine sermon by Bro. G. W. Holmes, of the Saxapahaw Ct., on the subject, Undue Care for Worldly Things. Bro. Williams exchanged with Bro. Holmes on that day in order that the former might preach a special sermon to the Jr. O. U. A. M. at Saxapahaw. Last Sunday we had no preaching services, Bro. Williams being at Albemarle assisting in a meeting.

The second quarterly conference failed to meet on the night of April 16, and Bro. Williams has called it again for next Monday evening, May 8, at 8 o'clock. He says he desires to see every official member of the church there. Some very important business will be before the meeting.

Bros. C. B. Way, J. H. Boon, M. O. Barton, and E. L. Way, represented our Baraca Class, and Miss Ivy Coble, represented the Philatheas at the meeting of the State Baraca-Philathea Union at Greensboro, April 22-24. They report a nice time and a most excellent convention.

Bro. J. M. Hayes attended the State S. S. Convention at High Point last week, and also reports a great meeting.

Miss Flora McPherson, of the Stokes Sanitarium at Salisbury, was a recent visitor at her home here.

We regret to learn of the very serious illness of Miss Caroline Baulding, one of our most faithful members. We hope for her a speedy recovery.

On Monday night of last week, fire destroyed the house occupied by Mr. C. C. Moser on Cameron Street. Only a very small amount of the furniture was saved. Mrs. Moser, who is a daughter of Bro. L. W. Holt barely escaped, as the roof was falling in when she awoke. They have the sympathy of the people here.

Later.

Since writing the above we learn that yesterday, Bro. J. G. Rodgers, our S. S. Supt., and Bro. H. C. Stout, were elected city aldermen from the third ward of the city, for a term of two years. We congratulate them. Reporter.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

Our second quarterly conference met at Haw River last Saturday. The conference was pleasant and harmonious. The pastor's salary was raised $25. Steps were taken which it is believed will mean that our churces will soon be insured. Dr. Goley and Bro. J. C. Morris were chosen as nominees for delegate to the next Annual Conference. Either one would make a good delegate.

Because of unfavorable weather, on last Sunday morning, the attendance at both Sunday-school and preaching at Graham was not as large as usual. 84 in Sunday school. Average for April was 99 and three fifths.

The night service at Haw River was well attended. An unusual number of young people were present.

Harmony.

Easter Sunday was a good day for us. The weather was fine. We held our service at 8 o'clock P. M. The church was filled to its utmost, many having to stand. The children did well. Rev. E. W. Davis gave us a good talk on Home Missions. The choir as usual held up thir corner, and I think all who adided in any way worked for a success. The offering was $6.56.

Our pastor filled his two regular appointments last Sunday. I am sure his splendid sermons were enjoyed by every one who appreciates gospel sermons. He held a service especially for the children in the afternoon.

Mr. J. A. Hughes returned from a trip to Pickens last week bringing his bride with him. We welcome her in our community and wish for her all the pleasure she anticipates in her new home.

Mr. Tom Mattison died Saturday morning; he was a good man and will be missed in the community, especially in the prayer-meeting.

Our Sunday school is doing very good work. N. M. B.

SPECIAL TRAIN TO DENTON COMMENCEMENT.

A special train of open cars will leave Thomasville at 8 A. M., Tuesday, May 9, and returning will leave Denton at 4 P. M. The president of this road, Mr. Jones, made an earnest effort to get closed cars from the Southern so as to operate a train with all necessary conveniences, but the Southern would not let him have the cars, so it is open cars or none at all. This road bed is now in the best shape it has ever been and Mr. Jones is sorry that he could not get the closed cars. May 9th will be a good time to visit the school and Orphans' Home and we hope to see a large number present.

AFTER EASTER.

The mind will still fondly linger on the past Easter with unusual pleasure. Many from schools and colleges visited the old home during the memorable holiday to be again with father and mother and other loved ones. Friends, relatives, acquaintances, new and old, met and had joyful times at these gatherings, recounting what had taken place, what was then occurring, and the things which might take place in coming events. Much of this was interesting to parties concerned. A simple little present, an act of kindness, or a pleasant encouraging word left an impression which bound heart to heart and made somebody happy with the precious thought that life was happiness as well as duty. To be remembered in some way by our friends is surely an honored privilege every one loves to enjoy. This spirit is being more and more cultivated, as people think more and better of each other and learn to appreciate their privileges.

Jesus and the resurrection are full of interest to every Christian and as he thinks of his own resurrection from the long sleep of death, it becomes more and more interesting to him. Believing that Jesus passed through the mysterious change of the resurrection, so will we, if faithful and worthy ascend the infinite heights of eternal joy to live in endless felicity with the great multitude of saints to enjoy the rest provided for them. The hope of dressing up in the full robe of righteousness to live in immortal youth ought to inspire each one to contend for that prize of such high price which is worth more than all others. "Know you not that they which run in a race run all but one receiveth the prize; so run that you may obtain."

Much has been said concerning the resurrection, but it is still the song of the ages and the wonder of the world, and will continue to be observed as long as time shall flow into the ocean of eternity. This Easter time brings out the life all through the empire of nature, for in swelling bud and blooming flowers coming out of the frozen grasp of a winter grave, you look upon the resurrection of nature with intense delight and see the great unfolding of this mysterious power. A new growth—a splenlid development is seen all about you, and as you thus commune with God you come nearer to Him, and get more in touch with His all pervading and invading presence. And while you gaze upon the expanding beauty inviting you to study its impressive object lesson, how delighted is the view, and how pleasing the glad emotions produced by such study. None but a heart which is as hard as a stone can fail to realize the blessing which this Easter time imparts, Many an Easter song went up on the wings of hope to the throne itself, anl echoed the glad strains back to earth again that Jesus still lives in His resurrected and glorified state. Passing through the long dark night of sleep we shall be satisfied when we awake in His likeness. We will never be perfectly satisfied here in the changing scenes of time, but in heaven we shall be satisfied with its changeless splendor.

THE NEED OF SEVERITY.

It is a common thing for preachers in our land to maintain the proposition that the proclamation of God's love to unconverted ones is far more effective than a presentation of the severity of Gol. Those men never present to their hearers the stern aspects of God's character; they do not warn them of the wrath of God against transgressors; they do not tell them of the painful penalties which are to be meted out to impenitent sinners; the whole tenor of their preaching is an extreme imagination of God's love, as though that love could mildly endure all manner of sinfulness from the boldest of sinners, without any purpose of bringing them into judgment. Any fair-minded reader of the Bible may readily see that it does not represent God in such a way. See how he dealt with the Israelites. I am reading anew the book of Jeremiah, and in it I see the repeated statement that those people in that day most wantonly abused the love of God. He reminded them of his manifeld mercies to them; he appealed to them to think again of his deliverances of them when they were in great peril and sore suffering; he had been not infinitely better to them than were all of their human friends and helpers; and yet those subjects of God's loving ministries, instead of being moved with gratitude and kindness toward him, despised his goodness and continued to spurn his commands and ordinances. It was necessary, therefore, that God should treat them with great severity. His "fierce anger" expressed itself in fiery judgments against them. Penalties and pains were visited upon them. They must be made to know that God would not mildly tolerate them in their bold iniquities. And this is just as true today. He who says that God is not at all angry with wicked ones is in error. He lies against God ond his truth. The times have not so changed that sinful human nature is less opposed to God than it was in olden days. There are many rebels against God in these days. It is the duty of every preacher to give warning to such ones. He must tell them that God, though very merciful, will not let unrepentant ones go unpunished. Fear God!

FAMILY WORSHIP.

From what we learn from some of our very good people we are led to believe that family worship is about to pass out among the lost arts or is going out of vogue. Is it because men are feeling that religion is a matter for each individual to have and to hold for him or herself? Do they feel that while in union there is strength in other matters, there is no benefit in communion spirit with spirit? I really question whether those worship who refuse to worship with others. He who communes always in his own soul will most likely commune alone. Unless he is most vigilant in rooting them out the rank weeds of self-righteousness will take his soul.

Our very religious natures call for worship oftener than once a week or once a month as some go there in the country. How best can this want of the soul be supplied in the family life? Suppose there are but two Christians there, which would be most conductive to spiritual growth, have two quiet corners where each repairs for worship alone, or to let the two join in their devotions in one place? It is patent that for religious culture there is more joy and benefit coming from the worship of the two together. But suppose there is a third or fourth member in that home, who are not Christians, they are yet too small to fully grasp the meaning of it, what are they to do while you worship? When are they to learn and how are they to learn what it is to pray and to serve the Lord? Let them learn from you and your prayer daily, then have them to come and bow with you and hear your words, and also take some part in the reading and singing, which they can do.

As it appears to us the hour of family worship is the most important hour of the twenty-four. The primary meaning of the word religion is to bind one to something, and tehse seasons of prayer and worship will do this. The recollection of the child of these times, remembering when he or she knelt at mother's knee and said the little prayer often holds them to God with cords stronger than any other experience. Your boy may become a sceptic, he may doubt the religion of his Sunday-school teacher and even his pastor, and woe be your soul, parent, if he shall also doubt your religion. Father's or mother's religion, when it is vital and true will hold a reckless boy and a thoughtless girl to God when all others have failed. Whatever you neglect, don't forget to pray, do not neglect to have your family prayers.—Vance County Methodist Protestant.

SUNDAY VISITING AS AN EVIL.

An evil prevalent among people of most communities today is that of taking the Sabbath for visiting. This is true of a great many members of the church when it isn't "our preaching day." Of course the Sunday-school "is left to a few good men and women and some children who are either sent by the parents or carried by some of the neighbors. Sometimes good people plan to go to church and in comes a neighbor; one of those kind that know it all—about the Bible, I mean and don't need to go to Sunday-school, and they know all—the gossip of the community too.

The writer once lived in a community where many of the men spent the Sabbath in going from one hog pen to another to see who was ahead on swine raising. Some of their boys went to the dogs because their fathers had already gone to the rogs.

I believe that the object of some Sunday visitors is to get a good dinner. Another is they know if they were to stay at home their conscience would trouble them for misspending the day. To get among people some times especially if they are agreeable causes us to forget our neglect of duty for the time being. My mother was noted as a good cook. People knew to come to our house meant something good to eat. But mother grew tired of this as she grew older and began to find out too that most Sunday visitors came to enjoy the day. For when the good cook is sick such folks don't come. Her plan finally was something like this: When Sunday company would come in she would invite them to church and Sunday-school, for she was a "didn't come prepared to go" she would regular attendant of both and if they ask them to make themselves at home just as much as possible till she would get back. Some times they would go back not often they would stay and it didn't take long to get rid of such pots. If people find out that you are going to go on to church and Sunday-school they will not bother you long.

I once said to a lady, "I missed you at church yesterday, any body sick?" No, no, our daughter came with her family and they hadn't been there in so long thought I ought to stay with them." The expression on her face and the way she emphasized everything of course I had to imagine about some things, for I hadn't been in the community long and wasn't acquainted with her daughter. "How far to where your daughter lives?" said I thinking perhaps she lived in a distant state. Well, perhaps you will be amused. But after whipping the devil around the stump awhile I found that it was only a quarter of a mile. Close enough to run over and borrow soda for breakfast. You go to church, you are benefited if you go for that purpose. Go visiting, you harm yourself and may make your host or hostess tell a swelled story.

I am sure that if people cared more about spending the Sabbath in a way to learn more about God and his will concerning them that there would not be so many "blue Mondays."

Sunday visiting is an evil from several standpoints. It is not treating your neighbor right, notwithstanding the fact he has asked you to come, your neighbor may ask you to take a drink with him, is that right? It is not treating your church right for you promised to support its institutions and its most effective work today is in the Sunday-school and you support that mainly by your presence.

It is not setting a proper example for your children. Where dinner is prepared and your friends ask you to go home with them after church may be all right, but even this may be carried to such an extreme as to do harm.

I never enjoy a meal, it matters not how good if it has kept the good woman away from church to prepare it. I am sure that every true pastor would rather have a plain cold meal rather than make Sunday a feast day or keep the good house wife away from church. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."—N. G. B., in Vance Methodist Protestant.

Protecting Prohibition Territory.—Since the States have been voting for prohibition, and some of them adopting it by popular vote, there has been a feeling, quite wide spread, that Congress should protect such States in their expressed desire to abolish the whiskey traffic. In fact we know of nothing today that is doing as much to bring prohibition into disrepute as the "jug trade," the power to ship whiskey from a non-prohibition territory into prohibition territory.

In keeping with this desire and constantly growing sentiment Hon. E. Y. Webb, member from the Ninth North Carolina district has introduced a bill which, if enacted into law, would correct this evil and abolish this injustice. The bill was ordered printed and a copy is before us. It simply prevents the shipment of intoxicating liquors into prohibition territory other than as allowed and controlled by said prohibition State district, or territory.

Such a bill may not pass Congress now, but there is no doubt but that some day such an act will be adopted.

A Cool Head.—Over in Richmond, Va., they are making an effort to suppress the running of automobiles by drivers who are either partially or wholly drunk. New York State has made it a penal offense for one under the influence of liquor to drive a car and Richmond feels need of a similar statute. "An automobile," opines The News Leader, "is sufficiently dangerous to human safety and human life when driven with the utmost care and by a man with a cool head. But there is something monstrous about permitting one of these tremendous machines—several tons of steel and iron—to be hurled through the streets driven by an immense power directed by an individual whose faculties are more or less befuddled by liquor."

With all of which the Charlotte Evening Chronicle agrees, and further cites that there is a man in that town known from New York to Ormond Beach and has the reputation of a dangerous and daring driver; but who has never involved either himself or any one else in an accident and it is all "because he never takes a drink and always has a cool head." And the conclusion that The Chronicle derives holds good in all the interests and enterprises and affairs in this life. The man who befuddles his brain and excites his nerves with strong dring may seem to be the bravest and best man for awhile, and escape for a season without calamity—as many an intoxicated automobilist has—but the real brave and daring, and the ones who are sure to win out and prove safe in the final,—in any and in all the undertakings of this mortal life—are the "ones who never take a drink and always keep a cool head."

IN MEMORIAM.

Davidson.—Emily Holt Davidson, wife of Bro. Berry Davidson, was born April 10, 1847, and died March 24, 1911. Very early in life Sister Davidson professed faith in Christ and united with the M. E. Church, South, and remained a member until about two years ago, when she united with the Methodist Protestant Church in which she had been a faithful worker for many years. Having been educated in three of the leading colleges of the State, early in life she took a strong position for moral uplift, and for educational and religious development. Being herself possessed with a strong character, she seemed not contented until she had done her utmost to make others likewise strong.

On Nov. 18, 1880, she was married to Bro. Davidson. To this union were born two sons, Prof. George C. Davidson and Dwight M. Davidson. In these she manifested a deep interest, untiring in her efforts to have them educated. She was also much devoted to her home and always made it very pleasant to all. On her marriage to Bro. Davidson she became stepmother to Rev. W. W. Davidson, now a Presbyterian minister of Charlotte, N. C., Mrs. O. L. Huff, of Gibsonville, Mrs. T. J. Ogburn, of Greensboro, and Mrs. J. B. Ogburn, of Summerfield, N. C. In the care of these there was manifested that strong power of womanhood, "to be mother to the motherless." After these had gone from the parental home and her own sons had grown to manhood she then eagerly turned her attention to the children of her town and in these she manifested an interest until her death. In her ministrations to the sick she carried the smiles of a soul filled with an intense love for mankind. Some flower speaking of God's beauty, and also something from her own larder showing God's blessing. There was always manifested an unselfishness for herself, and a very willingness to help others.

But probably her greatest characteristic was displayed in her care for Bro. Davidson, and he thus speaks of her—"As of the Lord," saying still more, "that in his marriage he sought divine guidance for this companion." And in it he was not disappointed. Her life has indeed been a benediction to many, and how lonely in home and in church without her cheerful presence. Will not the whole church pray for Bro. Davidson who is now sorely bereaved, that God's comforting grace may comfort his heart, and guide her two sons who have lost a mother's watchfulness.

J. A. Ledbetter.

Clark.—Fannie Neil Clark was born Dec. 19, 1881, and departed this life April 2, 1911. She had been a member of Fairview Church about 7 or 8 years and while she was able was one of the church's best workers. About four years ago she had an attack of measles of which she never fully recovered, but during her long illness she did not complain, but bore her affliction with that meekness that only a genuine Christian can show. How sad the home from which she has gone! How lonely the mother who cared for her so long! But, dear mother, sorrow not as those who have no hope; for Fannie's suffering is over. She has not only entered an everlasting home, but she also has left an imperishable name. J. A. Ledbetter.

Sartin.—John Edward Sartin, son of S. I. and Luura Sartin, was born March 10, 1875, and died April 10, 1911, aged 36 years and one month. He professed faith in Christ about fifteen years ago and joined the Methodist Protestant Church at Fairview, and was a faithful attendant at church and Sunday school as long as his health permitted. About two years ago he became afflicted wih that dread disease tuberculosis. His suffering was great, yet he bort it without murmuring. He remarked to his pastor the day before he died that all was well. And to others he had often remarked the same fact of his readiness. On the 12th we gently laid his body in the cemetery at Fairview to await the resurrection morn. Funeral services conducted by the writer. J. A. Ledbetter.

Sister Mary Frances Pittman, nee, Phillips, was born in Halifax County, N. C., August 4, 1835, and passed from this world, Saturday afternoon, Feb. 11, 1911.

In girlhood she united with the Methodist Protestant Church at Whitaker's Chapel of which she remained a consistent member till her death.

She was married twice. First to James Pittman and after his death, to Henry W. Pittman. She had five children by her first husband, three of whom, a son and two daughters, survive. The two children by her second husband went before her.

Sister Pittman was "full of good deeds which she did." She was ever ready to help her neighbors when they were sick or in distress, and was always kind and considerate of others.

During the war between the states, a soldier at home on a furlough, in the neighborhood developed small pox, and Sister Pittman contracted it. She recovered, but before she was fully recovered, she had to get up to nurse her husband and children who had it.

Her husband and one child died of it, and she herself closed her husband's eyes.

During the last few days of her life, her suffering was intense, and death came as a release.

Besides the children, mentioned above, she leaves one sister, Sister Louisa Phillips.

She was laid to rest in the family burying ground, the funeral being attended by a large number of friends. C.

In Loving Memory.

Mrs. S. T. Riley departed this life April 13th, 1911, in her 44th year.

She was born in Orange County, southwest of Hillsboro; she died at a neighbor's house where she had been for over a month. She had been in feeble health for a year previous to her death and the end came not unexpectedly to her and her people. She gave her heart to God when she was very young and united with the M. P. Church at Chestnut Ridge.

She was loved and respected by the whole church and all who knew her.

Se leaves a husband and one daughter, a mother, two brothers, two sisters, and a host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss; but their loss is her eternal gain. It was Oh! so hard for us to have to give her up, but the Lord knews best and never makes a mistake, so instead of sorrow, let your hearts be filled with joy, and thank the dear Lord for taking her out of this world of sin and sorrow, to that beautiful home in the skies. All that medical skill and loving hands could do could not arrest the disease, and she continued to grow worse until relieved by death.

She was cheerful amid her afflictions and looked forward to her departure with a submissiveness that characterizes the true follower of Christ.

May God's richest blessings rest on her husband and little daughter that they may have the preparation of heart to meet the wife and mother some "sweet day, by and by."

The funeral was conducted in Chestnut Ridge Church by Rev. Homer Casto, Friday evening, April 14th, and the remains laid to rest in the quiet churchyard ground where she sleeps, but not forever. We can say of her:

"Servant of God, well done,
Thy glorious warfare's past;
The battle's fought, the race is won,
And thou art crowned at last."

Written in memory of "Aunt Belle" by one who loved her.

Her Niece, Alice.

MARRIED.

In the parlor of the Rich Hotel at Ossipee, N. C., on March 26, 1911, Mr. Kelsie McMasters and Miss Mary Rich. Mr. McMasters is a trusted employee of the Ossipee Cotton Mills, while Mrs. McMasters is a highly esteemed young lady and a member of Fairview M. P. Church. Rev. J. A. Ledbetter officiated.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE.

There's a cheery little proverb
It is very well to heed
In a world where pain and sorrow
Are quite plentiful inleed,
If you would not have them double,
Then keep this well in view;
To never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

Don't think when storm clouds gather
You are certain to be drowned;
The very darkest tempest
May quickly blow around.
And up above the blackness
Shines evermore the blue;
So never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

Oft times a gloomy morning
Precedes a sunny day;
So, without a word of warning,
Our trials have slipped away.
What pangs we oft have suffered
From ills we never knew!
So never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

Quit counting all the bridges
You may never have to cross;
Quit climbing all the ridges
Of future pain and loss.
Trudge on and do your duty,
To God and conscience true;
And never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

—Anna R. Henderson.

KNEW NOT HOW DEAR LOVE WAS TILL LOST.

She was a good wife; there was nothing unusual in that.

She looked upon her husband as a demigod; there was nothing unusual in that.

He looked upon himself as an absolute god; and there was nothing unusual in that.

For fifteen years she had been a perfect wife and mother, living absolutely for her home and family, thinking only of their welfare and happiness.

She demanded little in return for her loving service, and the family had come to take it for granted, and to enjoy the belief that constant self-sacrifice was mother's pleasure.

Then, one day, as gently and sweetly as she lived, the mother died.

The funeral had been in the morning, and toward nightfall a steady, dreary rain set in.

The husband had wandered down to his office in the afternoon from sheer force of habit, and sat there idly turning over a bundle of letters, on whose contents he could not concentrate his attention, Afterthoughts.

He thought of the fifteen years they had spent together, as man and wife. And it passed through his mind that perhaps he had not been quite the perfect husband that he had always considered himself to be.

"I suppose I've been as good as most husbands," he thought, uncomfortably. "But I wonder if I was good enough for her."

Oh, well; it was all over now, and he must make the best of things. There were the children to think of; he would go home to them now; they must feel as forlorn as he.

Poor little mites!

As he entered the front door he found himself listening for the cheery call that always greeted his homecoming.

Dreary silence! That sweet welcoming voice was hushed forever.

With a sigh he turned into the parlor. It was dark, and he stumbled over a foot stool on his way to press the electric-light button.

What were the servants thinking of to have the house in darkness at this hour? It had never happened before.

The fire that always blazed cheerfully on the open fireplace had been allowed to die out, and his own particular chair had been pulled away from the table by which it always stood.

There had always been a lighted lamp on that table and his favorite evening paper.

He looked about the dreary room with a dull throb of misery. Was it always going to be like this?

This room had always been a perfect nest of cozy comfort. She had known so well how to make a room pretty and comfortable.

On a table at the other side of the fireplace was a basket filled with half-finished mending. There was Bobbie's stocking, with the darning egg in it, just as she had showed it to him that night before she was taken ill.

"Bobbie is getting to be such a great, strong boy," she had said, with tender pride. "He keeps me half my time mending his things."

With tear-blurred eyes and clumsy, unsteady fingers he picked up the stockings—the last sign of her loving ministration.

He wandered forlornly upstairs. Where were the children? he queried.

A child's laugh rang out, and his first feeling was of angry protest that any one could laugh.

"Then they are young and will soon forget," he thought, miserably. "And I must bear this loneliness by myself."

He turned into their room—the room he and she had shared for fifteen years. There in the closet hung the pretty pink wrapper she had always worn when she did her hair. With a sobbing sigh he buried his face in its silken folds. The sweet fragrance of her spirit still clung to it.

He passed slowly up and down the room, which henceforth must be his alone.

That worn place in the carpet; he remembered that she had wanted a new carpet last Easter, but he had said they couldn't afford it; and then he had bought a very expensive fur lined coat for himself, and she had been delighted that he should be so comfortable.

In a sudden fit of unendurable misery he walked over to the window and flung it open. It was raining hard, and with a groan he remembered how she had always hated rain. Hated it. And tonight she was lying out under that rain—soaked, sad—all alone, his pretty, pretty girl.

He moved blindly back to the bedside. Where were his slippers, he wondered. She always had them ready for him.

As he kicked off his shoes a thing absurdly pathetic upset him utterly.

There was a hole in the toe of his stocking—such a thing had not happened during his fifteen years of married life. She wouldn't have let it happen. With a hoarse sob of misery he cried: "I cannot bear it. I cannot live without her."

When a few minutes later he answered the summons of his dinner gong he found the children at the table, a subdued, little sad-faced group.

He sat down opposite the empty chair. "Children," he said, "I want to tell you that you have lost the best mother, and I the best wife, that ever lived. And we did not half appreciate her."

And out in the silence and the rain the little mother slept peacefully.

Appreciation had come too late to disturb her placid rest.—Julia Steere, in Michigan Christian Advocate.

AFTER MANY YEARS.

Last week this incident appeared in the Raleigh News and Observer:

"Charles E. LeGrand who says he was late musician of the 13th infantry and the First frontier cavalry of the Union forces, has written from his home in Salem, Mass., to the adjutant general of North Carolina, informing him that a friend of his has a Bible he would like to return to the proper person. The writer says that his friend picked it up during the Civil War at New Bern and now wishes to return it to its owner or to some relative of his.

On the fly leaf of the Bible was written the name of Lieut. C. A. Boon, of Company D, of the 35th North Carolina Regiment. Camp Morgan, December 16th. It was presented to him by Mrs. C. K. Caldwell.

The records show that Lieut. Charles A. Boon entered the Confederate service in 1861, as second lieutenant of Company D, 35th N. C., from Chatham County. He served under Capt. Hardy J. Lassiter, who was killed in the battle of Malvern Hill. The next captain wasCapt. Robert E. Petty, who in 1864 was promoted to major. In 1863 Lieut. Boon became First Lieutenant of his company. Whether he is still alive is not known."

The esteemed News and Observer may be informed hereby that former Lieutenant Boone, now Rev. C. A. Boone, is still alive, quite happy and doing well, and resides at Elon College, N. C., and is ready to receive back his Bible. The reason why Bro. Boone lost that Bible was that he did not have the time, nor the disposition, to go back after it, and there were other and sundry items left in the same camp at the same time which the blue coats may return if they wish.

But that Bible lost on a field of battle, in a skirmish too hot for comfort or contemplation, nearly fifty years ago, and now being returned to its owner, leads one to moralize on the Book, or a message from the Book, or teachings from its sacred pages, placed, dropped, left somewhere years ago in the heat of toil and effort and conflict, but springing to life and fruitage after the years have passed. We often suppose our precious treasures lost, when in fact they are in keeping for days and years yet to be.

Bro. Boone has received his Bible in good shape, and it brings back vividly recollections of the long ago.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR PLEDGE.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

A great many people object to Christian Endeavor because they have to promise to do certain things. "I don't believe in making pledges," they say. How is it, then, that they can believe in marriage, or in joining the church, or in signing checks? Are not all these promises to do something, pledges? To be consistent, those objecting to the Christian Endeavor Pledge, ought to object to these kinds of pledge and to the other innumerable forms of pledge, without which modern life would be impossible.

But let us approach this matter from another standpoint. What does the word pledge signify in the Christian Endeavor Society? It is not a promise that we will do something, but a promise in which we trust to the Lord Jesus Christ for strength to do something. So it should more properly be called a covenant because it is an agreement between the maker and Christ by His help to do His will. Surely there can be no objection to a covenant with God! The whole Bible is full of covenants—all of us occupy covenant relation to God and to the plan of salvation. When we recall that the promise is made not to the Society, but to Christ, we see that no Christian can consistently oppose it.

Further, what does this pledge, this covenant, embrace? It stands for daily prayer, for daily Bible reading, for active attendance on and participation in every Christian Endeavor prayer-meeting, and for the loyal support of the Church, especially by attendance on all her regular Sunday and mid-week services. Does the Church not need these things? Do young Christians not need them? Would the religious life not be better developed where these things are in practice? "But we don't want to promise that we will do these things. We are afraid we will get in a condition or position at sometime, in which it will not be convenient or even possible to do them." objects some one. Let such an one remember that the covenant is not absolute, but conditional, first in that we trust to Christ for strength and secondly in that we only obligate ourselves to perform the duties specified unless hindered by some cause which we can conscientiously give to our Lord and Master. Experience has plainly taught that the Christian Endeavor Covenant is a great source of strength on the part of those who have made it.

Again, there is no final, hide-bound form for the pledge or covenant. Every Society can write its own pledge. The United Society has found four forms in general use. These are printed below, but a Society may adopt a pledge all its own. It ought not, however, to make it so easy that it will amount to nothing nor yet so strict that it cannot be kept by those of the members who honestly try. Christian Endeavor is flexible and even in its pledge is adaptable to local conditions. But it cannot thrive without its pledge, its covenant with Christ.

Suggested forms of pledge.

Form 1.—Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise Him that I will strive to do whatever He would like to have me do; that I will pray to Him and read the Bible every day; and that, just so far as I know how, throughout my whole life, I will endeavor to lead a Christian life. As an Active Member, I promise to be true to all my duties, to be present at, and take some part, aside from singing, in every meeting, unless hindered by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Lord and Master, Jesus Christ. If obliged to be absent from the monthly consecration meeting, I will, if possible, send an excuse for absence to the Society.

Form 2.—Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise Him that I will strive to do whatever He would like to have me do; that I will make it the rule of my life to pray and to read the Bible every day, and to support my own church in every way, especially by attending all her regular Sunday and mid-week services, unless prevented by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Savior; and that, just so far as I know how, throughout my whole life, I will endeavor to lead a Christian life.

As an active member, I promise to be true to all my duties, to be present and to take some part, aside from singing, in every Christian Endeavor prayer-meeting, unless hindered by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Lord and Master. If obliged to be absent from the monthly consecration meeting of the Society, I will, if possible, send at least a verse of Scripture to be read in response to my name at the roll-call.

Form 3.—Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise Him that I will strive to do whatever He would have me do. I will make it the rule of my life to pray and read the Bible, to support the work and worship of my church, and to take part in the meetings and other activities of this Society. I will seek to bring others to Christ, to give as I can for the spread of the Kingdom, to advance my country's welfare and promote the Christian brotherhood of man. These things I will do unless hindered by conscientious reasons, and in them all I will seek the Saviour's guidance.

Form 4.—Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise Him that I will strive to do whatever He would have me do. I will make it the rule of my life to pray and read the Bible, to support the work and worship of my church, and to take my part in the meetings and other activities of this Society. These things will I do unless hindered by conscientious reasons, and in them all I will seek the Saviour's guidance.

Birthday Dinner.

On the 23rd day of April, a large concourse of people gathered at the pleasant home of Mrs. Johnny Rogers to celebrate her birthday. Mrs. Rogers was surprised when she came back from church to find a huge table in her front lawn loaded with good things to eat. At two o'clock dinner was ready; all marched out to the table and partook of the good things. After the crowd was fed enough was left to feed as many more. After dinner we went into the parlor and had a song, after which Rev. J. D. Williams, of Burlington, read a portion of Scripture and led in prayer.

Making Pledges.—The Universal Duty of Making Pledges, Ps. 61:5-8. (Led by the Lookout Committee.)

Some Thoughts on the Scripture Lesson.

(Supplied by Rev. E. A. Watkins.)

Verse 5. Our pledge is primarily a vow made to God. It certainly is no less sacred than other promises. We are quite exact in fulfilling our promises to our fellows, ought we not give much more emphasis to a vow made to our Maker. We need have a care lest we be found untrue and unfaithful to our sacred word, which should be as binding upon us as the most sacred duty and obligation of life.

Verse 6. At the very basis of pledge-making and pledge-keeping is the law of fidelity to one's best self. "Be true to thyself and as the night follows the day, thou canst not be false to any man," is another way of saying that if we are true to our promises, pledges and vows, we are assured of a much longer life and length of days than could possibly come to us, if we disobey this fundamental law of our being. Disobedience to God's law shortens our days. The true life, in all of its relations, has the promise of length of days and a long useful pilgrimage.

Verse 7. "He shall abide before God." The man who is true to himself, and thus true to his fellows and his Maker is so intimately in touch and "in tune with the Infinite," that he is able to "dwell in the secret place of the Most High." God walks in the very presence of the man who makes his pledge of service and then faithfully pays his vow and keeps his word. There is nothing in heaven too good for those who keep faith with God.

Verse 8. We need to remember that God has been faithful and true in performing his promises toward us. "He is not slack in his promises." Wherever and whenever He has had a chance to "Make Good" with us He has done it. Human experience bears testimony to this fact. Now this makes it the more binding upon our part, that we be just as faithful in living our pledges. Pledges unkept dishonor God and do us a moral injury. Furthermore, pledge-keeping should not be considered as a burden or difficult, or we lose its value. The spirit of our pledge is the spirit of praise and gladness. If we keep it merely as a sense of duty and not from a sense of privilege it is not really kept at all.

Helpful suggestions for the Meeting.

There is no magical power in the Christian Endeavor pledge, by which a person is made a better Christian in signing his name to it. It must be kept, if it is to be of any value to us. Only when it is faithfully kept, kept in the spirit of the pledge itself, will it be of any value to us.

The spirit in which we sign the pledge, determines largely our ability to perform it. There is a principle in life that always holds good, viz. that the strength of the resolution determines our ability to carry it out in action. If, when we sign the pledge we put a good strong resolution into the act, that we will move heaven and earth rather than break it, we will have no trouble in keeping it.

It is of considerable importance that we have certain standards by which to measure our lives. We do this in every other department of our life. We cannot get along without it. How much more necessary that we have definite standards of action and service in the realm of morals and religion. One of the elements of Christian Endeavor success has been in its rigid adherence to definite standards. The pledge has been called the heart of the Christian Endeavor Society.

The great philanthropist, John Oberlin, when nineteen years old made this vow: "In the name of the Lord of hosts, I resign all other masters, who have heretofore ruled over me; the world's joys, to which I gave myself; the desires of the flesh, which dwelt in me. I resign every transient thing that God may be my all in all. To Thee I devote all I am and have, the powers of my soul, the members of my body, my time, and my possessions. The Lord's name be to me an eternal witness that I have offered this vow." His life proved that he kept it.

"Mercy" from God, and "truth" within ourselves are the fundamentals of all vows: "mercy" to favor our striving to be true, and "truth" that merits His mercy. These two quite common essentials are within reach of us all, and it is "Better to vow and climb,

And never reach the goal,
Than to drift along with time,
An aimless, worthless soul.

Aye, better to vow and fall,
Or sow, though the yield be small,
Than to throw away day after day
And never vow at all."

WAR.

There can be no question that war is natural to nations. In fact, the carnal world everywhere shows the signs that God has provided for it. He gave fangs to the wolf, horns to the wild ox, sting to the honey bee, and poison to the cobra de capello. To deny these things is hardly candid. For God is the Creator. Only an atheist can logically deny that God gave these weapons to the brute world. He gave them to fight with.

And yet God so ordered the world that although the sheep has little "chance" in a struggle against the panther, in the great battle or war between sheep and panthers there are more surviving sheep than panthers.

When our western plains were first explored by white men, there were more buffaloes than bears. All over the world the animals of a pacific disposition are more numerous than the warlike.

Whether this was true in the geologic ages is a matter of no effective contradiction to the logic of this article; for if the warlike animals in the geologic ages were more numerous than the peaceful, it only goes to show that war thins out the warriors, and that peaceful species survive in the age-long struggle.

That indicates that God has intended that peace shall annihilate war, even though he has given weapons to the beasts of prey. This was also revealed by his Son, who exclaimed, "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword."

This was sadly illustrated in our war with Spain. The "Boston Transcript" of Jan. 14, 1899, reportel Gen. Miles, our well known soldier of different wars, as having used the following language:

"Let it be bourne in mind by the country that out of the army of 325,000 men enlisted in the late war with Spain, only 52,000 saw actual service. The remainden never lift their camps. There remained an army the physical superior of those men who went to the front, and no volunteer army superior to those who remained in camp. And yet, how they faded away with disease, like snow in June.

In thirty days after the army landed in Cuba only a small percentage of the number could walk without being supported. Everyone knows what their condition was when they returned to their own country."

Thus swords, claws, spears, talons, bayonets, fangs, guns, horns, sting, do not conduce to long life, even of the conquerors. War may be natural to the carnal life; but the carnal life leads to death. And possibly God intended that very thing. It is the spiritual nature that tends to immorality and eternal life.

If all this is true, war may be only one f Go's ways of cleansing the earth. And the beasts of prey may be scavengers, or members of Gol's natural street cleaning department. And war between nations may serve an analogous usefulness to that of the bubonic plague, in reducing population in regions where the people will not be clean.

I have sometimes wondered if President Roosevelt actually rendered good service to humanity, whatever his intention, in bringing to an end the war between Japan and Russia. Both of those nations were warlike, and of immense power. But among civilized races they have the undesirable distinction of having given nothing to mankind of special value. If they had been allowed to continue their eminently predatory war till both had been thoroughly exhausted, like lions fighting even unto death, neither one would now be so vigorous in encroaching on China, disturbing, distracting and injuring that peaceful and useful race, that has developed along lines of civilization, discovery and improvement, entirely unique and peculiar among heathen nations. To disturb and invade China, as they have done and are now doing, is as barbarous as for a pair of African lions to enter a herd of African gazelles.

For China has long been a nation that cultivated peace. Possibly it contains one fourth of the human family, notwithstanding its unwarlike character. In China learning was a qualification for civil office long before Europeans had developel to that point. The Chinese printed books long before white men, paper being used there as early as the year 95, and imported into Europe in the year 651. The Chinese first manufactured porcelain; lrst used the mariner's compass; first used gun-powder; and practiced the art of spinning silk 500 years before the white races.

In connection with these things, if it be objected that the Chinese are opposed to reforms and improvements, we should attribute little force to the objection, seeing that China objects more to the foreigner in China, on account of his evil character, his drunkenness, and his fighting propensities; claiming that the average morality in China is superior to that of the white races visiting there.

And the conservation of China as to many other things is based on the human nature of all of us; appreciating her own points of superiority just as the whites respect theirs. The Chinaman objects to the humbug scholar in China, but accepts the telescope; he objects to the opium trader, but uses the microscope; he objects to the railroad king's monopoly of transportation in China, but Chinese own the street system of the city of Torreon in Mexico.

But if China had not cultivated the arts of peace, it is doubtful if fixedness in her old civilization would have enabled the hundreds of millions of people to live within her borders. If she did build a Chinese wall around her country, she did not send a Cortes, and a Pizarro, to another, continent, to overturn a civilization, leaving barbarism behind them.

Notwithstanding God may allow war, or provide for war, for scavenger purposes, it is only in that sense that it promotes the happiness or welfare of humanity.

THE DANGER OF GOING BAREFOOTED.

As the season is now approaching when all children desire to go barefooted, it is well that they should be warned that this pleasure does not come without danger. Until recent years we attached little importance to ground-itch, or toe-itch, so commonly seen amoung barefooted children who go about in the dew or other damp places. We now know that ground-itch is the initial symptom of hookworm disease and that it would not develop unless the soil had been polluted by sufferers from the disease. The myriads of eggs passing daily along with the excretia from their bodies develop into tiny microscopic worms too small to be seen. These, when allowed to come in contact with the skin, burrow through producing an attack of ground itch. The truth of this assertion can be easily proved by making a poultice of polluted soil and applying it for a few hours to some part of the body. Always at the site of such a poultice there develops the ground-itch rash if there be a sufficient number of worms entering the skin.

Moreover, it is known that about fifty days after the attack of ground-itch the little worms that entered the skin will have found their way to the small intestine and there developed to a size sufficient for them to be seen with the naked eye. They are nearly one-half inch in length. The medicine given to get rid of them, by acting as a poison, causes them to be expelled from the body. By washing the stools through cheese cloth they may be collected.

The harm they produce is now well recognized to require discussion at this time. Suffices it to say that the blood is sapped, the body stunted, the vitality lowered. Thus, the life and happiness of those dearest to us may be blasted. It is now time every one should know what is meant by ground itch, hook worm disease, polluted soil, and poor sanitary arrangements. THE PEANUT.

When the first baseball games are played and the circuses start on their annual tours, the peanut assumes an importance which is all its own; but at every season of the year it is justly recognized as the great national nut of the American people. For it is a nut in flavor, as well as in name, although botanically it is an own cousin of the pea and bean, and in cultivation a sister to the potato.

Only within the past forty years has the peanut become of commercial importance. Its early story is veiled in obscurity, but it came to this country from tropical America, like the potato, in the earliest days of colonization, and care-free youth and hale old age have shared together the delights which came with it—and now the peanut-crop is worth at least twelve million dollars each year to the farmers of the Southern States.

The peanut is of many varieties, and locally it has many names. Arachis hypogaea is its technical name, and the one least familiar. Sold hot in paper bags from the whistling roaster, it is best known to the consuming public, but the fact is more and more appreciated that it has numerous other uses. As meal, as butter, as oil and in confections the nut becomes a human food, and the vine, or "peanut hay," is liberally used for fodder and bedding. Moreover, the entire plant is often used in place of corn for fattening stock.

It is now of new value to the farmer, especially where the boll-weevil attacks the cotton. It has the added virtue of not robbing the soil of its fertility. The Department of Agriculture at Washington has recently issued an interesting pamphlet dealing exhaustively with this subject.—Youth's Companion.

Webster's NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary. (G. & C. Merriam Co., Springfield, Mass.) surpasses the old International as much as that book exceeded its predecessor. On the old foundation a new superstructure has been built The reconstruction has been carried on through many years by a large force of trained workers, under the supervision of Dr. W. T Harris, former United States Commissioner of Education, and reenforced by many eminent specialists. The definitions have been rearranged and amplified. The number of terms defined has been more than doubled. The etymology, synonyms, pronunciation, have received unsparing scholarly labor. The language of English literature for over seven centuries, the terminology of the arts and sciences, and the every-day speech of street, shop, and household, are presented with fullness and clearness. ADDRESS TO THE GRADUATING CLASS, WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

By Rev. F. T. Tagg, D. D.

God calls you to be ministers of the gospel. It is not a call of your own. He calls you to point sinners the way of Eternal Life. The first things to consider after you know you have been called of God is the preparation for this great and glorious work. The chief way to prepare for this work is to enter colleges and universities; but, my dear young men, colleges and universities do not make a preacher; it is true they develop the mind but it is the power of God behind the education that makes a preacher of the gospel. Someone has said. A preacher without an education is a sorry figure, but a preacher without religion is a fool. Therefore, seek ye religion, and the preaching will come easy.

When Paul was called to be a minister he prayed and talked with God. He didn't question where he was to go or what he was to say, but went about from place to place, preaching the Gospel of Christ. He didn't first consider the circuit he was on and the salary behind it, nor did he have stewards to collect his salary, or Ladies' Aid Societies to have bazaars to make money, but preached and sometimes didn't know where his next meal would come from. To make his money he carried on his old trade of making tents.

When you are called, do not stop to think whether there is any money there, or stop to consider where you can make the most money, or always be looking in the minutes of the church; seeing where the most money is paid, but go to the slums of the city, the barren counties, or anywhere you are called.

We can all easily sing, "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord, I'll do what you want me to do." I have heard congregations sing it so terribly that I thought they would turn things up-side down, in the next two hours, but nothing happened and nobody went.

When a preacher gets money in his head, he loses right then his religion. I knew a preacher, perhaps all these older men knew him, who got the notion in his head that money was the chief and only thing. He first went into politics and from that on to a lawyer, never once stopping to consider the serious crime he was committing. He made money for a while, but when he died, he didn't have enough money to defray his funeral expenses. He claimed it was his eyes. I think it was his head, heart, and everything. Never, young men, think about money.

When I was starting into the ministry, a man from his very county, Carroll County, said to me, "I understand you are going into the ministry." I answered "Yes, that is what I intend doing," and he replied, "Oh, well, there is no money in that. Why you can't make a living at all," but I answered, "Well, my friend, money is not the only thing I want just now." Some time after that this same man married a girl who had a great amount of money, and, dissatisfied with his present conditions, they set out for the West. They soon ran through with all the money they had and he died sometime back poorer than any preacher I ever saw or heard of. Again, never think you are worse off than other people, or can't dress as well, or go as well in every way as your members. I once thought that, but thank God, I have gotten over that now, and I am satisfied, poor or rich, to lead the life God has planned I should lead.

Then comes this terrible conceit. Universities and colleges do not make a preacher no more than a plug hat and a white tie, so don't think just because you have been through the Westminster Theeological Seminary, you are the greatest preacher on earth, but rather think you are nothing until God has bestowed his power upon you. I have read in a well-known book, and I would suggest that some of you read it: "He who is wise in his own conceit is a fool." Get down on your knees in prayer to God and pray to be made a God-fearing messenger of the Gospel.

Never be above doing anything to the glory of God. I once knew a man who went from the city to preach in a country church. He preached a splendid sermon and afterwards went home with one of the members for dinner. On his way to his home he said, "Well, brother, you have a pretty good congregation down here, but it wouldn't suit me and I wouldn't suit it. I am a city preacher and I couldn't preach down here in the country." God pity that man's soul. Couldn't preach in the country!

One of the greatest missionaries of the world went out on a mission for God to a barren island or desert, where there were no people of his native tongue, nor a place to lay his head. But when he died it was inscribed on his tomb: When he came, there were no Christians; when he died there were no heathen. Oh, could we all have that said about us when God summons us.

Personal work is a great part in the life of a preacher. You need not think you do the preaching, and the congregation should do the personal work. God did not intend in so.

In a meeting once, a preacher had preached his sermon and asked that all the Christian people go out into the congregation and speak to the unconverted friends. After a short time the preacher saw a young man sitting near the front of the church, and went up to talk to him. He found this man was a young preacher just from a theological seminary and there he sat still, while men were going to hell, all around him. The older preacher prayed to God and said, "O, God, open the eyes of this man, to see his position." The young man was stirred as never before, and went to his room and prayed to be forgiven. He was forgiven and the following Sunday he went down to his little church and began a series of revival services, and it was the greatest meeting the old people had ever seen in that community.

Take God as your standard and live up to it. Wesley followed the teachings of Peter Bohler and got from him the beginning of Methodism, which now is over all this country of ours.

Therefore, young men of this graduating class, not only in my behalf, but all the others here, who are interested in you, take up the cross, for where there is no cross there is no crown, and follow Jesus in the way, though it be hard, praying and trusting him daily, pointing sinners to the way of life, that when you come to die, you may hear it said of you, "He was a faithful soldier of the Lord Jesus Christ."

THE BOOK OF SUPREME INFLUENCE.

At Chicago, on May 4, at the celebration of the 300th anniversary of the King James translation of the Bible, Mr. W. J. Bryan delivered the following address:

For nineteen hundred years the battle between the spiritual and the material conceptions of life has raged around the Bible. "Search the Scriptures," was the command of Christ and to the Scriptures the Christian world has turned ever since for its authority.

Atheists and materialists have assailed the Bible at every point; they have disputed the facts which it sets forth and ridiculed the prophecies which it recittes; they have rejected the account which it gives of the creation and scoffed at the miracles which it records. They have denied the existence of the God of the Bible and have sought to reduce the Savior to the stature of a man. They have been as bold as the prophets of Baal in defying the Living God and in heaping contempt upon the written Word. Why not challenge the atheists and the materialists to put their doctrines to the test? When Elijah was confronted by a group of scorners who mocked at the Lord whom he worshiped, he invited them to match the power of their God against the power of his and he was willing to concede superiority to the one who would answer with fire. When the challenge was accepted he built an altar, prepared a sacrifice, and then, to leave no room for doubt, he poured water upon the wood and the sacrifice—poured until the water filled the trenches round about. So firm was his trust that he even taunted his adversaries with their failure while his proofs were yet to be presented. The prophets of Baal, be it said to their credit, had enough confidence in their God to agree to the test, and their disappointment was real when he failed them—they gashed themselves with knives when their entreaties were unanswered.

Why not a Bible test? The Book of Books has lived and grown through the centuries; we are celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of the King James translation. The Christian world has confidence in the Bible; it presents the book as the word of God but the attacks made upon it by its enemies continue in spite of the growth of the Bible's influence. The Christian world, by its attitude, presents a challenge to the opposition and this is an opportune moment to emphasize the challenge—the moment when Christianity over the world is celebrating the triumphs that the Bible has won during the past three centuries.

Is the Bible the work of man, or is it an inspired book? Is it the product of human wisdom, or did its authors speak as they were commanded by the Lord?

Atheists and materialists declare that it is merely the work of man—that it was written under the limitations that apply to human wisdom. Taking this position, they must necessarily contend that, unless man has degenerated in ability and declined in wisdom, he can now produce a book equal to the Bible. Let them produce it.

Judged by human standards, man is far better prepared to write a Bible now than he was when our Bible was written. The characters whose words and deeds are recorded in the Bible were members of a single race; they lived among the hills of Palestine in a territory scarcely larger than one of our counties. They did not have printing presses and they lacked the learning of the schools; they had no great libraries to consult, no steam boats to carry them around the world and make them acquainted with the various centers of ancient civilization; they had no telegraph wires to bring them the news from the ends of the earth and no newspapers to spread before them each morning the doings of the day before. Science had not unlocked Nature's door and revealed the secrets of rocks below and stars above. From what a scantily supplied storehouse of knowledge they had to draw, compared with the unlimited wealth of information at man's command today! And yet these Bible characters grapple with every problem that confronts mankind, from the creation of the world to eternal life beyond the tomb. They have given us a diagram of man's existence from the cradle to the grave and they have set up sign posts at every dangerous point along the path. We turn back to the Bible for the Ten Commandments which form the foundation for our statute law and for the Sermon on the Mount, which lays down the rules for our spiritual growth. The Bible gives us the story of the birth, the words, the works, the crucifixion, the resurrection and the ascension of him whose coming was foretold in prophecy, whose arrival was announced by the Angel voices, singing Peace and Good-will—the story of Him who gave to the world a code of morality superior to anything that the world had known before or has known since—the story of Him who is the growing figure of all time, whom the world is accepting as Savior and as the perfect example.

Let the atheists and the materialists produce a better Bible than ours, if they can. Let them collect the best of their school to be found among the graduates of universities—as many as they please and from every land. Let the members of this selected group travel where they will, consult such libraries as they please, and employ every modern means of swift communication. Let them glean in the fields of geology, botany, astronomy, biology and zoology, and then roam at will wherever science has opened a way; let them take advantage of all the progrsss in art and in literature, in oratory and in history—let them use to the full every instrumentality that is employed in modern civilization; and when they have exhausted every source let them embody the results of their best intelligence in a book and offer it to the world as a substitute for this Bible of ours. Have they the confidence that the prophets of Baal had in their God? Will they try? If not, what excuse will they give? Has man fallen from his high estate, so that we cannot rightfully expect as much of him now as nineteen centuries ago? Or does the Bible come to us from a source that is higher than man—which?

But our case is even stronger. The opponents of the Bible cannot take refuge in the plea that man is retrograding. They loudly proclaim that man has grown and that he is growing still. They boast of a world-wide advance and their claim is founded upon fact. In all matters except in the science of life, man has made wonderful progress. The mastery of the mind over the forces of nature seems almost complete, so far do we surpass the ancients in harnessing the water, the wind and the lightning.

For ages, the rivers plunged down the mountain sides and exhausted their energies without any appreciable contribution to man's service; now they are estimated as so many units of horse-power and we find that their fretting and their foaming was merely a language which they employed to tell us of their strength and of their willingness to work for us. And, while falling water is becoming each day a larger factor in burden bearing, water, rising in the form of steam, is revolutionizing the transportation methods of the world.

The wind that first whispered its secret of strength to the flapping sail is now turning the wheel at the well.

Lightning, the dread demon that, from the dawn of Creation, has been rushing down its zigzag path through the clouds as if intent only upon spreading death has been metamorphosed into an errand-boy and brings us illumination from the sun and carries our messages around the globe.

Inventive genius has multiplied the power of a human arm and supplied the masses with comforts of which the rich did not dare to dream a few centuries ago. Science is ferreting out the hidden causes of disease and teaching us how to prolong life. In every line, except in the line of character-building, the world seems to have been made over, but the marvelous changes by which old things have become new only emphasize the fact that man, too, must be born again, while they show how impotent are material things to touch the soul of man and transform him into a spiritual being. Wherever the moral standard is being lifted up—wherever life is becoming larger in the vision that directs it and richer in its fruitage, the improvement is traceable to the Bible and to the influence of the God and Christ of whom the Bible tells.

The atheist and the materialist must confess that man ought to be able to produce a better book today than man, unaided, could have produced in any previous age. The fact that they have tried, time and time again,, only to fail each time more hopelessly, explains why they will not—why they cannot—accept the challenge thrown down by the Christian world to produce a book worthy to take the Bible's place.

They have prayed to their God to answer with fire—prayed to inanimate matter with an earnestness that is pathetic —they have employed in the worship of blind force a faith greater than religion requires, but their Almighty is asleep. How long will they allow the search for the strata of stone and fragments of fossil and decaying skeletons that are strewn around the house to absorb their thoughts to the exclusion of the architect who planned it all! How long will the agnostic, closing his eyes to the plainest truths, cry "night, night," when the sun in his meridian splendor announces that noon is here.

The Bible has stamped its impress upon the map of the world; its boundaries are clearly marked and the light that emanates from the Christian nations is flowing outward toward those who sit in darkness. Back of the progress that marks the present day is the code of morals that Christ proclaimed and back of that code of morals is the divine character of Him who is both Son of God and Savior of Mankind. It is not necessary to rely upon his birth as a virgin's child or upon his mysterious resurrection to prove his claim to our worship. "He walks today along the shores of every sea" and performs that continuing miracle which we behold when a man begins "to hate the things he loved and to love the things he hated"—that mysterious exercise of mysterious power that converts the selfish, self-centered human being into a center from which good influences flow out in every direction.

The followers of Buddha may look upon life as a misfortune, if they will, and see escape only in the loss of individual identity—"the dew drop melting into the sea:" those who believe in the Bible will still regard life as a great opportunity to be crowned with a Heavenly reward.

The followers of the Arab prophet may put their faith in force and rely upon the sword for proselyting power; those who believe in the Bible will still trust in the persuasive influence of love and depend upon its manifestations to bring recruits to the army of the Prince of Peace.

The followers of Confucius may content themselves with the negative philosophy of their teacher; those who believe in the Bible renew their strength in proportion as they embody in their lives the precepts of Him who would make man a positive force for good—an overflowing spring.

The materialist may confine his thoughts to the things that the senses can weigh and measure; the Christian's faith reaches out toward the throne above and takes hold upon the verities that the mind cannot grasp.

The atheist may delude himself with the thought that he has driven God out of the universe; the Christian sees the Creator everywhere, hears His voice in the promptings of conscience and feels His presence in his heart.

To the doubts and "I do not knows" of the agnostic, the Christian, Bible in hand, answers: "I believe."

DR. HUBBARD WRITES.

Farmer, N. C., May 22, 1911.

To the Editor of M. P. Herald:

I notice with interest two articles in your paper last week which bear on my mind.

The first is by Rev. H. L. Powell on Sunday work by doctors. I know of but one medical man who likes to work on Sunday. He told a man a few years ago that "it is a pity that Sunday comes so that a man cannot work." A large amount of medical work ought to be done on Sunday, but over one half the work which a doctor is expected to do is put off till Sunday. Some years ago I kept account of the unnecessary Sunday work for five weeks; three fifths of this work was demanded by church members. A doctor has a right to a mental rest if not to a soul-refreshing. All hospitals I am acquainted with try to clear up all the work possible on Saturday. A favorite time to send after a doctor is just at S. S. or church time, and they nearly always say to "come at once." Preachers could do a lot on this line.

The other article was by Ruth Fletcher. As long as "big meetings" on Sunday are advertised for months ahead, just so long will people go just to have a good time: some go to chew gum, some to giggle, some to show their hats and mortgaged automobiles, while a large per cent. of the males go to smoke and drink.

One of the greatest curses the church has—inside—is the advertised "big meeting" Sunday. I know a minister who announces all his protracted meetings for weeks ahead, inviting all who possibly can to attend.

Leave your S. S. to go wild. Leave your honest hard-working pastor to all the discouragement you can, telling him in a few days that you were so sorry to be away.

The want of right Sunday observance is the greatest danger to North Carolina.

What I have said has been in good spirit. Print or burn as thought best.

C. C. Hubbard, M. D.

NOTICE TO PASTORS!

Dear Brethren:

Again I am in N. C. in the interst of Western Maryland College. Formerly I have gone only to those charges from which I had received the news of prospective students; this year, however, I hope to visit as nearly as possible every charge in the district in order that I may talk personally with the young people. So unless you write me not to come you may expect to see me sometime during the summer.

If any pastor has any special time he would like for me to visit his charge if he will write me at Asheboro, N. C., I will comply with his request as far as possible.

After two years of experience in the work I am more thoroughly convinced that it pays to look up our young people for college. Many who have been induced to go to Western Maryland will return to this state with increased devotion to the M. P. Church and will labor more intelligently for its success. In fact I know of nothing which pays so well as the education of our young people. For not only those who are now going to college will have their powers for service increased a hundred fold, but these will see to it that young people of the next generation are trained for intelligent service. The strongest asset which any denomination can have is not splendid edifices, but strong, consecrated, and intelligent men and women. In view of this fact will not every pastor co-operate with me in getting our young people to a place where they may be trained for better service?

J. E. Pritchard.

Asheboro, N. C., May 18, 1911.

PUTTING MORE INTO THE CHURCH THAN YOU GET OUT OF IT.

There are some positions of service in the church—pastorates and others—which demand material sacrifice. The men that fill these positions must sometimes pay out more money than they receive and must always receive less than they could get in other positions. These facts should be understood in advance that none may be disappointed. If a man expects to get more than he gives and finds that he must take less, he will feel it a hardship, unless he has in him the spirit of sacrifice.

It may seem unjust that a man should be called to give more than he receives. And it is unjust. And it was unjust when the good Samaritan paid the expenses of the man who had fallen among thieves and been almost killed. It was unjust when Paul worked with his hands so he might preach the Gospel to those who did not appreciate his preaching enough to pay for it, and to those who responded, not with gold and silver, but with stones and clubs. It was unjust when Jesus died on the Cross.

If a man can be only just, if he cannot go beyond that, he will not feel comfortable in a position that demands of him more than it pays to him.

NOTES.

—Rev. J. D. Williams is helping Bro. Johnson in Asheboro this week.

—Bro. R. A. Swearingen is one of the graduating class of Lenoir College, Hickory, N. C., this year.

—The A. & M. College Commencement invitations are handsome this year. We thank Mr. George Romulus Ross, one of the graduating class, for a copy.

—Bro. O. E. Finch, of Union Chapel, Granville Ct., is now home for the vacation. He is a student at the State University.

—The celebration of Dr. Lewis's 25th year in the presidency of Western Maryland College will be combined with commencement this year. The time in June 9-14. There are 14 young men and 27 young women to be graduated this year.

—Dr. Tagg will perhaps be surprised to see so faithful a report of his recent Westminster address in our columns this week. This was written out from memory by a North Carolina young lady, Miss Esther Pickett, of High Point, now a student in Western Maryland College. We thank her for the pains she took.

—We thank Prof. Totten for an invitation to the commencement at Yadkin College this week. We could not go, but hope the occasion will be enjoyed by others.

—The Methodist Protestant reports the death of Rev. J. D. Kinzer, D. D., of the Maryland Conference. We esteemed him highly, and feel that his death brings great loss to our church.

—Bro. H. W. Braswell writes in a private note quite hopefully of prospects in Lincolnton. On a lot 100 by 150, a church 36 by 44 with recess pulpit in one corner is to be built. He says Rev. W. D. Reed is helping with his money as well as his influence, and that the effort to build is meeting with the approval of the business men of the place. Read Bro. Johnson's article from Lincolnton.

—Dr. T. H. Lewis's sermon to the graduating class at the State Normal College last Sunday was heard by a large audience. It set before the young women in neat and forcible language the graces of Hospitality, Contentment, and Consolation as belonging in pre-emenent degree to womankind. The text was the words of the Shunammite woman, "I dwell among mine own people." Though the speaker was not in best condition, the sermon elicited strong commendation.

—Bro. Dixon asks about the report of Sunday-school attendance. We failed to publish a few times and some of the reports failed to come in several times, and perhaps this awakened a general feeling that there was not much interest in the matter. Our failure to publish was not due to lack of interest in the matter, but to adverse circumstances. If there are as many as five Sunday-schools that will report regularly, we will try to print the report each week. What say the superintendents and secretaries? May we expect your report?

LOOK TOWARDS THE LIGHT.

A weary and discouraged woman, after struggling all day with contrary winds and tides, came to her home, and flinging herself into a chair, said: "Everything looks dark, dark!"

"Why don't you turn your face to the light, aunty dear?" said a little niece who was standing near.

The words were a message from on high, and the weary eyes were turned toward him who is the light and life of men, and in whose light alone we see light.

"Turn your face to the light," O weary watcher; you have looked, and longed, and struggled in the darkness without avail; now turn your glance the other way! "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give unto us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ;" and if we look toward the light, and walk in the light, we shall find blessing and peace all along our way; and even amid darkness and shadows shall rejoice in hope of the glory of God, the light of an unsetting day.—The Christian.

WHO? WHENCE? WHITHER?—A REVERIE.

I am an immortal spirit! My home is in heaven. My Father is God. My Elder Brother is my Saviour, my best friend—the maker of heaven and earth. I belong to both time and eternity. I am only loaned to the world, for a brief time, to illumine a portion of its night. My Father bids me shine. My days here are all known to God. My life is "immortal till my work is done."

Nothing can happen to me except by his permission, and he undertakes to overrule all of my mistakes. "My times are in his hands." I am here doing business for him. Up yonder on his kingly throne he is keeping the books. He notes well all my advice. He commands my feet, and they move, he charges my lips, and they speak; he touches my hands, and they at once spring into motion. He fills my heart with his love, thus making it both holy and harmless. He fills my day with his joy, and illumines my path with his truth.

He comforts my heart with his Spirit; he enlightens my soul with his word; he maps out my path, he enables me to walk in his will, and the center of his will is my highest earthly heaven. He bids me be of "good cheer." I live on his bounty; I revel in his smile; I feast on his love! I nestle in his heart. The "everlasting arms" are my support.

He feeds me with manna from heaven; commands his angels to garrison me about; he fights my battles, until all of my enemies are subdued. He washes me in the blood of his Son; he imparts and imputes unto me the righteousness of Christ, he freely gives to me grace according to my need; he enthrones Christ in my heart, so that "for me to live is for Christ to live."

He gives me his peace, and lets me call it mine; he fills me with his impulses and ambitions; "his gentleness makes me great." His interests are all identical with mine; I have nothing apart from him. "Because he lives I shall live also."

My Father hath also identified me with the ages to come. He says I shall be a king and a priest unto God and the Lamb forever and ever.

My identity is established. My crown is assured. My reward is guaranteed. And my Savior and Brother is now in glory, preparing a mansion for me. I shall return to my "Father's house" some glad day, and I have his promise that I shall see him as he is. "Where I am there shall my servant be also." And I "shall be like him, for I shall see him as he is."—Milton M. Bales, D. D.

REJOICE IN THE LORD.

We cannot rejoice greatly in ourselves. We may try to find joy in our own wisdom, or strength, or goodness, or possessions and achievements. But all such rejoicing is vain. We cannot rejoice in the world, for the fashion of the world passeth away. Joy rooted in the world, like grain rooted in shallow soil, will soon wither.

To rejoice in the Lord is to rejoice in sacrifice. The song and the sacrifice go together. This is contrary to the thoughts of men. They try to avoid sacrifice and toil because they imagine that this is the way of sorrow and pain. But Jesus knew better. He knew that the path of life lies through the valley of death and the way of joy is in a vale of tears. He went to the cross that He might fill the world with joy. The Man who has done more to make mankind happy than all others was "a Man of Sorrows." The joy of a mother is not found in shirking sacrifice. She lays down her life for her children and rejoices in the sacrifice.

Dr. Jowett says, "In the world the coveted plums are the places of ease, and men are counted lucky in proportion as they attain leisure indolence." But in the kingdom of God the case is reversed. They are to be congratulated who have the hard places. The soldier counts it an honor to be sent to the post of danger. He glories more in the scars of battle than in all the badges the government can confer on him. So Paul said: "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," and again, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus."

Dr. John Griffith, one of the bravest missionaries to the Chinese, tells us that one day he found himself surrounded by a howling mob of savage pagans, who gnashed on him with their teeth, as if they would tear him to pieces. They tried to crush him with violence, and when he put his hand to his face, which had been smitten, he found it covered with blood, and felt himself possessed with an extraordinary sense of exultation because he was counted worthy to suffer pain and shame for the sake of the Lord Jesus.

Let us learn this lesson. Shirk sacrifice and pain, and you will live and die without tasting one drop of real joy, but deny yourself, take up your cross and follow Christ, and your cup of joy will be full and running over.

To rejoice in the Lord is to rejoice in hope. "Rejoicing in hope of the glory of God." The Christian has a splendid outlook. Some men tell us to dismiss from our minds all thoughts of the future because it is hid from our view. Think only of the present, for this we can see, and this only is our own. Shut the eye and close the mind against the future. This is vain counsel. The beasts of the field may obey this counsel, for they have no powers of anticipation; but hope is a large part of the life of man. Tell me not to dismiss the future. I cannot. I belong to the future even more than to the present. The Christian anticipates the future with joy because Jesus died and rose again.

To rejoice in the Lord is to rejoice continually. "Rejoice evermore." We expect happiness in the young. It is their nature to be glad. Joy beams in their eyes, glows on their cheeks, rings in their shouts, bounds in their steps and throbs in their hearts. But in the old the springs of joy have dried up. Yet we see Paul, bowed down under the weight of years, bound with fetters, tortured with persecution and thrust into prison, shouting to his fellow disciples, "Rejoice, again I say, rejoice!" Roman authorities could shut up his body in prison, but they could not imprison his spirit. The Jews could torture his body with persecution, but could not touch his soul. Paul was as free as a bird and as happy as an angel, because his joy was rooted in the Lord of life and glory. Earthly joy is shortlived. It springs up in the morning, in the evening it is cut down. Where are the joys of youth? Where are the joys of ten years ago? They are only a memory. But the joy of the Lord which filled the soul in childhood and in youth is with us still. It is the same yesterday, today and forever.—N. Y. Christian Advocate.

OUR FATHER'S HOUSE.

By H. A. Brown..

Surely Jesus would have never touched that tender chord about our Father's house if He had not intended to satisfy the immortal yearnings of our spiritual natures.

It may be all right that we should be immensely concerned about the progress of His Kingdom here and now. It is well that we should give ourselves to unremitting efforts to build up His cause on the earth. But one supreme inspiration in service and suffering here is the thought of fellowship and unending blessedness in the Father's house above. We are pilgrims folding our tents each night a day's march nearer home.

When Bunyan saw his pilgrim pass through the shining gates and receive a greeting from those gone before he could but wish himself there. Judson said: "I am not tired of my work, neither am I tired of the world; yet when Christ calls me home, I shall go with the gladness of a boy bounding away from school."

We are coming, blessed Master, slowly coming, through the dust and toil and chastened suffering up to our Father's house—Biblical Recorder.

Questions.

Two questions: 1. How about the innocence of the children of Israel under the age of 20 years?

2. How about the majority of the spies that brought an evil report.

This whole subject arises because of the tradition that the majority rules.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

LINCOLNTON.

Editor of M. P. Herald:

Through the columns of your paper we want to let the good people know about what we have done and are going to try to do here in Lincolnton. We have an organganized body here of 35 members. We have bought a lot for the church 100X150 feet on the corner on a beautiful elevated place in view of 500 people. We have the deed for the lot and it paid for. We have let the contract for the building to be complete by the earliest possible moment. The church building when complete will be one any town of small size should be proud of. We have no small amount of opposition. When through it will be as gold tried in fire. We are looking to the Lord to lead, and if the good people lend a helping hand, in five months we will be able to hold the M. P. banner high in Lincolnton for King Immanuel. Lincolnton is one of the most healthy old towns in the State. We have almost the best water system in the South. We have a splendid sewage system. Also the town is electric-lighted. Lincolnton is noted for its summer resorts, having two noted springs from which water is shipped almost everywhere in the South. Lincolnton has many advantages which all M. P. people should learn. I have almost come to the conclusion that Bro. Reed and Bro. Braswell have learned some of the advantages of Lincolnton and its surroundings. We had only one Methodist church here until the M. P. Church was organized. Lincolnton has something over 3,000 inhabitants. I think we should all be proud that we can at night before we retire while on our knees holding communion with our Leader, Jesus Christ, thank our Heavenly Father that we have at last a Methodist Protestant Church in Lincolnton. We wish to thank the Conference for sending us Bro. Braswell and in advance thank it for anything it may do for the noble cause here in the future.

With thanks and best wishes to all.

D. B. Johnson.

Lincolnton's forward movement this year must be gratifying to all our readers who appreciate the importance and the difficulties of progress in such situations. —Ed.

PILOT CHURCH.

Our pastor, Rev. A. L. Hunter, was with us both first Sunday and second Sunday night, and delivered two excellent sermons. He always comes with a pleasant smile and a cheerful word; but I am glad to say that for the last two appointments he brought his wife and daughter Bessie with him, which we appreciated. We were glad to have them in our homes and hope they will come again soon.

Our Sunday school is not attended as well as it should be, but is good. There is much work to be done to get others interested. Our special meeting will begin the fourth in August with Bro. Jesse Pritchard, of Westminster, Md., as pulpit help. We want all Christians to pray for this meeting. We took a collection last Sunday for the purpose of buying some small hymn books for our church to have for the congregation, as we want to invite all who come to help in the singing.

I don't like this way of going to church and seeing one little choir back up in the corner singing and the congregation sitting back looking like something had their tongue and guying at the choir. I like to see everybody sing and praise the Lord, for there is only one life worth living here, and that is the Christian life. For when we all get to Heaven, if we do, we will all sing praises to God together,—not just a few over in one corner. All will be as one band then. So let us try to do as the Lord has commanded us here on earth.

Will close by asking this: Who and how many will tell me in the next issue where the shortest verse in the Bible is, and what it is?

I enjoy reading all the reports from other girls very much. With much success to the Herald and its many readers,. I am yours in Christ. Etta Whitaker.

Pinnacle, N. C., R. 3.

PALESTINE, FLAT ROCK CT.

We haven't a reporter for this church, so I make a little report.

Our pastor, Rev. W. F. Kennett, filled his regular appointment here, Sunday; he preached a good sermon to a large congregation, his text being Isaiah 53:11, He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied. We have a good start for a Sunday school and hope to have a good one. We were glad to have our pastor and wife spend the day with us last week: hope they will come again soon. Am sorry to note that Uncle Jim Sharon is very feeble.

I will close with best wishes to the Herald. A Member.

GUILFORD CIRCUIT.

Dear Herald:

As our reporters seem to be slow about writing I will try to let you all know how we are getting along. We have at present eight good Sunday schools on this work. Some of them are extra good. The church attendance is fine and still increasing. We expect to hold children's day services at several of the churches soon.

The children's day which was to have been at Shady Grove the 4th Sunday in May has been called in on account of measles in the neighborhood. Children's day service will be held at Fairfield church the 1st Sunday in June, and at Hickory Grove the 3d Sunday in June.

The brethren have placed a new roof on Shady Grove church.

It is with sorrow that we note the extreme illness of Bro. Oakley, of Hickory Grove; also Mrs. Scott of Fairfield; also Miss Lizzie Hohn is very sick at this writing. We beg an interest in your prayers for them.

The people seem to be hopeful. Pray for us that this may be indeed a fruitful year. T. A. Plyler.

GRANVILLE.

Yesterday was a good day with us. Large attendance at Antioch in the morning. Services at Union Chapel at 3:30. About every lady present here gave their names to join a Ladies' Aid Society. We also organized or rather secured twelve names of our brightest and best young people for a teacher training class. This is all encouraging. Union Chapel have children's day services 4th Sunday. Bro. S. R. Harris, of Henderson, will make an address on Missions. I go to-day to help Bro. C. L. Whitaker in a meeting at Whitaker's. Pray for us. N. G. Bethea.

ASHEVILLE.

Two new good members last Sunday, Brother and Mrs. Younginer. They came to us from the Lutheran Church. They have four children who will be brought up in our Sunday school. He is a mail clerk on the Asheville-Columbia line.

One hundred forty in Sunday school; 29 at Woolsey Hall and 26 at Woodfin Hill. Our second quarterly conference nominated W. A. Swain and J. W. Barrett for delegate to Annual Conference.

Miss Mabel Williams of the Denton Orphanage stopped over a day last week on her way to the annual meeting of the Women's Board meeting in Kentucky.

Miss Jessie Rowe Williams went to Concord the last of the week. Our friend Mrs. Fannie Eller Keith is still critically ill.

The new pastor for Weaverville circuit, Brother R. L. Troxler, arrived last Saturday. J. S. W.

Efland Church.

A large congregation attended services Sunday, the 21st. Also the largest communion service we have had at this church.

Mrs. Grover Bivens joined the church, bringing her membership from the Christian Church.

Bro. W. H. Jones, who has been visiting friends and relatives at High Point and Thomasville the past few weeks, has returned home improved in health.

Mr. F. R. Brittain, our faithful Sunday school Supt., came down from Greensboro to attend church Sunday.

Bro. W. R. Thompson who has been suffering from heart trouble the past week is very much improved; also Charley Brown, who has the fever.

Mrs. Dickey, of S. C., is visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Pratt.

Miss Nora Pratt returned to Raleigh to day after a week's visit with home folks. H. C.

Haw River Ct.

We held our 2nd quarterly conference at Friendship last Saturday, May 13th, inst. Every church represented except Sandy Cross. There are good Sunday schools at each church except two. Some two or three will hold Children's Day service. The finances are right much in arrears. The year is half out. It was decided to hold a Sunday school circuit rally at Midway on Saturday before the 4th Sunday in August. We will have an all-day service and expect some good addresses; also we will invite our president to be with us and select his own subject and we hope he can come and remain over Sunday and preach for us. Bros. J. M. Weatherly and Walter Maxville, both of Friendship, were nominated as nominees for delegates to the Annual Conference. Two years ago three of Friendship's members went to Conference and Bro. J. M. Jones said their choice of a pastor had been satisfactory and insisted on the above nomination. It made the pastor feel good to hear the good things said and I feel safe in saying I never was in a more harmonious Conference. The next conference is to be held at Mispah Church. Uncle Joe Fetzer was out and we enjoyed having him with us, and I believe he enjoyed it. He is an Episcopal but does not let his church relations cut any figures. He says he intends to be at Fair Grove tomorrow. Hope he will. The good sisters had a fine, good dinner, and many were there to enjoy it. Our special meetings will be as follows:

Midway, 4th Sunday in July; Rev. J. H. Moton to help.

Bethany, 5th Sunday in July; Rev. Edword Suits to help.

Mizpah, 1st Sunday in August; Rev. T. E. Davis to help.

Friendship, 2nd Sunday in August; Rev. G. F. Millaway and Rev. Jesse Pritchard, to help.

Fair Grove, 3rd Sunday in August, Rev. J. A. Ledbetter to help.

Brown Summit, 3rd Sunday in in October; Rev. T. H. Matthews to help.

We hope these brethren can be with us on Sunday. I will write each one where to come to on train. We have been kindly remembered, Bro. Pinkney Summers and wife a nice hen; Bro. Fletcher Stallings a load of wood. Sister gave Treva two little ducks. Mr. J. H. Burton, of Reidsville, six cans of nice dessert peaches, for which we are truly thankful.

I want to say a word more about Sandy Cross. Bro. J. A. Glenn is one of the older members who still lives where he has for a long time; he has to come about 5 miles; he and his family, that are at home, are always at Sandy Cross when well enough. He has been superintendent for years and the people did not seem to appreciate his efforts. I believe they will now, if he is able to attend to it. We had a good congregation at Fair Grove and Brown Summit yesterday. They have a good Sunday school at Grove. Bro. Isaac Toxler is Supt. Bro. Turner Richardson, Sec., and reporter to our paper.

Fraternally.

C. E. M. Raper.

High Point.

Just a note to say we are glad we have reached the point where we have the largest attendance in Sunday school of any church in the conference. That is true unless some body's record beat us last Sunday. Our attendance for May has been 229, 228, and 237. Still we are not satisfied with that as long as there are so many about us who are not in any S.S. We are making a systematic canvass to secure others.

What has become of our Sunday school report in the Herald? Haven't seen anything of it for several weeks.

Last Sunday Bishop Atkins, of the M. E. Church, preached at the closing of the High Point Graded schools. All the churches in town closed for the service, and united in worship at the school auditorium. The Bishop preached a splendid sermon.

At night the electric power was off, so only about two churches in town had services.

Our efficient reporter, Bro. R. T. Pickers, has been in Georgia all the spring. We miss him on the Sunday school and in the church services, and we miss his reports [illegible]h. Wish we might have a word from him where he is. We are hoping to have him back in High Point soon.

Antioch, Mecklenburg Ct.

The writer was appointed the 14th to make a report of our church, but not knowing the Editor's address, failed to get in the report last week.

Our Sunday school is doing very nicely. We have an attendance of from 36 to 50. Have preaching once a month, the 2nd, by our pastor, Rev. Mr. Self, who, I think, is loved by all and whom I, for one, enjoy hearing very much.

Mr. Aner Haywood was appointed Supt. of our school with Mr. Phifer assistant. While our school might be a little larger (and I hope it will be) we have a very good attendance, as our congregation is small. Pray for our school that we may do God's bidding, and bring the little ones unto the fold; also the older ones.

A Teacher.

Zoar, Mecklenburg Ct.

Our pastor filled his regular appointment at this place Sunday, the 21st. He preached a most helpful sermon to a large congregation. We are so pleased to see so many out. We had the largest attendance we have had since during the meeting last summer. We all like our pastor and everybody seems to be interested in his preaching, and after having such a good congregation Sunday morning, our good pastor took it on himself to hold service again in the afternoon at 7:30, and again preached a splendid sermon and the church was almost full again. It just seems like a special meeting and that there was much good to be done, and it seemed like the pastor could not leave while he could do any one good, and he preached again the following Monday night; a very good congregation. We thank our pastor, Rev. J. W. Self, for his kindness and good preaching. Our special meeting will begin at this place the fourth Sunday in July. We ask the prayers of all readers that we may have a successful meeting and that great and lasting good may be accomplished.

Sunday school is getting on nicely.

Best wishes to the Herald and its many readers. Reporter.

Orange.

Dear Herald Readers:

We held our second Quarterly Conference at Chestnut Ridge Church on Saturday last. The number present was very disappointing. It seems almost impossible to get the rank and file interested in church meetings and Conferences. It seems to me that one of our greatest needs of the day is more men and women with enough religion and love for the church to prompt them to make sacrifices for the cause of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We had but little business to transact at our Quarterly Conference which was done quickly and harmoniously. T. O. Ponder and G. W. Riley were elected nominees for delegate to Annual Conference. The various reports were fair. The pastor has received on salary for the past three months, corn wheat, live-stock and cash to the value of $80.90 from Chestnut Ridge and $42.00 from Union Grove. We are a little behind, but Orange County farmers are like many others, "in poor circumstances" until about "Fall." Unfortunately we are heavily indebted, but through prayers, faith and earnest effort, we hope to lighten our burden considerably before the year closes.

We desire the prayers of the church at large, that we may become more active and loyal members of the church, abounding in the grace of liberality towards the work of the Lord. Parson.

Mt. Zion Church

Still much encouragement with us. The S. S. is advancing in number and interest, although it is not as large as it should be. We would be glad if more older people would attend. I think it would make the school more interesting. Attendance, Sunday, 55.

Bro. Hunter was here Sunday, it being his regular appointment. He gave us a good sermon.

We are glad to have Mr. T. C. Barber with us again, who is a graduate from Raleigh, N. C. He will return to his work June 1st.

Best wishes to all. Reporter.

Lee's Chapel, Halifax Circuit.

Our new pastor, Rev. L. W. Geiringer, filled his first appointment at this church last Sunday. He preached an excellent sermon to quite a large and attentive congregation. Our vocabulary is too limited to even attempt to express how delighted we are to have a preacher, but how sad to think he will be with us such a short time.

Our Sunday school is getting along very nicely, although it could be much better. We would be glad to see both old and young take more interest in it.

We hope to begin preparations for Children's Day soon. May the Lord help us to make a success.

We wish to ask the dear readers of the Herald to pray for our special meeting which will begin the third Sunday in August. Reporter.

Mt. Carmel, Granville Ct.

Our S. S. report of last Sunday was as follows: total enrollment, 73; present, 49; total collections, fifty-three cents; five new scholars and three visitors. Special attention is called to the success of Class No. 3, taught by Miss Mary Finch. This entire class numbering twelve has been present every Sunday of this month up to date. Is not that an usual record? What does this success indicate in our S. S.? One word explains it, that is, "Religion."

Bro. Bethea is away this week. I suppose helping in a special meeting. Hope he will not happen to what he did once. Last year he came to help in the special meeting of this church, so from this we determined to, and do, have him with us continuously. We are glad for him to help our brethren but wish no such result as this, you may imagine.

W. Polk Garrett.

Hawkins Chapel, Littleton Ct.

Bro. Fishel was with us Sunday, as Bro. Taylor was off helping in a special meeting; he preached a good and noble sermon. The subject was: "Fear ye not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows." We were all glad to have Bro. Fishel to come and preach for us and ask him through the Herald to come again. There was a very good congregation out to hear him, though not as many as would have been, owing to measles.

Some of our Sunday school scholars have been absent for a Sunday or two; hope they will soon be able to be with us again.

Our Easter service was fairly good; the collection was two dollars and sixty some cents. Vannah Shearin, Rep.

Rockingham.

Our second quarterly meeting was held last Saturday night at McFarlan. It was the most pleasant conference I have ever attended since I have been in the M. P. Church. Every thing was done in a spirit of love. Two churches were represented. Pee Dee church was represented by a large delegation. Eleven young men and women drove through the country from R. to the Pee Dee river and crossed the wide stream in a boat at Martin's fishery. When we landed on the other side the good people of McFarlan had met us there with wagon and carriage to land us safe into McFarlan, and we reached the town in good time to find good hospitable homes and enjoy a big supper before going to church. The names of the visitors from Rockingham to McFarlan on that occasion were, W. T. Collins, Mrs. H. M. Collins, Misses Elma Collins, Reina and Alice Webb, Anna May McQueen, Miss Emma Nortin, Miss Leala Whitly, C. A. Thrower, Vick Shephard, J. Ezell McSwain. We found comfortable homes to spend the night Saturday at Mr. and Mrs. Lee Northcuts, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Braswells, Mr. and Mrs. Lamar Braswells, Mr. and Mrs. Jule Teals, Mr. and Mrs. Sq. Brooks, Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Hurst, Mrs. S. A. Braswell.

The conference nominated Mr. W. S. Braswell and Mr. C. A. Thrower, for delegate to our next Annual Conference. Miss Anna May McQueen, Mr. W. G. Moore, are the alternates. We returned to Rockingham Sunday evening; to the river in the same turnouts, crossed the river in the same boat. Rockingham turnouts met us at river again. May God bless Bros. Teal and Braswell for their teams which brought us from and carried us back to the river, free of charge.

Miss Annie Collins of this place visited and spent the day in Charlotte last Friday and Friday night, then took the train Saturday morning for Shelby to be the guest of her sister there, Mrs. Rev. H. W. Braswell. She returned home Sunday night with a good report from the revival now in progress by Bros. Reed and Braswell. Mr. R. L. Little of this place is now visiting his father and mother near the town of Marshville, N. C.

Mr M. E. Mills who has been helpless for the past 8 months is improving some.

J. E. McS.

Friendship, Haw River Ct.

We had a very good Sunday school Sunday. There were about 85 present. The Sunday school decorated the cemetery with flowers. We were glad to have Mr. E. O. Pritchett, one of our former Sunday school members, with us. He gave us an interesting address.

We will give out our Children's Day pieces next Sunday.

We are glad to say that Mrs. Walter Wagoner, who has been quite sick, is better. Blanche Weatherly, Rep.

Burlington.

213 at Sunday school last Sunday. Our Supt., Bro. Rodgers, was absent on account of sickness, and Bro. G. L. Amick, the Asst., was at his father's, who is very sick. Bro. L. W. Holt presided over the S. S. in their absence and did it well.

The preaching service Sunday morning was well attended. The night service was called in on account of the Baccalaureate Sermon of the City Schools at the Presbyterian Church. The pastor is away this week and will be gone over next Sunday. However, he will secure someone to preach Sunday morning, and Bro. Homer Casto, of Efland charge, will preach at night.

On last Sunday evening at the home of the bride in North Burlington, Mr. Henry B. Cole and Miss Maud Workman were united in marriage. Bro. Williams officiated. We wish for them a long and happy married life.

Our special meeting will begin on the third Sunday in June. Bro. Williams has not, as yet, secuerd any help, but expects to do so. He asks that any who desire to do so, say whom they would like for him to secure. We are hoping for a great meeting. T. T. S., Reporter.

Midway, Haw River Ct.

Dear Herald:—Our Sunday school is moving along nicely. There were 75 present the second Sunday and 67 last Sunday. Our attendance is not as good yet as we would like for it to be. We are all pleased with our new Superintendent and think he is doing a good work.

Bro. G. R. Wright conducted prayer-meeting 2nd Sunday. The meeting was well attended, but it seems that we do not manifest the interest in our prayer meetings that we should.

Pray for us. Reporter.

C. E. TOPIC FOR JUNE 4—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

Prof. W. A. Harper.

Lessons from Samuel—I Sam. 12:1-6, 13-25. (Monthly Consecration Meeting).

Roll Call: Call the roll from the bottom up, but do not let it be known that it will be so called ahead of time. Have Scripture verses from the two books of Samuel only in response to this roll call.

Scripture: Let the leader read the narrative portions, the president of the Society Samuel's words, and the entire Society the words of all the people.

Leader's Remarks: This is an appropriate Consecration Scripture—it represents the call and consecration of one of the great religous leaders of the ages. Samuel would have been an ideal Christian Endeavorer. It is for us to pattern after his life, draw truths and lessons for our guidance therefrom ,and so become better Christian Endeavorers. A life such as his, dedicated and consecrated to God is a constant source of inspiration and helpfulness to the Christian world. He was endowed with the qualities of leadership—his leadership was of the helpful kind—he pushed and pulled rather than pointed out the way. The world, particularly our own church, needs more of such leadership today. If we can but impart to our young people the spirit of Samuel, we shall have it.

Written Work: Have essays on "The Value of Consecration to Christ;" "How Best to Consecrate Ourselves;" "Points of Weakness in our Society;" "The strength of our Society."

Questions for Voluntary Answer:

What influence did Samuel's mother have over his life?

What good tendencies did he inherit?

What evil did he have to fight against in his advancement?

Ought children be allowed to go home after Sunday-school and before Church?

What lesson do you get from his life? (To several.)

What good thing did he do for his people? (To several.)

How does God call us today?

What influence did prayer have in his life?

How does he help us in disappointment?

How does his life teach unselfishness?

Oil.—Almost contemporaneous with the decision of the U. S. Supreme Court dissolving within the next six months the Standard Oil Company, this being held as a corporation doing business in restraint of trade, comes the announcement from Mexico of the tapping of the most abundant oil vein yet found in the world's history. From which one would decide that oil for lights and lubrications is to be abundant, and within the reach of every one. The story of this "gusher" at Tuxpan, Mexico, reads like fiction: "With the gate valve holding at least 300 pounds pressure, the great oil well in the Potrero del Llano field is still doing regularly more than 125,000 barrels of oil a day. That it is by far the biggest producing oil well ever drilled is asserted by all oil men who have witnessed its performances. The output of oil during the ninety-two days up to April 1 that had elapsed since the flow was struck was more than 12,000,000 barrels. This is a conservative estimate in view of the fact that several million barrels flowed into Buena Vista River and thence to the Tuxpan river and out to sea. Approximately 8,000,000 barrels of oil from this well have been saved and are now in storage. One reservoir covers more than forty-five acres and is more than thirty feet deep in the central portion. It now contains 5,000,000 barrels of oil. Other smaller reservoirs are full of the product and an army of men are kept constantly at work building additional storage places for the unremitting flow.

The market value of the crude oil at the well is $1 Mexican money or fifty cents gold a barrel. The value of the daily output is, therefore, more than $60,000 gold, or nearly $2,000,000 a month.

Even at the present rate of flow it is found impossible to save all of the oil, and many thousands of the oil, and many thousands of dollars' worth goes to waste each day. For more than a mile around the well the low places are filled with pools of oil.

Among the necessities of mankind oil, like salt, ranks with those in most common use, and so like salt, the good and gracious God has made it in lavish abundance. And nothing shows more clearly the infinite interest in mankind by the Creator than His bountiful provision for our common needs and comfort.

UNIVERSAL PEACE.

Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Mic. 4:3. (Golden text for Sunday, May 28.

We use these forceful lines from the New York Christian Advocate:

The eighth century heard the voices of four great Hebrew prophets. Amos and Hosea spoke in Israel. Isaiah and Micah spoke in Judah. Amos, the sheep herder of Tekoa, was the prophet of the righteousness of God. His passionate utterances fairly blaze with a sense of moral demand. Hosea, the broken-hearted man, who spoke out of a devastated home, was the prophet of the love of God—a deep ethical love, longing to rescue his erring people. Isaiah, the statesman-prophet and companion of kings, was a man of the city, accustomed to its ways and moving easily in its life. Micah lived in a country village. He was a typical man of the people and his voice hardens into stern anger with a sense of their wrongs. He is a voice crying in an evil day against social injustice. There is no hesitation and no compromise in the words of Micah. He describes the evil of his time with a candor which leaves nothing to be said, and his condemnation breaks out in words of unforgetable power.

The most cursory reader of the Hebrew prophets cannot fail to be struck with the vigorous and unhesitating way in which they dealt with the problems of their own time. They faced its evils. They condemned its abuses. They declared that God was watching the evil ways of evil men and that punishment was sure to come. They were conscious of their time and they made religion a practical thing which related itself to the whole range of human activity.

Religion is sure to warm the heart. It

MARRIED.

Efland-Forrest.

A pretty wedding was solemnized in the parlors of the Hotel Raleigh at Raleigh, May 15th, when Estelle Forrest beame the bride of Mac. P. Efland. On account of the death of the groom's brother, the wedding was a quiet affair and was witnessed by only a few friends. Mr. Efland is one of the leading men in the Efland church, and his bride is the youngest daughter of the late S. T. Forrest, and is organizt of the Efland Church.

The ceremony was performed by their pastor, Rev. Homer Casto. After a few days spent in the North the happy young couple will be at home to their many friends in Efland.

—Mr. John G. Gamble and Miss Belle Layton, two young people from Tabernacle, were married at the editor's home yesterday at 5:30 P. M. They have our wishes for their continued happiness.

DIED.

Raymond McGehee.—On Friday, May 12th, 1911, Raymond McGehee, the nine year old son of Mr. A. S. McGehee, was taken very suddenly ill and in spite of all that could be done for him he passed away on Saturday morning, May 13.

Raymond lived here in High Point with his grand parents, his mother having preceded him to the heavenly home. His father works in Norfolk, and did not know anything of the illness of his child until the news reached him that the child was dead.

Raymond attended Sunday school regularly at the Methodist Protestant church, and was a bright, interesting boy.

This is the first death in our Sunday school during the present pastorate.

It was a great shock to his loved ones, as to us all, as death came so unexpectedly. The funeral services were conducted at the home of the grandparents on Sunday afternoon. About fifty of his little Sunday school mates met at the church and marched in a body to the funeral, nearly all of them bearing flowers. The services were conducted by the writer assisted by Rev. J. H. Barnhardt. The body of little Raymond was laid to rest in the cemetery in Greensboro by the grave of his mother. The bereaved ones have our tenderst sympathy in this unexpected loss.

In His Name,

PROHIBITION BLESSES.

Experience of Kansas Answers Flippant Misrepresentations.

Governor Stubbs, of Kansas, gives the following facts and figures in regard to the workings of prohibition in the "Sunflower State":

The death rate in Kansas is the lowest of any state or nation on earth—only 7 1-2 per thousand.

Under prohibition population has increased 100 per cent., while the number of convicts has only increased 17 per cent.

More than 50 per cent. of the county jails are without a prisoner under conviction, and last year 49 out of 105 counties did not send a prisoner to the penitentiary.

The ratio of convicted prisoners is one for every 700 inhabitants, while 75 per cent. of the jail prisoners have been convicted for violation of the prohibition law.

Fifty-four counties are without an idiot, and 87 without an insane person in the asylums.

The first few years of prohibition showed a decrease of 4 per cent. of divorce cases.

Ninety-six counties have not an inebriate. Six of the nine counties furnishing inebriates were counties bordering the wet section of Missouri.

In education this is the status: Kansas has a permanent school fund of $10,000,000, most of it invested in municipal bonds of cities of Kansas, which offer the safest kind of investment. There are normal schools established in 100 of the 105 counties.

During the last nine years the enrollment of the State University has increased from 1,150 to 2,063, the Agricultural College from 870 to 2,192, besides 9,000 young pupils attending denominational institutions and 4,548 attending business colleges. School property is worth $16,000,000.

There are 700 newspapers and magazines and 98 per cent. of them will not admit liquor advertisements to their columns.

The first 20 years of prohibition reduced illiteracy 40 per cent.

The increase of wealth within the last ten years has been in bank deposits from $169,000,000 to $189,000,000. The per capita increase has been from $60 to $113.

The increase of taxable property has been very rapid for that period. The total assessed valuations of property in Kansas is $2,425,091,859, which far exceeds the assessments of most of the states with equal opportunities. The State tax is 90 cents per $1,000, a very low rate.

The garnishment courts that ran continuously under liquor conditions have been put out of business.

Forty-nine of the county poor farms have been turned into experiment stations with the State Agricultural College, because there were no paupers to care for.—Webster's Weekly.

THE TOUR OF A SMILE.

My papa smiled this morning when
He came downstairs, you see,
At mama; and when he smiled then
She turned and smiled at me; I went
And smiled at Mary Ann.
Out in the kitchen and she lent
It to a hired man.

So then he smiled at some one whom
He saw when going by,
Who also smiled and ere he knew
Had twinkles in his eye,
So he went to his office then
And smiled right at his clerk,
Who put some more ink on the pen
And smiled back from his work.

So when his clerk went home he smiled
Right at his wife, and she Smiled over at their little child
As happy as could be:
And their little child she took
The smile to school, and when
She smiled at teacher from her book
Teacher smiled back again.

And then the teacher passed on one
To little James McBride,
Who couldn't get his lesson done
No matter how he tried:
And Jamesy took it home and told
How teacher smiled at him
When he was tired and didn't scold
But said, "Don't worry, Jim."
And when I happened to be there
That very night at play,
His mother had a smile to spare
Which came across my way:
And then I took it after while Back home and mama said:
"Here is that very self-same smile
Come back with us to bed."

IN HIS NAME.

If all that we do was done in His name how beautiful would our lives be and how powerful would be our influence. What would it mean if our young people would give their whole lives to God. Nothing they could ever do would be greater. To the life that honors the name of Christ in all things, God gives the greatest blessings. A life given to the Lord does not mean a life void of pleasure and amusement which young people love so well, but means a life that enjoys the sweetest and best. God loves a smiling face, a cheerful countenance, and an unselfish heart, and these are the essentials to happiness. When you want pleasure and amusement why not have the best, the most profitable, and most refined?

ASSURANCE OF FAITH.

Kinship with dust I deny, however the soilure clings—
I feel in my bosom the stir, the lift of unfolding wings.
God closed in me the law of my progress: resistless I draw,
As it moves in me to the end designed: I am free as the law.
O, strong am I as desire that strives toward the perfect life,
And great am I as the dream I set as the goal of srife!

By instant flash of my spirit I glimpse the eternal soul;
And lined in all matter and spirit he made alive in the whole,
Is the autobiography of God: he writes there of me,
Attesting my claim as his child, foretelling the glory to be.
A voice that interprets I hear when my heart is hushed to hark;
To him I am bound by the cord of his will, and it guides through the dark.

O, cycle on cycle piled, and age upon age sublime,
Are paths for me from the deep! I follow unaging Time
Through ever-opening vistas toward the luminous veil,
And death is an incident only in life that cannot fail
Of fulfillment in full unfolding, light reached! I cannot die—
Not in the clay, but God's ideal of me, his child am I.

The triumph shall glorious be as the issue that waits is vast,
The larger the soul than the vision—the highest I see shall be passed,
And height upon height beyond! As I have climbed from the brute,
I still shall mount toward God till all but the spirit is mute
And the harmony whole at last. O, I shall be perfect man

S. S. STATISTICS IN N. C.

Some interesting figures were displayed at the recent State Convention. Population of North Carolina, 2,200,000; S. S. enrollment, 370,000; Not in S. S., 1,830,000. Think of it! Do you belong to the larger number? If so, won't you join the smaller and be one to make the smaller the larger, thereby doing yourself the greater good; influencing others who perhaps are doing like you if you do right; thus saving a soul from death and covering a multitude of sins? SECOND MEETING OF JOINT COMMISSION ON METHODIST UNION.

The following is the address to Methodism which was adopted as its best conclusion by the commission and ordered published:

"To the Methotdists of the United States, Greeting:

"At the first meeting of this joint commission of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the Methodist Protestant Church, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, held at Baltimore in December, 1910, the commissioners of the Methodist Episcopal Church in a written expression to the commission used the following language:

"'It is our conviction that the time has come when it is due to our people as well as the interested public that the desirability and the practicability of organic union shall be discussed between us; and if the preponderance of judgment be found against either the desirability or practicability of organic union, that the reasons be clearly set before our churches, in order that, being informed as to the same, they may the more intelligently judge the work of their commissions and conform their own utterances and actions to the conditions as thus developed. We believe they have a right to this knowledge, and that we owe it to them to give them this opportunity to measure the difficulties, and, as far as possible, to remove them or adjust themselves to actual conditions.'"

Starting from this point the commission, after prayerful consideration, ordered that a sub-committe of nine, three from each church, should be designated to take the whole matter under advisement and, after considering all the accessible facts, should report, if possible, a plan for the unification of the three churches by reorganization.

This sub-committee met at Cincinnati, O., in January, 1911, and after three days of conference, found itself able to make only tentative suggestions touching fundamental points as preliminary to a later and more final effort to constitute what might be termed a plan of reorganization in harmony with its instructions.

It was found that in matters of doctrine, ritual and the main points of the Book of Discipline, the churches are essentially agreed. The differences that are radical and difficult of adjustment have their root in historical and traditional divergencies of conviction touching the essential principles of government. As to this, it was quickly perceived that the only possible adjustment was to be found on middle ground reached through mutual concessions.

The report of the sub-committee was brought before us at our present session held in the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., May 10 to 12, 1911, and has been weighed and discussed with the utmost care. As in duty bound, we shall make a full report of our conclusions, as far as we have been able to reach any conclusions, to the General Conferences. To satisfy, however, the just expectations of our own people, we issue this brief statement and address.

Our task has not been a light one. Many difficulties have emerged in the course of our sessions. Things that do not appear on the surface often become manifest on closer examination. This fact, however, has not appalled us. When a difficulty is once clearly seen, it is already partly conquered. In truth, we are gravely encouraged. The bare fact that it has been possible for us to engage in the discussion of the several issues that have arisen is much. The frank and candid spirit in which these discussions have been conducted is also a ground for congratulation. And the substantial agreements reached on some points furnish reasons for the anticipation that we may eventually be able to see eye to eye on others.

While our work is not in such a state of maturity as in the judgment of the commission would warrant us in making a detailed statement to the public even if we supposed that we had authority to do so, we yet do not hesitate to say, as we have intimated above, that we have made real and substantial progress, and that we close our present meeting with hope, holding ourselves open to receive any new light that may come to us in the future, and ready to convene again when it may be deemed expedient.

We wish it to be distinctly understood that what we have done is not, and does not pretend to be, of the nature of a definite plan of union, but is cast in the form of a series of suggestions to the General Conferences such as may be helpful to them in reaching final conclusions.

We desire to express our devout thanks to Almighty God for the delightful fellowship that we have enjoyed with one another as we have sat together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. We further, in conclusion, beg all the people called Methodists to lift up earnest prayers that we may be guided in our future efforts by that Holy Spirit whose entrance giveth light. Shall we not borrow the petition of the Psalmist and make it our own: "Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock; thou that dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth. Before Ephraim and Benjamin Mannasseh, stir up thy strength and come and save us."

ROSETTA POPE'S SCHOOL.

"What are you doing?" It was Rosetta's uncle who asked the question.

Rosetta looked up with a little laugh. "I'm playing school," she said.

Uncle Leonard came near, and gazed at her row of pupils first in wonder, then with an amused smile.

"You have some very famous scholars," he observed.

A dozen or more "Author" cards were ranged on chairs before her, and each card pictured the face of a man or woman prominent in literature.

"Is Tennyson at the head or at the foot of the class?" he inquired, his eyes twinkling.

"O, at the head!" Rosetta answered. "I don't know what other people think, but I rank them just as I like them; and then if they don't recite well, they have to go down."

"Pray, what do they recite?" her uncle asked. "Spelling and geography?"

"Of course not! They recite from their own works. Here are the lessons," and she laid her hand on a big pile of books at her side.

"Do you admit visitors?"

"O yes, sir! Mamma often comes in. That's the visitor's seat," pointing to a great armchair.

So from the other side of the room Uncle Leonard watched the small teacher and her renowned scholars.

"Lord Tennyson will please recite his New Year's poem, beginning: 'Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky.'" Whereupon Rosetta selected a book from the pile, and, keeping her finger in the place, recited the lines with very little hesitation.

"Well done," praised her uncle.

"Thank you," said Rosetta, blushing.

The next card bore the face of Alexander Pope, and the teacher said, "Mr. Pope, you may recite two lines from your 'Essay on Man,'" and again Rosetta spoke for her pupil:

"Honor and shame from no condition rise;
Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

Then she turned to her uncle with a smile. "I can't understand much of his," she explained; "but seeing that our names are the same, I thought I'd have to put him in somewhere, and he's learned those lines so well that he stays up near the head."

Uncle Leonard burst out laughing, but was checked by Rosetta's warning finger. "Mr. Cowper, please give us the first and last verse of 'John Gilpin.'"

Rosetta began bravely enough:

"John Gilpin was a citizen
Of credit and renown.
A"—

Suddenly she puckered her forehead, and then she said, in a voice supposed to be stern, "Mr. Cowper, you may go to the foot!" adding to her uncle: "I never can remember that, but I like it."

"And how often do you have this sort of thing?" asked Uncle Leonard.

"O, whenever I get lonesome. I guess I'd rather have you talk to me now," and with one sweep of the hand she gathered her famous pupils into a pack and tossed it on the table.

"Tell me about Cousin Maud, please," she coaxed.

"One thing about her is that she's lonely most of the time, and we live so far from neighbors. I think I'll buy a set of 'Authors' on my way home, and tell her about this school of yours."

"O do!" cried Rosetta. "And then when she comes down here next summer, we can play together. Mamma likes it because she says it teaches me so much."

"I should say so! I shall have to coach Maud at first. She doesn't know one author from another."

"Neither did I till I learned," said Rosetta.—Emma C. Dowd, in Southern Presbyterian.

A FINE SCENE.

Two boys were in a schoolroom alone together, and exploded some fireworks. One boy denied it. The other, Ben Christie, would neither admit nor deny it, and was severely flogged for his obstinacy. When the boys were alone again, the real offender asked: "Why didn't you deny it?"

"Because there were only two of us, and one must have lied," said Ben.

"Then why not say I did it?"

"Because you said you didn't."

The boy's heart melted. Ben's moral gallantry subdued him. When school reassembled, the young culprit marched up to the master's desk and said: "Please, sir, I can't bear to be a liar. I let off the squibs." And he burst into tears.

The master's eye glistened on the self-accuser, and the undeserved punishment he had inflicted on the other boy smote his conscience. Before the whole school, hand in hand with the culprit, as if he and the other boy were joined in the confession, the master walked down to where young Christie sat, and said aloud: "Ben, Ben lad, he and I beg your pardon. We are both to blame."

The school was hushed and still, as other schools are apt to be when something true and noble is being done—so still that they might have almost heard Ben's tears dropping on his book as he sat enjoying the moral triumph which subdued himself as well as all the rest. And when, from want of something else to say, he gently cried, "Master forever!" the loud shout of the scholars filled the old man's eyes with something behind his spectacles which made him wipe them before he sat down again.—Sunday School Advocate.

THE SIGN OF THE DOUBLE CROSS.

In his ragged clothes and battered hat he stood in the rain and studied the marks on the gatepost. The marks were merely two little crosses, scarcely visible, and might have been carved by a boy with a jackknife. To this unkempt creature the marks were indisputable evidence of danger. They were a warning sign, and in the hieroglyphics of beggardom said plainly: "Cross dog; cross woman."

There was nothing about the house that indicated such a conditon. It was not large, but it was neat and tidy, and the yard was well kept. Moreover, there was no dog in sight.

It was the very last house on the street, and his was the hunger of a man who has tramped a whole day through the rain with nothing to eat; so this unkempt creature was most reluctant to pass it by. Every door in the town had been closed to him. Everywhere his pleading for a bite to eat had fallen on deaf ears. Even his offer to work was not heard. Impending starvation made him desperate, and he decided to run the risk.

He entered the gate and shambled around to the back door. His eyes were on the alert for the dog that must certainly slide from under the porch and pounce upon him. Great was his surprise to find his passage from the gate to the kitchen door unhampered. Greater still was his astonishment when his timid appeal fora "bite to eat, ma'am, please," was given a sympathetic ear by a kindly, sweet-faced woman. He appended his request with the assurance that he would gladly work to pay for whatever was given him.

The woman directed him to the woodhouse, telling him that when he had split enough wood to pay for his meal he might come in and eat.

It was queer, this remarkable show of hospitality. And with a remembrance of the warning sign full upon him, the man took the precaution to ask: "Where is the dog, ma'am, please? He might attack me."

"We have no dog," the woman answered.

No dog? The man was surprised, but said nothing. He set industriously to his work; and because she had trusted his honesty for the amount to be done, he split a big, round pile. Then he entered the house, and the woman invited him to a chair at the kitchen table where a lot of tempting eatables were set for him.

He dropped his battered hat at his feet and slid into the chair, scarcely without raising his eyes. He was young and muscular; and had it not been for his ragged attire and unshaven face, he would have been goodlooking.

The woman eyed him pityingly. There was a sparkle in his steel-gray eyes, a peculiar shapeliness and bigness about his head, with its mass of brown curls, that did not belong to the ordinary tramp. "He's some mother's boy, to whom fortune has been unkind," she thought as she went back to her sewing in the sitting room and left him to his meal.

Just as he eagerly clutched the cup of fragrant coffee the inner door opened, and there was a patter of little feet on the floor. An instant later a pair of merry brown eyes gazed up into his face, and a four-year-old boy's voice piped out: "Hello, man!" The man shifted uneasily in his chair, but made no reply. Anyhow, he was very hungry; and when one is hungry it is annoying to talk.

The boy kept his eyes upon the man. He had never seen a piece of beef attacked so viciously except by a half-starved dog. He waited some little time for a reply, and, getting none, walked up boldly and touched the stranger on the arm with the grave remark: "Say man, I said 'Hello.'" This demanded a reply, and the man tried to give it; but his mouth was full, and the best that he could do was to smile and nod.

This pantomine reply led the boy to make the further inquiry: "Can you talk, man?"

The tramp grinned over his plate, and replied instantly: "A little bit."

Amply satisfied and with the unquestioning confidence of childhood, the boy dragged up a chair and seated himself at the other end of the table. "My name's Robert, but they call me Boy Blue," the little fellow volunteered, looking into the stranger's face. "What's your name?"

"Mine is Ralph, but they call me 'Brake-Kink,'" the man replied with a smile.

"Why do they call you that?" asked the little fellow.

"It's a long, long story," the tramp said with genuine gravity, dropping his eyes to the floor.

"I like stories," the boy remarked.

"But this one is too long," the man declared. "Tell me why they call you Boy Blue."

"'Cause I'm like Boy Blue. Don't you know who Boy Blue was?"

"No. Who was he?"

"Why, he's the little boy who lost his sheep," quickly answered the lad. Then he quoted:

"Where's the little boy who lost his sheep?
He's under the haystack fast asleep."

The tramp beamed upon him admiringly.

"It's fun to sleep under a haystack," prattled the boy. "I slept under one once. I was out to Uncle Mark's. He lives on a farm. Did you ever sleep under a haystack?"

"A few times," the tramp confessed with evident amusement.

"Wasn't it nice? All except the cockleburs. They got in my hair. Did they get in yours?"

"Just a few," the man answered.

"Mamma had a dreffal time getting them out of mine. Did your mamma take them out of yours?"

The smile left the man's face, and he compressed his teeth fiercely, as if the of the head.
question hurt. His only reply was a nod

"The other Boy Blue runned away. So did I one day when I was naughty. That's when I was out to Uncle Mark's. Did you ever run away?"

"Once," said the stranger simply as he gazed forlornly out of the window. His hunger seemed suddenly to leave him, and the good breakfast was half forgotten.

"My mamma came after me. Did yours come after you?" The little fellow opened his eyes wide and gazed into the man's face. He did not see the tears that glittered on the stranger's cheek. When no answer came to his question, he passed it over and prattled on. "It's awful nice to be hugged up tight by your mamma when you've runned way and she's found you, isn't it?"

Then man lifted the coffee to his lips and choked on the hasty draught. Tears dripped into the cup, but he drank on unmindful of them.

The boy excused the refusal to answer in his belief that the choking was genuine, and continued his clatter. "'Cause I was a bad boy when I runned away, I was 'fraid my mamma would not love me any more. But it seems she jus' loved me more'n ever after that. I was awful sorry I had been naughty, and I told her so, I would never run away again; and asked her to forgive me. I promised forgived me and kissed me, and I felt so good I cried. It's funny how mamma's can make you cry by being good to you, but they can. Didn't you cry when your mamma was good to you the time you runned away and she found you?"

A smothered groan burst from the stranger as he pushed his plate from him and guiltily dropped his head. "She has'nt found me yet," he muttered.

In the little fellow's breast beat the happy heart of a child, but he was filled with the intuition that something was wrong. "Then you must be lost," he conjectured, his big eyes opening apprehensively.

The downcast look on the stranger's face assured the lad that his premonition was true.

"Could you find your way home if you'd try?"

"I guess I could," said the man.

"Then you'd better try. Your mamma will be awful worried. Mammas are funny that way. You just tell her that you're sorry, and promise her that you'll never run away any more. Won't you try it?"

The stranger sat motionless. His breakfast, half eaten, was getting old before him. But this, after all, was not the sort of food he craved. What his starving soul most needed was the the nourishing food of a mother's love and a mother's devotion. He gazed in silence out of the window, his mind busy with retrospect. He could feel the warmth of the gaze from the baby face across the table. At last, with an apparent effort, he arose from his chair.

"Is you goin' to see your mamma?" the little fellow questioned eagerly.

"Yes, my little man," he answered resolutely. He reached for his hat and walked around to where the boy sat.

The lad's mother came from the other room and looked in at the door just as the stranger stooped and lightly kissed the little fellow's cheek.

"Good-by, Boy Blue," he said. "You've made a new man of me. I will go home to mother."

"Good-by, man," the boy replied. "I hope you'll find her all right."

The stranger passed out of the door and down the walk, not with the shambling, hang-dog air of a beggar with which he had approached the house only a short time before, but with the brisk step, the erect head, and the square shoulders of a man. He paused long enough at the gate to use his knife on the warning sign. "It's all a mistake," he muttered. "This is no house of the double cross." He scratched out one of the crosses and shaped the other into the form of a crude figure with wings. Instead of the former warning, the sign now reads: "An angel lives here."—Frank H. Sweet.

USE OF LIME ON THE FARM.

Because of a misconception as to the action of lime there is much misuse of lime by a goodly number of farmers. In many cases where marked results have followed the use of this material the conclusion has been drawn that it is the only one that needs be added to the soil in order to secure large yields annually thereafter. Such a conclusion is not justified by the facts in the case, and if this material is used and depended upon entirely it will be found in time that the beneficial results will gradually grow less. There is no truer saying than that the indiscriminate use of lime enriches the father but beggars the son if it is depended upon solely for average soils. It should be remembered that, although lime is as essential for plant growth as phosphoric acid, nitrogen and potash, it is not able to replace any one of these nutrients in the promotion of plant development.

UNDER WHAT CONDITIONS USE.

As a direct plant food for such crops as corn, cotton and the small grains planted on most of our soils, it is seldom needed, but for leguminous crops, such as the clovers, vetch, peas and alfalfa, its use is usually imperative for the best returns with those soils not well supplied with lime. It might be stated in this connection that as a general rule with most to the upland and coastal soils of the State it is generally necessary to use an application of lime to secure the best results with the growth of leguminous crops. Ususally the most marked results with general farm crops have followed the use of lime on soils which have been allowed to get into a bad physical condition or to become sour or acid, either through a large accumulation of organic matter, poor drainage or insufficient aeration brought on by poor preparation and cultivation, or all combined. The writer has seen applications of lime to soils which have been allowed to get into a sour condition change the yields of corn in one year from a complete failure the previous year to splendid yields the year following the application of life. In cases like this —and there are many such soils in the State—the chemical and physical conditions of the soil were such that, although the soil had abundant plant food for large yields for many years, yet ordinary crops like corn would not grow to any extent until these conditions were made suitable for their growth. When lime was added in neutralized or destroyed the acidity of the soil, and at the same time improved its physical and chemical condition and biological character to such an extent that afterwards for years the yields were good. Here the beneficial results are largely due to the favorable action of the lime on the soil rather than in supplying lime as plant food to the crop. In addition to supplying plant food and improving the chemical, biological and physical conditions of the soil, lime hastens the decomposition of organic matter in the soil, liberating much of the inert or locked-up nitrogen contained in the organic matter or humus. Also the store of inert potash and phosphoric acid of the soil is acted upon by the lime, and a decidedly larger percentage is brought into an immediately available form annually for plant growth than would have been through ordinary agencies operating in the soils. Hence lime tends to hasten the exhaustion of these constituents of the soil rather than build them up, especially when the lime is used alone, continuously, without fertilizer, on poor soil.

HOW DETERMINE WHEN LIME IS NEEDED.

If the land contains a large amount of organic matter (usually indicated by dark color of the soil) it is fairly safe to assume that such soils, if crops do not yield well on them and they have not received an application of lime or marl in recent years, that they would be benefited by liming or marling.

If sheep sorrel, button weed and the water grasses are growing in the fields it will usually be found that such soils will respond favorably to applications of lime. If blackberries, cranberries, raspberries or gallberries are growing wild on the same type of soil in close proximity to the field in question, it will generally be found that an application of lime will prove beneficial for ordinary crops like corn and the small grains on such a field.

If it is an old field that has been robbed of its humus by continuous cultivation in some clean cultured crop, like cotton, and the soil of which runs together and cements after each rain, it is quite likely to respond profitably to an application of lime, especially for the growth of such crop as clover, vetch, peas and other legumes. If a heavy growth of some green crop is turned under, especially in the spring, an application of lime or marl should be made before turning in order to prevent the formation and accumulation of a large amount of organic acids in the soil by the rotting of the crop turned under. If the soil has been poorly drained, and has become tight and water-sogged, lime will in most cases prove highly beneficial when applied soon after drainage and before a crop has been put in. If clover, vetch, cowpeas and peanuts are to be grown upon ordinary upland soils, it will usually pay to make a good application of lime to the soil, the best results usually following cowpeas, if the application is made to the crop growing previously on the land; while with peanuts the opposite is frequently true.

If a soil is quite acid its presence may be determined by means of litmus paper. Take a portion of the soil to be tested into the hand and make it into the consistency of a mud pie by adding water and working with the hands. Now take a small strip of blue litmus paper, which may be secured from any local drug store, and bury it in the mud pie. After remaining for a minute or two remove the litmus paper and wash in clear water, and if the soil is acid or sour the color of the paper will have been changed from the original blue to a red color. Of the commonly grown farm crops probably oats and Irish potatoes are the most tolerant of large amounts of acidity in the soil.

WHEN APPLY.

Although conditions and systems of rotation will modify to some extent the time of application, yet, usually, the safest time to apply this material to the soil will be during the fall or early winter, especially so if either the caustic or slacked form is used. If carbonate of lime be employed it may go on in the spring with less danger of injury to the seed of the crop than when either of the two forms mentioned above is used. When the application is made in the fall, time is afforded for the lime to become well mixed with the soil before spring, especially so if it is put in properly. The carbonate or air-slacked form of lime does not act as energetically as do the quick and water-slacked forms.

HOW APPLY AND AMOUNT.

As a general rule lime should be applied broadcast and then thoroughly harrowed and disked into the soil. Of slacked lime the quantity required per acre varies quite considerably with different soils, crops and conditions. Usually however, the amount necessary to use will vary between 1,000 and 3,000 pounds, or its equivalent of some other form, per acre. Never mix lime, especially in the caustic or water-slacked forms, with any material containing ammonia before applying it to the soil, because the lime would tend to set free into the atmosphere some of the ammonia, and hence it would be lost. For this reason it is exceedingly unwise to mix lime directly with stable manure. Do not add lime to acid phosphate or to mixtures containing this material, for such a procedure would result in som or all of the available phosphoric acid of the acid phosphate being changed to a less soluble or available form, the amount changed being governed largely by the proportion of lime to acid phosphate in the mixture and by the mechanical condition of the mixture.

When lime is added to permanent pastures and meadows it should be applied broadcast in the fall or early winter and left on the surface. For this purpose the carbonate form will usually be found best suited.

FORMS OF LIME AND THEIR EQUIVALENTS

There are three chemical forms of lime used commercially other than gypsum (land plaster) or sulphate of lime. Each of these forms is known by a goodly number of names. The forms and synonymous names are as follows:

(1) Caustic, quick, burnt, builder's, rock, stone, or unslacked lime.

(2) Carbonate agricultural, marble, limestone, marl or air-slacked.

(3) Water-slacked or hydrated lime.

As all three of these forms of lime are suited for agricultural purposes it becomes important in purchasing to know the relative equivalents in actual lime (calcium oxide). When 178 pounds of a good grade of carbonate of lime is burnt in the kiln about 100 pounds of quick or caustic lime is secured, the remaining 78 pounds of the original substance is driven off into the atmosphere as carbon dioxide or carbonic acid gas. If the above 100 pounds of quick lime, secured by burning, is exposed to the atmosphere for some time, it will absorb carbon dioxide again from the air, and will, when fully saturated with it, weigh 178 pounds. If 56 pounds of the burnt or quick lime is water-slacked with just enough water to complete the chemical change, the resulting hydrated or water-slacked lime will weigh about 74 pounds. In other words, 100 pounds of quick lime will take up in chemical combination about 32 pounds of water, thereby increasing its weight about one-third by water-slacking.

From the above it may be seen that the most concentrated form of lime is the caustic or burnt lime. This being so, where the lime has to be freighted long distances on the railroad or hauled several miles on country roads, or both, it will usually be found that this will be a cheaper form in which to buy lime, but not always. For instance, the freight on a carload of carbonate of lime (agricultural lime so called) will be the same as that on the same amount of quick or burnt lime, yet there would be almost twice as much actual lime (calcium oxide) in the latter as in the former, hence the freight on the lime contained in the quick form would be only about one-half of what the actual lime contained in the carbonate form costs per ton.

In securing quotations on lime do so upon percentage composition of calcium oxide and upon delivery at your nearest railroad station. If they are secured in this way it will not be difficult to decide from whom to purchase. If these precautions are not observed it will not always be easy to decide which will be the cheapest source from which to secure one's supply of lime. One bushel of good stone or rock lime will weigh about 90 pounds, and when slacked will produce about three bushels of slacked lime, which will weigh approximately 45 pounds per bushel.

Pure burnt oyster-shell lime weighs about 60 punds to the bushel. When it is slacked about two and one-half bushels of slacked lime is formed which will weigh about 40 pounds per bushel.—C. B. Williams, Director.

VARIED READING.

We have the Bible, which is The Book, but we as a necessity, have the various books and papers, etc. It is a plain fact that some should read the Bible much more than others. It seems reasonable to suppose or expect for the "priest" that he is really necessitated, or obligated to read the Bible more than those under his charge.

We must read the Bible in a religious manner; while the reading of other literature is different from the religious—or can be, as the case may be. It seems that the rules for the Bible reading might be very much improved.

If the congregations were required to stand while the scriptures are being read would it not be closer connected with the devotional?

Perhaps we could all admit the fact that it does not quite belong to the devotional for us to sit on our seats while the one leading in public prayer is kneeling or standing—and that all ought to kneel. However, this article was intended to urge for the "reading." We have some men and women and boys and girls called "close readers." It is at times the case that our close readers ought to read for us. As a rule we are rather slow about getting to the church, and then too much in a hurry to get away.

The "children of the world," who are "wiser in their eyes than the children of light," do not do things thus—so slow and then so fast. A girl, a church member, said that she had rather read long articles (long, dry, sorry novels) than anything else. She ought to be kept in the church longer, whenever you can get her there, and she ought to hear a good deal of the reading. I have a high regard for the girl, and her like, and would urge that they be "excited" to better reading.

Moses was determined that the majority should rule, and the "majority of this country ought to be so well organized as to determine for less of the trashy literature. The system of tithing will never be at what it ought to be before the church becomes able to put a religious paper regularly, in the home of every family representing the church. That hundred thousand dollar college is needed, as it seems, but the close, clean, religious literature for all is needed "ten times" more.

A preacher may be called to preach to the people without being "called" to do much reading, beyond the text, but calling for the devotional and intelligence is such that the most of us have need to be confined to the hearing of more clear reading. While Bro. Brown, of the Mountain, and others, are subscribing their hundreds for that much needed college, there is a closer and a nearer route to the way of righteousness and the practical religion by putting more intelligence in the hearts of all through literary channels.

While the people over that Bible "age of 20 years" are trying to build up to educate those under "20 years," there is a nearer route, for safe education for those above the "school age."

Men and women who are talking about their "work being about done," because "the young folks can do the work" have need to be reminded of the fact that Moses did not depend on the young people for the main work, and that he educated mainly for his work after being filled with the popular education of Egypt. The original idea for this article was that we have need of more of the reading at our places of worship, and that the devotional is often lost sight of. The experience of many of our church people, who are past "20 years," is that they often leave the place for preaching, and the house of God, with reluctance, and the evidence is that we do not, as a rule, stay long enough at the house of prayer after we get there. Some of the religions, or spiritual, in our church paper would suggest that we carry the papers with us and occasionally read boldly to the people. W. F. Grabs.

is to be a hidden communion in which the soul draws near to God. It is to be a spiritual refreshing which fills the life with a sense of the presence and the might of the unseen. But it is also to be a practical power. It is to cleanse the individual life of evil deeds and evil habits. It is resolutely to set itself against abuses in countryside and city and state It is to be the conscience of a nation, facing every dark fact and calling it by its right name. It is to be the eternal antagonist of all that soils and all that degrades. The religion which warms the heart is also to transform the activities of the life.

Micah was a stern critic. He was also a great optimist. He believed in a wonderful future. After dark days of desolation he expected days of great joy to come. His hope centered in the reign of Jehovah, and that reign was to be a reign of peace. The nations were to submit themselves to the law of Christ. Manufacture of implements of warfare was to cease. In the battle-torn Orient in the days of unceasing strife Micah saw the vision of the victory of peace.

The important thing about this prophecy of peace triumphant is the kind of peace it was to be. Micah did not believe in peace at any cost. He did not believe in peace, however it came. He believed in that particular peace which would come when men accepted the lordship of Jehovah and united to do His will. He believed in peace which came as a result of obedience to the law of God. The triumph of righteousness was to come first and it was to usher in the reign of peace.

The multitudes of men who today are dreaming the dream of universal peace are seers who look out upon a noble vision. The world is their debtor for a great enthusiasm in a noble cause. They will do the most lasting work and they will best serve the cause as they remember, like Micah, to exalt righteousness as well as to exalt peace.

There is peace which is moral stagnation. If men ceased to fight because they ceased care enough for noble things to fight for them, the quiet of the world would not be a beautiful serenity. It would be the cold calm of death. But when peace is ushered in through the triumph of righteousness, when the banner of peace is the banner of righteousness enthroned, then the world is moving nobly onward and all men may well rejoice. Both men and nations could accept no better platform than that of Micah, who saw so clearly that peace was to come through doing the will of God.

An important feature in Micah's vision of great days to come is his conception of the future of the weak. That which was weak is to be incorporated in the remnant which survives. That which was cast off is to become a strong nation. The ordinary reading of life teaches the survival of the weak. He believed that Jehovah would make the weak strong, and so they would be able to survive.

Here we come upon the evangel of Micah. He shared the people's lot. He cried out under their burdens. He declared that their oppressors would be punished. But the great assertion was that the weak would not be left to themselves. God would make them strong.

The power of religion is its evangel of the strength of the weak. Over and over again has it been proven true that religion can change a man from a weakling into a man of stalwart manhood. This actual transformation of human lives works the most far-reaching changes. Even the lives of nations are affected by the power which makes the weak men strong.

There is a singing joyousness about religion when it is conscious of its mission to promise strength to the weak. It goes forth a new, fresh force, molding life to the noble fashion of its desire. Ordinary calculations deal with the way in which the pressure of circumstances brings out what is in a man. Religion puts a new deposit within the man's life, so that his response to the pressure of circumstances is utterly different from what it would have been. When religion works out a philosophy of history it is built about certain great facts regarding personality. One of the most important of them is God's power to make a weak man strong.

With all his stern words Micah had a great word of hope; and the greatest promise came to those who needed it most. The man cast down beneath the weight of hard circumstances, the man who had lost hope in an evil day, was startled to behold a new vision of life. The world was changed for him when he learned that the cause of the weak is the cause of God.

OF GREAT IMPORTANCE.

Orders for the Children's Day supplies reach me daily, but a great many schools have not yet ordered. The illustrated Service prepared by the Board ought to be used by every Methodist Protestant school for its educational value. Send your order at once. The Services, Recitation sheets, and envelopes are sent to our schools free, and shipping charges paid. The offering is to be sent to the Board of Foreign Missions promptly.

The service can be held at any time, and there is no reason why every school should not hold it, and use our own supplies.

ONCE MORE.

Remember that a handsome silk banner made in Japan is to be given to the school giving the largest offering, and one to the school giving the largest offering in proportion to membership—teachers and officers and scholars included. Also two large paper fish from Japan, in brilliant colors, and nine feet long will be given to the schools giving the second and third largest offering in proportion to membership. A committee will award them.

A SPECIALTY.

Requests for the special missionary service entitled "A Vision" have been quite numerous. It consists of a number of tableaux, with appeals from the different countries represented, and scripture quotations, etc. It is for the C. E. Societies, and advanced scholars of the Sunday schools more especially, and could be used on a week night as a means of securing funds for the Board of Foreign Missions.

BALTIMORE IN THE LAP OF ROME.

On the sixth day of June Baltimore witnessed a performance over which the state and nation may some day have keen cause to shed the bitterest tears of repentance. The Baltimore Sun literally fell over itself in exploiting the event. It was actually full of cuts of the Catholic Cardinal who was honored by "Catholics and Protestants alike." President Taft came down from his exalted position as the executive of a great nation, one of whose fundamental principles has been to keep church and state separate, to do honor to a Catholic priest whose chief distinction was that as a Cardinal, he has served his church with all the shrewdness and diplomacy of a real Jesuit. Governor Crothers authorized a committee of citizens of the commonwealth to take charge of the ceremonies to do homage to a man who has never done anything for the state except to use it to foster and serve his church. Mayor Preston had to keep up with the procession and join in this national, state and municipal snobbery.—Methodist Protestant.

—Our High Point people have given their pastor, Brother Dixon, a great treat. They have given him a railroad ticket to San Francisco to attend the meeting of the International Sunday-school convention. The Convention alone would be great. The trip alone would be great. Both together make a rare treat.

—At the meeting held in Greensboro recently to further the Laymen's Missionary Movement, it was decided that on some Sunday at an early date every minister in Greensboro should visit and speak in some country church, leaving the service in his own church to be conducted by laymen.

—Rev. W. D. Fogleman is certainly a church builder. He leaves new churches and parsonages behind him. Last week he went to High Point and closed a contract for material for a new church at Pleasant Union.

—Rev. T. A. Plyler will have the pleasure of dedicating a new church at Canaan on the fourth Sunday. He says the building is a splendid one, and that the people flock to services there. This is the result of the devotion and untiring efforts of a few loyal Methodist Protestants. They have built where a few years ago such a thing as a Methodist Protestant Church might have been thought impossible.

—Some of the young men of Maryland have gotten together and decided that it would be a good thing to have a "summer conference" for mutual inspiration and instruction, and accordingly have decided to go into the matter. The first session is to be held at Westminster, August 1 to 4. Such an institution might be made helpful in other districts. Why not have a summer conference in North Carolina? The Subdistrict Conference will not interfere now, and it might be worth while to travel half across the State the longer way to be with the brethren for a few days, and discuss church questions that the Annual Conference has not time for.

—Bro. David H. Hunter, of Tabernacle, is in St. Leo's Hospital for an operation to remove a very large carbuncle. He was brought to the city in an ambulance. We hope he will speedily recover from the operation.

PRAYER FOR THE KINGDOM.

If you do not wish for His kingdom, don't pray for it. But if you do, you must do more than pray for it—you must work for it. And to work for it you must know what it is. We have all prayed for it many a day without thinking. Observe, it is a kingdom that is to come to us; we are not to go to it. Also, it is not to come outside of us; but in the hearts of us. "The kingdom of God is within you." And, being within us, it is not a thing to be seen, but to be felt, and though it brings all substance of good with it, it does not consist in that: "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, peace, and joy," that is to say, in the holy, healthful, and helpful Spirit. —John Ruskin.

PRAYER MEETING PROBLEMS.

I do not wish to be understood as one who has solved these problems, or as being original in the suggestions of a solution. I have made a study of other men's methods, and have culled what I have found helpful. I presuppose in our preparation for the prayer meeting that we as leaders always have a season alone with God. I want to say that the driest, dullest meeting I have ever had was when all other preparations had been made and this one left off.

A prayer meeting may be killed (1) by monotony, (2) by long prayers, (3) by starvation, (4) no work for members, (5) poor singing.

Monotony is the result of getting into a rut. A rut may be a good thing. The bed of a brook is a rut, the gullet is a rut. If food is diverted and gets into the windpipe, there is trouble. Some things never become monotonous; the beating of the heart or breathing never grow stale because they are vital. Getting into ruts in nonessentials is the trouble. The congregation should always be seated, but not in the same order. We should always have prayer, singing, Bible-reading, and testimonies, but not in the same proportion or style. Monotony makes for sleep. The baby is in the cradle, and the father's foot on the rocker. Rock, rock—same movement, swinging it now sidewise, now endwise, baby will not go to sleep. If he sings the lullaby jerkily, now in a whisper and now in thunder tones, baby will raise a riot. So in the prayer service. Sing, pray, read, sing, pray, read. Nothing is so trying as a home where nothing ever happens. The preacher gets up without preparation, and makes a running comment on the longest chapter he can find; and the poor, wearied saints feel like doing the running. Nature is never monotonous. The human face, the leaves of the trees, the cloud-flecked sky are infinite in variety; and if we would be as fresh and satisfying as the "old mother," we too much study for variety.

There are some ways that I have had suggested to secure variety. The room, if possible, ought to be small enough to be full. The leader ought not to stay in the same place all the time; sometimes it would be a good idea to walk up and down among the people. A great deal of variety may be attained in Bible-reading. Let the reader read in responsive service the twenty-third Psalm, the Beatitudes, the thirteenth chapter of Corinthians; let the men and the women read alternately. In our prayer meetings, by a combination of the great essentials, prayer, singing, testimony, and Bible-reading, we may have perennial freshness.

There may be variety in the manner of opening the prayer meeting. Open with silent prayer, with a quartet, a series of sentence prayers, an appropriate solo, or directly with some striking word on the topic. Open with testimonies, with Bible verses; open with a Scripture lesson read by two who stand before the congregation, and read alternate verses. Always touch the highest theme. Novelty is of value only as leading to interest in Christ. The services of Jesus were never monotonous; to-day he preaches from a well curb to a Samaritan woman, to-morrow his pulpit is a fisher's boat on blue Galilee. Again, he lifts his voice in the beautiful courts of the temple; when he marked that they took the uppermost seats in the synagogue, he preached a sermon on pride; when the publicans and sinners drew near, he told them the story of the prodigal; with many a story, parable, and miracle he held the intense interest of all classes.

The prayer meeting may be most effectively killed by long prayers. Our Lord's Prayer, which was given as a model, requires only one minute and a half to pray; the prayer of the Saviour in Gethsemane, three minutes; and Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, six minutes. It is our privilege to pray all night in secret; but in public a prayer ought to have a definite aim, asking God for what we want and expecting until we get it. An old brother ended a long, rambling prayer as follows: "O Lord, bless the uttermost parts of the earth, where the eye of God has never seen or the foot of man ever trod." The United States dead-letter office has snakes, skulls, Indian scalps, tarantulas, revolvers, combs, bottles of liquor, inflammable oils, and innumerable poisons; and I believe God's dead-letter office of our prayer meetings would have just as great a variety of heterogeneous objects. The publican prayed, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" Bartimeus, "Lord, that I might receive my sight." Jehu aimed at the king's heart and drew his bow with his full strength; so let us aim at the heart of God and put our whole souls into the petition.—Christian Advocate.

THE APPLICATION OF MATHEMATICS IN SCIENCE.

Every good and perfect gift is sure to be abused in the hands of some who lack either the skill to properly handle the tool placed in their hands, or the right spirit to appreciate its worth. There are those who bring discredit upon the value of mathematics in the service of science by their puerile endeavors perforce to turn to account in their work what facilities they possess in mathematical discipline, to force into the garb of a mathematical formula some irrelevant feature, some supposed numerical relation.

It is perhaps in part cases of this kind that Prof. Sedgwick-Minot had in mind when he said, in his address before the American Association:

"We biologists can not deplore too frequently or too emphatically the great mathematical delusion by which men often of very great, if limited, ability have been misled into becoming advocates of an erroneous conception of accuracy. The delusion is that no science is accurate until its results can be expressed mathematically. The error comes from the assumption that mathematics can express complex relations. Unfortunately, mathematics have a very limited scope and are based upon a few extremely rudimentary experiences, which we make as very little children, and of which probably no adult has any recollection. The fact that from this basis men of genius have evolved wonderful methods of dealing with numerical relations should not blind us to another fact, namely, that the observational basis of mathematics is, psychologically speaking, very minute compared with the observational basis of even a single minor branch of biology. Moreover, mathematics can at the utmost deal with only a very few factors, and cannot give any comprehensive expression of the complex relations with which the biologist has to deal. While, therefore, here and there the mathematical methods may aid us, we need a kind and degree of accuracy of which mathematics in absolutely incapable. For our accuracy it is necessary often to have a number of data in their correct mutual relations presented to our consciousness at the same time, and this we accomplish by the visual image, which is far more efficient for this service than any other means of which we dispose. When we wish to understand a group of complex related details, such as an anatomical structure, we must see them, and if we cannot see them no accurate conception of the group can be formed. With human minds constituted as they actually are, we cannot anticipate that there will ever be a mathematical expression for any organ or even a single cell, although formulae will continue to be useful for dealing now and then with isolated details. Moreover, biologists have to do with variable relations, some of which of course can be put into mathematical form, but we find that even the simplest variations become clearer to us when presented graphically. The value to every student of science of the graphic method has been immense. Biologists can work to advantage with quantitative methods, we welcome the increasing use of measurements in biology, we welcome the English journal Biometrika, the organ of measuring biologists—but none the less we refuse to accept the mathematical delusion that the goal of biology is to express its results in grammes, meters and seconds. Measurements furnish us with so-called "exact" records, but the aim of science goes beyond the accumulation of exact records to the attainment of accurate knowledge, and the accuracy of our knowledge depends chiefly on what we see. The practice of science conforms to this principle, the definite affirmation of which may prove of continuing advantage."

We cannot help feeling, however, much as we admire Prof. Sedgdwick-Minot's forceful sayings and bons mots that his strictures on this matter are a little too severe. We call to mind a saying of the great English physicist, Sir J. J. Thomson. Referring to the feeling which seems to exist among certain men of science, who appear to hold it a virtue for a man to be "unmathematical," Sir Joseph points out that if this be indeed a virtue, it surely is of all virtues the easiest. We doubt if any but a mathematician of the highest order, a man like J. J. Thompson or Karl Pearson, is fully qualified to discuss the possibilities and limitatons of mathematics as applied to the several branches of science. The dictates of common sense would seen to concur with the practice of the best authorities to the effect that wherever mathematics can be successfully and usefully applied, wherever a complete judgment of the question at issue is impossible without precise mathematical analysis, there is it indeed true, that "no science is accurate until its results can be expressed mathematically," and there mathematics must be applied regardless of any prejudice that may exist against the expression of results in "grammes, meters and seconds."—Scientific American.

PRIZE ESSAY ON SOCIALISM.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., have recently published a little book called "Socialism, a Critical Analysis," by Dr. O. D. Skelton, professor of political science in Queen's university, Canada. This work won a prize of $1,000 for the best essay on the subject. It is intended to be an impartial examination of the socialist philosophy, and it neither wholly approves nor condemns it—but Dr. Skelton is evidently not a socialist simself and he is skeptical about socialism's ability to deliver the goods. He reviews the numerous evils which exist in our social system today and which socialism proposes to remedy. His conclusion is, however, that the advocates of socialism paint the picture in too gloomy colors; they seize on exceptions and assume that they are the rule, he says, and they overlook the great advantages of the present competitive system. Under the existing order, he proceeds, "the most powerful and abiding force in human nature—self-interest—is harnessed in society's service," and "never was the social conscience so keen, never the sense of trusteeship of philanthropy and public service so complete as now." The socialists, he points out, lay great stress upon the evils of poverty and the inequalities of income under the present system, but these drawbacks are not enough to counterbalance the "qualities of character" which competition develops, he holds—character being of more importance than cash. He finds that the socialists leaders of today have drifted rather far away from the philosophy of Karl Marx and that they are falling back on the more general and hazy idea of utopianism.—Pathfinder.

THE VACUUM BOTTLE.

A great convenience is the modern bottle or flask which is jacketed by a vacuum in such a way that liquids can be kept in it, either hot or cold, for many hours. There has been a long legal battle over the patents on these bottles, and the case is an interesting one. It had been known for some time that a vacuum would to a large extent prevent radiation, and it was Prof. Dewar of London who first made use of the principle in a vacuum bottle. As early as 1873 he made a flask for use in his experiments in low temperatures, which was simply one vessel inside another, with the space between them exhausted of air. But no one saw the great practical value of the idea at that time. Later Prof. Dewar found that by silvering the inside of the flask he increased its heat radiating resistance sixfold. In pouring liquid hydrogen from one vessel to another practically all of it would be lost ordinarily, as this liquid boils and passes off into vapor at a temperature of 421 degress below zero. By using vacuum flasks, however, he was able to make such transfers with little loss.

It was a German named Reinhold Burger, of Berlin, who about seven years ago put on the market a vacuum bottle of the form now familiar—with a metal covering to protect is from injury. These bottles caused a sensation in the world and they met a large sale at $5 a piece and upward. But it was not long before others got into the field. The courts in this country held that Burger's patent was not broad enough to give him a monopoly of the bottle; all he had done was to strengthen the bottle by placing small pieces of asbestos between the walls, and the rival makers soon found other ways to accomplish this. As a result the prices have come down to about a third of what they were originally. It is possible with one of these bottle to keep liquids hot for nearly 24 hours, or cold for three days. Anyone carrying his lunch can thus always have a hot drink in winter, or a cold one in summer. It is probable that the vaccum principle will be made use of in many other ways, as for instance in refrigerators and other places where heat has to be kept in or out. It is a singular fact that these vacuum bottles after beieng used for a time seem to lose some of their virtue, and there has been much discussion as to the cause of this and how it can be remedied. It seems that though the bottle may be very thoroughly exhausted when it is made, air will be found in the supposed vacuum after a few months. The bottle does not leak and it is believed that the air must have been present in the glass itself.—The Pathfinder.

IN THE SILENT ACRE.

"He left an estate valued at a million." The phrase has a familiar ring. It is often uttered in every-day speech, often published in the news columns; but there is one place in which man has thus far never dared to engrave it.

If success is to be measured by dollars, if the chase for money is the true aim of humanity and its highest destiny, then of all places it should be graven deep on that one shaft where it has never yet been placed—the tombstone.

No marble shaft, raised in reverence, love, pride or sorrow, has yet borne a dollar-mark. Every other standard of worth—save that of wealth—finds its place there. Upon the white stone, defying Time, is written every other tribute to the lives of men—their kindness, their fidelity to duty, their love of family, their probity and their integrity. And yet dashing along this broad road of life which must lead to the common goal, humanity seems to be possessed of the desire to attain the one object which in the end has no value.

Out in the Silent Acre the vision is, perhaps, straighter, and sees farther into things that are real, than in the downtown crowd. So it is that this judgment of the tombstone upon the true values of life is the reflection of all human hopes. For the tombstone is the signal station to eternity. And it is to the glory of mankind in a day when dollars seem to be the chief aim of existence, that deep in our hearts, we keep the scales of judgment so well balanced that no man ever yet wrote as his epitaph: "He left an estate estimated at a million." And as long as men yearn for love, for friendship for the sympathy and regard of the living, no man ever will. —Jackson Daily News.

WILLINGNESS TO WORK.

Attorney General Bickett recently made a speech in which he said that before any girl is allowed to marry she should have a certificate from some competent authority setting forth that she had learned how to cook. A lady of Monroe on reading this, remarked that it was not nearly so important that a girl have a certificate in cookery, as it was that she have one setting forth that she was willing to work after she knows how, that the trouble is not so much that girls don't know how as it is that they are unwilling to learn how and then do it. Any girl coming through the schools with ordinary intelligence can quickly learn to cook or do anything else if she only has the desire and ambition to do it

There is a great hue and cry now that our schools should teach this practical thing and that practical thing. There is no particular objection to this, but it will not take the place of the thing that must go before it, namely, the obligation that rests upon every human being to do some kind of useful labor in society. Whether that labor is cooking, keeping books, teaching school, keeping poultry or rocking a cradle, she must learn that there is a dignity and duty in doing some kind of work either for herself or for others, and doing it well—the best it can be done. The drone should have no more respect in human society than he has in a bee colony. No matter if one fancies that he or she is able to live without working, it must never be forgotten that the one who does it is living on the labor of some one else. Labor is the sole creator of value, and if you are not doing some useful work you are living on the work done by somebody else. So many persons are doing no work or useless work that the remainder of mankind is doing double or treble its share. If you are not working, you are riding on the back of somebody else, and surely that is an unworthy thing for anybody made in the image of a superior being to do.

Not only must the schools quit advocating short cuts to ease, and teach the value, dignity and necessity of labor—not necessarily with the hands, but something of use to mankind—but they must cease to hold out the idea that a little book knowledge is all that is required. They must go back to the fundamental idea that character is the first requisite. "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth." Did you ever think what that injunction really means? It means character formation. Our God is truth and justice and honor and righteousness, and a love of those attributes is what makes character, hence the youth is admonished to remember them early, that his whole life may be a success and a blessing..

Human character is the most important of all things, and the care of the body, the temple in which the spirit dwells, is the next important thing. Yet many of our schools are forgetting these things in the mad rush to teach less essential things, to teach how to make money quickly, to teach how to shine in society, to teach how to farm and manufacture and hundreds of other things. Now these things are all right in themselves, but the point we are making is that if the school course is not broad enough to admit both sets of ideas, the latter and not the former should be curtailed.—Monroe Journal.

THE SMALL COLLEGE VS. THE UNIVERSITY.

The tendency of modern institutions, then —if we disregard their distractions—is to make breadwinners, to fit men to earn money. State universities are necessarily of this character, and the influence upon all institutions which compete with them is strong. Size itself almost irresistibly drives this away. The revolution, indeed, seems to have gone from one extreme to the other; and as the old system had little place for men who sought technical training, the new system has but scant place for those who desire learning for its own sake. In fact, the old system outlasted the period of its greatest usefulness, and when the change came offered but slight resistance to new methods.

It is becoming evident, however, that the change has gone too far, and that there were some features of former methods worth preserving. The country is too large and the demands of society are too complicated to be served by any single system. One of the greatest misfortunes in the education of a nation, John Stuart Mill said, would be the establishment of uniformity under the name of unity. There is room in this great country for institutions of every kind, and an increasing need that different colleges turn their attention in different directions. Moreover, the new system is beginning to disclose some defects. Classes are so large that there is and at the same time the compensation of teachers is so low that the profession no longer draws into its ranks its due proportion of talent. While such conditions prevail, it is inevitable that college and university work throughout the country should be marked as it is by lack of seriousness.

It is for these reasons that at Amherst, for example, the movement has arisen which seeks in some respects to return to the old purposes of education. History can be taught better than ever before. We have far ampler means for instruction in democracy and the principles of government, while the need for unyielding moral standards in public opinion was never greater. It is proposed therefore to make the moral character of the student the first purpose of the college; to teach concentration and application, making the college work real as work in a business or profession is real; to give individual training of the best character; and to create an environment of vivid intellectual life, a current where yielding shall be easy and resistance hard.—Harper's Magazine.

—The United States Senate last Monday, by a vote of 64 to 24, passed a resolution amending the constitution to provide for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people.

The Bristow amendment, providing that the federal government shall have supervision of such election, was adopted. The vote on the amendment was a tie, 44 to 44, Vice President Sherman casting the deciding ballot.

An amendment by Senator Bacon, qualifying the Bristow amendment so as to prohibit federal supervision of elections unless the state legislatures refuse to act, was defeated by a vote of 46 to 43.

RULES THAT JAMES I. MADE FOR THE TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

The following are the rules under which the translators were ordered to do their work:

I. The ordinary Bishops' Bible, to be followed and as little altered as the truth of the original will permit.

II. The names of the prophets and the holy writers, with the other names of the text, to be retained, as nigh as may be, according as they were vulgarly used.

III. The old ecclesiastical words to be kept, namely, the word church not to be translated congregation, etc.

IV. When a word hath divers significations that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most of the ancient fathers, being agreeable to the propriety of the place and the analogy of the faith.

V. The divisions of the chapters to be altered either not at all or as little as may be, if necessity so require.

VI. No marginal notes at all to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew or Greek words which cannot, without some circumlocution, so briefly and fairly be expressed in the text.

VII. Such quotations of places to be marginally set down, as shall serve for a fit reference of one Scripture to another.

VIII. Every particular man of each company to take the same chapter or chapters; and having translated or amended them severally by himself, where he thinketh good, all to meet together, confer what they have done, and agree for their parts what shall stand.

IX. As any one company has dispatched any one book in this manner, they shall send it to the rest, to be considered by them seriously and judiciously; for his Majesty is very careful on this point.

X. If any company, upon the review of the book so sent, doubt or differ upon any place, to send them word thereof, note the place, and withal send the reasons; to which if they consent not, the difference to be compounded at a general meeting, which is to be of the chief persons of each company at the end of the work.

XI. When any place of special obscurity is doubted of, letters to be directed by authority, to send to any learned man in the land for his judgment of such a place.

XII. Letters to be sent from every bishop to the rest of his clergy, admonishing them of this translation in hand, and to move and charge as many as being skillful in tongues, and having taken pains in that kind, to send his particular observations to the company, either at Westminster, Cambridge or Oxford, according as it was directed before in the King's letter to the archbishop.

XIII. The directors in each company to be the deans of Westminster and Chester for that place, and the King's professors in Hebrew and Greek in either University.

XIV. The translations to be used, when they agree better with the text than the Bishops' Bible, namely, Tyndale's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, Whitechurch's, Geneva.

XV. Beside the said directors before mentioned, three or four of the most ancient and great divines in either of our universities, not employed in translation, to be assigned by the vice-chancellor upon conference with the rest of the heads to be overseers of the translation, as well Hebrew as Greek, for the better observance of the fourth rule above specified.

ASHEVILLE.

Two new members last Sunday. One baptism. Mrs. Hughs, who will join our church in Graham, was with us.

In the evening our congregation joined in a mass meeting at the city auditorium to approve of the recent enforcement of our prohibition law. It was an inspiring occasion. A silver pitcher was presented to Col. V. S. Lusk as a testimonial for his faithful efforts for law enforcement.

Last week many hundreds of gallons of liquor were poured into the French Broad River from the new concrete bridge. The policemen did the work. Police Judge Junius B. Adams was present to see that his decree would be carried out. The W. C. T. U. ladies were present also. The stuff was in bottles. The bottles were thrown against the pier under the bridge. The W. C. T. U. ladies broke many of the bottles just to have a hand in it. About a hundred bottles missed the pier and were fished out by thirsty boys and men and placed in canoes. But the officers seized these and broke them against the rocks.

The city is practically dry. Not more than three arrests for drunkenness in three weeks past. Large quantities of liquors have been returned, which were not taken out of the depot. J. S. W.

—We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Elon College, located in the delightful hill country of Western North Carolina, which appears in this issue. This College is now entering upon its twenty-second year and has made a fine record. Last year there were 240 pupils enrolled in all department from twelve States and two countries. The College has all modern conveniences in the way of equipment and a strong faculty, and is famous for its healthfulness and high moral tone. The present year's catalogue, of 112 pages, gives all necessary information and may be had free by application to Pres. W. A. Harper, Elon College, N. C. We will thank our readers to mention this paper in writing for further information.

—Prof. W. F. Alderman, of Greensboro, died last Friday night, at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Chas. Ireland, at the age of 78. He was formerly professor of mathematics in Greensboro Female College. He leaves four sons and four daughters; among the latter, Mrs. J. Norman Wills and Mrs. Richard T. Wills.

—Elon College was fortunate in having a man so well prepared for the presidency as is Prof. Harper on the resignation of President Moffitt. Dr. Moffitt has done a good work for the college, but felt that his health would be permanently injured if he continued doing the work needed, hence his resignation. He will return to Asheboro and look after his business interests there. We expect to see continued progress under the administration of President Harper.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

The revival at Haw River has just closed. The good preaching which Brother Williams did was very much appreciated. Two souls professed Christ as their Savior. We are glad for the results we were enabled to see but sorry others did not accept Christ.

Because of bad health Mrs. Jno. Snotherly of Haw River went on last Monday to the hospital at Greensboro for treatment. The case of Mrs. Snotherly is one that should have the special prayers and attention of God's people. Dr. Goley has been on the sick list for some days, but is now improving. We trust he will soon enjoy his usual health.

Sunday school attendance last Sunday was 109 at Graham and 93 at Haw River.

Bro. Raper filled his regular appointment Sunday, and preached an interesting sermon. The subject was the pathos of God's love and the pathos of the father's and mother's love. The text was Luke 15:11. To say the sermon was good does not near express it, and if the people would only do as he said, and I don't see how we children that heard what he said about disobedient children could disobey our fathers and mothers and feel right over it. Two of Mr. J. D. Pritchett's little girls joined the church.

There were 81 present at Sunday school; collection, 51 cents. We were sorry our superintendent was sick and could not be with us. There will be Sunday school next Sunday evening at 2 o'clock and Rev. Elderdice will preach at 3:30.

Corinth, Littleton Ct.

Second Sunday of May afternoon Bro. Fishel filled Bro. Taylor's appointment.

Prof. Forlines visited this church the next week. Showed and told us much of "God's Glory in the Sky," which set us to thinking, quickened our imagination, broadened our ideas, and left us wishing for more information and for minds better prepared to receive such information when imparted to us.

Held a circuit rally here first Sunday of June. All day service. Dr. Swain preached before noon. Gave us a splendid discourse.

Afternoon, had a prayer-song service followed by a proposition from Bro. Taylor: That we "Close and sell our church," do away with it. Of course this proposal was to arouse us, to help us realize what our churches are for, couldn't see into his proposition at first, but it flashed in writer's mind, at once, that Bro. Taylor was talking out of his head, if he thought we would let our church go. No, sir, not a bit of it. Why, my church is my life. More to me of the two I would say, Take my life, it means so little in comparison to the church. Let that stand, it means much more than much. It's the light and life of town and community. Excuse me, I'll go back where I left off. Bro. Taylor asked all who opposed his proposition to hold up hands. We all opposed it. Then he told us if our church meant anything to us 'twas worth while to put our best into the church. We should be and do all we could for her. This was not meant for the members of Corinth alone, but the members of any church should do their best for their church.

All churches on this work were represented but one, and many churches of different denominations were represented. After Bro. Taylor's short talk, he called on Dr. Swain and the laymen to make a few more remarks. Bro. Swain said enough had been said, but he re-impressed the necessity of being and doing all we could for church, and finished telling us he hadn't said anything. Those things he didn't say filled us with inspiration, made us willing to work in perspiration to make this a year of aspiration.

Having been stirred by Bro. Fishel, Prof. Forlines, Dr. Swain, our pastor and different laymen, since we reported, we wish for more wide awake, broad-minded, consecrated men of God.

Our annual Children's Day service was held Sunday afternoon, which took the place of the regular preaching service. After listening to the splendid program rendered by the children, we had the pleasure of hearing Prof. Barnhardt, of High Point, North Carolina, who delivered an able address on Missions.

The collection amounted to $17.06.

Our Sunday school is in a very flourishing condition now. More of our older members are taking part, which adds very much to the interest of the Sunday school.

Our pastor gave us an excellent sermon drawn from that sweetest book and sweet writer, James. We have often wondered if Christ did not hold him especially dear, too. And that it was not expressed. "That apostle whom Jesus loved next to John."

The text: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation for when he is tried, (hath been approved), he shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him."

The pastor poured forth, seemingly, his soul in the following. Though under oppressive heat we caught some of these:

We must endure temptation, that it is not a hindrance to advancement in the Christian life, but helpful.

That the trying of our faith worketh patience, that we may become perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

Even the Son of God was made perfect through suffering. This more distinctly we recall.

That when on the mountain famished by the ravages of hunger, the evil one appealed to him as he does to us all today, especially along the lines of bread or material want. Convert these stones into bread. And we thought, we yielding, build our $1,000,000 hospital to palliate and vote to keep the saloon open; but we shall go into God's presence with stained hands and a sullied soul.

We are glad of the proposed hospital, but what our cities need a thousand times greater are five thousand men each, with clean hands and clean lives, though only a hundred in the bank.

That will swipe from the groceries and drug stores all the soft drinks and dope that follow in their wake.

Destroying our youths by the thousands, by deadening their intellect, killing all that's manly, and drawfing their souls for gain.

But Christ dallied not with Satan, but answered promptly and emphatically and once for all, "It is written." and so must we.

Some time since when sorely tried along business lines, there came born o'er our spirit as by a breeze from heaven, this passage: "He that despiseth the gain of oppression, and shaketh his hands from the holding of bribes; he shall dwell on high. His place of defense shall be the mountains of rocks; bread shall be given him, his waters shall be sure."

The churches should pray especially for a great awakening among their officials. Our church we believe is especially clean along these lines. We must pray for these.

A Confederate soldier slowly dying of cancer in our midst, having walked the floor of a Richmond hospital for twenty hours, in agony of prayer, found peace.

Says the church runs on too narrow grade roads. We must pray for all; says I pray for everybody. And perhaps God will over-rule satan and cause him to change his tactics.

The minister said, "I had rather lie down hungry tonight than to sit at the richest banquent of a dishonest man."

Satan has great power, "Is the prince of the power of the air." But he met more than his match in that he could bruise the heel of the Son of man; but Christ could bruise his head.

So much we would like to quote from this sermon, but the waste basket.

Mrs. William Pegram, a sweet little woman, a real Dorcas or Lydia in the Bethel church, worshipped with us yesterday. She and her husband having disposed of their home place, are some what at sea. We trust that they may never leave our church.

Mr. J. T. Price, through whose generosity, I think, our vestibule is largely due, has kindly consented for us ladies to change the coloring of the windows.

Mrs. Pegg of Greensboro attended services with Mrs. James Williams. In her girlhood we called her Lilly, and "Time which sheds its blight o'er all," has left her in exterior, much the same. May her life be as fragrant.

Mrs. Frank Pegram is very ill.

Mrs. R. S. Ogburn was sufficiently recovered to hear the sermon from a carriage by the window. Reporter.

Children's day service will be held here next Sunday, June 18th. A large attendance and a liberal collection are hoped for.

The attendance at S. S. yesterday was 69; the contribution, 46 cents, averaging about three fourths cents per members.

The special meeting will embrace the third week in August. Rev. N. G. Bethea will assist the pastor.

Uncle Alson Amick, whose illness has been previously reported, continues very unwell and manifests no great evidence of a speedy recovery. His children are worthy to be commended for their presence and aid since he became sick. Last Sunday week Bro. S. A. Alexander held a prayer service at Uncle Alson's. Quite a number were present.

Mrs. Mary E. Amick, member of the church and Sunday school here, has been critically ill from hemorrhage of the lungs, but is improving nicely now.

Little Virginia Dare, the ten month old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Vance Smith of Burlington, was buried here last Friday. Rev. W. D. Fogleman conducted the funeral. The sorrowing parents have the sympathy of many friends and relatives in their sore bereavement.

Our Superintendent was with us yesterday, June 11. We had a large attendance, and they took an interest in the work. We are glad to have them with us. It does me so much good to see them all come out and help us in our Sunday schools and prayermeetings and hope they will continue to do so.

I think that everybody will be prepared for preaching the third Sunday in this month and we hope our pastor will be ale to meet his appointment. Our meeting will begin the fourth Sunday in July, and I hope it will do much good.

Best wishes to all.

Concord.

We were glad to have Brother J. E. Mercer, of Charlotte, preach for us on the first Sunday and on Sunday night.

At a meeting of our church, some time ago, when we were considering painting, and improving our house of worship, Rev. D. A. Braswell suggested that we convert it into a "brick-veneered one." After considering the matter, and counting up the cost, as near as possible, our people have accepted the proposition of Brother Braswell, and are now at work getting subscriptions to cover the cost of building two S. S. rooms; and making the house a brick veneered one. So we hope soon to begin the work that shall add much to the appearance of our church.

The congregations at both Concord and Fair View are fairly good. Pastor.

Dear Herald:—Our pastor, Rev. W. D. Fogleman filled the regular appointments here yesterday morning and night. At the morning service the Lord's Supper was commemorated and we were glad to see so many commune.

We are planning to have children's day services on the fifth Sunday in July, beginning at ten o'clock and all friends are cordially invited to attend.

The Sunday School has decided to give an outing to the members of the three children's classes, and the teachers of these classes and any other grown people of the Sunday school who will do so, are requested to be there to help entertain the children.

Our prayer meeting is still alive and is enjoyed by us who attend. We are sorry to have so few out to these meetings and would gladly welcome many more. Mr. John Hurley, a faithful young man from the M. E. Church, will conduct the prayer service this week.

We are glad to have in S. S. and other ervices Dr. Joe Hamlin, a M. P. young man who is practicing dentistry here during his summer vacation. Several of our young people who have been off at college or teaching, have returned home for the summer and have taken their old places in our services.

We are having a very good Sunday school now; we have 61 enrolled.

There were two deaths near here last week. Messrs. Reps Martin and J. G. Joyner.

Mrs. Hamp Stimpson is very ill at present.

Best wishes to the Herald and its many readers. Hester Baker.

Rehoboth, Granville. Ct.

While Rehoboth has been getting busy and doing things, her reporter has been idle and negligent. Hence our long silence. Our new pastor has been with us a good while, yet we occasionally hear the question.—How do you like Brother Bethea? And invariably the answer comes—All right; and we do like him. We enjoy the splendid sermons he gives us. We enjoy his good fellowship and friendliness and appreciate it too. So far we have found no fault in him at all (something wonderful for Granville Ct.) Indeed, there is some danger of our working him too hard. For he must preach to us, make speeches for us, sing duets and solos, and do many other such things whenever we have a mind to ask him. And we suppose there is a limit even to a preacher's powers of endurance. Bro. Bethea's wife also seems to be in every sense of the word a help meet for him.

Our S. S., we think, is improving in some respects. There were 93 present last Sunday, the highest number on record for one Sunday.

Bro. Bethea has organized for us a teacher training class which he teaches every first Sunday morning. We trust that much good may come of this. Our great need is, not more teachers, but better ones.

Our Ladies' Aid Society will meet at the home of Mrs T. V. Bobbitt next Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock.

We attended the Children's day service held at Union Chapel 4th Sunday in May. It was fine. The children did their best, and some of us know what that means, for our young folks at Union Chapel. But the best of all was the collection and offering which amounted to something like $17.00.

In the absence of our pastor Mr. S. R. Harris gave us an excellent address on Foreign Missions. He told us exactly what we needed to hear, no more, no less.

May all who heard profit by his good advice. Mrs. J. W. Davis.

Hope, Chatham Ct.

Rev. J. H. Bowman filled his regular appointment at Hope Church June 11, 1911. He presented to an attentive congregation, a strong, forceful sermon from the text: As was his custom. St. Luke 4:16. Showing clearly and simply the power of habits. The more we see of our pastor the more we realize his worth and our good fortune in having him with us.

The Sunday school at this place is still growing. An attendance of 81 on June the 4th. A. L. H., Reporter.

We were at Friendship yesterday and there was a large congregation present. It is uplifting to preach to this people. so attentive and appreciative. After I closed the service Bro. T. H. R. Pritchett came to me and said two young girls were crying, and I enquired the cause, and he said they wanted to join the church. Their mother was sick, and their father and mother could not come. I said well, we will call the congregation to quiet, which we did. and I received them into the church. Then they seemed happy. I found they were Bro. John Pritchett's daughters and that I had baptized them when I was on the circuit before. This speaks loud for infant baptism They were intent and remained and cried. It reminded me of the little boy that was crying because he could not get his lesson. Someone said, It will do no good to cry, but he said, It will, it brings someone to my rescue. Why have our people abandoned this precious duty? I am writing a book on infant baptism, only waiting till I am able to have it published. I baptised one child for Bro. John Pritchett last November, and am to baptize another soon. Bring the little ones into the fold. These girls would have been unhappy, yes, grieved had they not joined and they looked so bright and happy after they had joined. Get the lesson, will you?

On last Saturday at Iron Works Mill I baptized Bro. George Wrenn; he was 75 years old. Sister Minnie Wrenn, his granddaughter, and Sister Ethel Creasy, by immersion. Five to join in two days. The first two came in through the training of their parents. The last three through the influence of the home prayer meeting. Bro. Archie Sheldon professed and joined Midway last fall, and he has gone into the work and has been holding prayer meetings at the homes around Midway and at the church. Consequently, an old man happily converted, also two girls, and they have been added to the church. Others made happy: Bro. Arch. encouraged to go ahead. Oh! if the members of the church would only work. Last Thursday I was called to go below Lawsonville to attend the funeral of old Bro. John Sawyers, 84 years old. He was a good and highly respected neighbor, a faithful member of Penile M. E. Church for years. A large congregation present. The funeral was at his home as his wife is a cripple. He was buried in the family graveyard near-by. This is a busy life.

Rev. H. L. Elderdice, D. D., of Westminster, Md., will preach at Fair Grove at 11 A. M. June 18; at Friendship at 3:30 P. M., June 18; at Brown Summit at 8:00 P. M.; will address at Mispah at 8 P. M. June 19; Midway at 8 P. M., June 20; at Bethany at 11 A. M., June 21.

Subject of address, Old Time Sweethearts.

Fraternally,
C. E. M. Raper.

P. S.—85 in Sunday school at Friendship yesterday. Bro. James Weatherly, Supt., was not able to be there. He was missed so much. Bro. T. H. R. Pritchett, Asst. Supt., acting. Children's day in the future.

It is reported on Cleveland Circuit that Bro. Reed has received a dog on his salary, and because of this fact one good brother is going to give the $5.00 he was to give Bro. Reed to the Asheville church. The dog is a valuable one, a watch dog. He stays awake all night and keeps others awake (other people). This is a good way to make money for the Asheville church. Any one wanting a good dog write to Bro. Reed at Fallston, N. C. He will be glad to set them on the track of a good dog or set a good dog on the track of them.

BURLINGTON.

For the past two Sundays our attendance has been 204 and 214. High Point seems to be a little ahead of us now, but we are expecting to grow some more soon. Just watch us.

We were glad to have Rev. G. L. Curry preach for us last Sunday night in the absence of Bro. Williams, who was at Haw River. He has been assisting in the meeting at that place for the past week, and they are having a good one.

Our special meeting begins next Sunday. Rev. T. M. Johnson of Asheboro will assist. Pray for it.

More next week. Hastily,

IVY CIRCUIT.

Mrs. William Drake was received into the church at Democrat Sunday morning service. There are others we hope to take in soon.

Our third quarterly conference will be held at Pensacola Saturday before the 4th Sunday in July. Hope we will have better attendance than we have had in the past. D. R. Williams.

THE POSTAL CARD.

W. F. Kennett, Editor.

It seems easier for us to get out a weekly than a monthly—it has been more than a month since the last issue of the Postal Card appeared.

Our second quarterly conference was held in Bethel Church on Saturday before the first Sunday in May. The attendance was good. Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk was with us and preached an excellent sermon at 11 A. M., and delivered a very helpful address at the opening of the business session in the afternoon. Bros. J. B. Ogburn and P. H. Angel were selected as nominees for delegate to the next Annual Conference.

There is general regret in the Bethel community over the removal of Bro. Wm. N. Pegram and wife from the community. Bro. and Sister Pegram have been most earnest workers in church and Sunday school—always present and ready to do anything for the advancement of the church. Their presence and faithful work will be greatly missed. Bro. R. W. Jones is the new Sunday school Superintendent at Bethel with Bro. F. M. Pegram as his faithful assistant. Palestine Church now has a Sunday school for the first time in several years. Bro. D. P. Lemons is the new S. S. Superintendent at Gideon's Grove, with Bro. Wirt Angel as assistant.

The Flat Rock Sunday school is unusually well attended. The pastor has a very large class which he teaches twice a month. Children's Day exercises will be held the fourth Sunday in this month. Bro. Walter J. Williams, the old Superintendent, is yet at the helm and is as popular as ever.

A number of our aged church members are in very poor health. Bro. Jere Highfill, nearly 85 years of age, and our oldest Flat Rock member, is yet very feeble. "Uncle Jim" Sharen, our oldest Palestine member, has been very sick. He is in his 80th year, while "Uncle Allen" Pegram, our oldest Bethel member, now in his 87th year, is also quite feeble. Mrs. Rankin Pegram, of Flat Rock, has been quite sick. Mrs. R. S. Ogburn has been sick, but was able to go to church last Sunday and sit in the carriage under the shade of the trees near the church and listen to the sermon.

Our schedule of special meetings with help promised, is as follows:

Palestine, 5th Sunday in July, Rev. A. L. Hunter to help.

Bethel, first Sunday in August, Rev. G. F. Millaway to help.

Gideon's Grove, first Sunday in October, Rev. Edward Suits to help.

Flat Rock, fourth Sunday in October, Rev. Edward Suits to help.

The long drouth is making many of our people feel a little blue. We have heard of one preacher who says it is sent on us as a judgment for our evil ways and lack of faithfulness to the Lord. If this is true, we would better hasten to repent and to reconsecrate ourselves to the Lord. Anyway there is need of greater faithfulness and more genuine right living, and we would close this number by quoting Isaiah 52:1—"Awake, awake; put on thy strength, O Zion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem."

FROM BAXLEY, GA.

I do not know of anything of interest to send to the readers of the Herald unless it be concerning this section of the country.

I presume that Pastor Dixon and members at High Point continue to tell you of the good work being done there. Under the efficient pastorate and earnest efforts of the officers and members there, I feel sure that the congregation and Sunday school work are moving steadily up to the high standard set at the beginning of the conference year. Each Sunday morning, through heart and mental vision, I watch the throng of interested children and earnest men and women as they gather at the church for school and preaching. I likewise see in their room my class of junior philatheas maintaining a splendid record.

During the last ninety days I have been in South Georgia, and have not had the privilege of regularly reading the Herald. I have found the church people here about equally divided between the M. E., South, and the Baptist.

Baxley is the court house town of Appling County, situated on the main line of the Southern Railway, about centrally between Atlanta and Jacksonville. While the political division and native citizenship are old, yet the development is new and modern. Recently the attention of the outside world has been attracted by the wealth that lies in the untenanted soil, and in the many undeveloped resources that have been practically concealed by the large timber and turpentine interests which have been the large sources of wealth here for more than a generation. These industries still exist, but the fountains that have so generously flowed into the coffers of the ceaseless grinder are rapidly failing, and the builder is following in the wake of the despoiler. Lands that hitherto were valued only for the pine are now rapidly growing in price for the plow. Fields are following the forests, and sand-clay roads are succeeding the trail. The lumberman's hut has been torn away for the planter's home. The "pinerooter" is losing his prestige to the blueblooded berkshire, and the long-horned scrub is yielding his grass to the shorthorned durham. The deer has abandoned his range to the goat, and the industrious hen scratches where the heron waded and swam. Civilization's hook has emptied the alligator's hole, and the heel of the "streeker" has crushed the serpent's head. Indeed, old things are passing away, and all things are becoming new. The Russian, Syrian, the indominable Jew and the ubiquitous sparrow chatter on our streets, and the drummer and insurance agent are here dispensing the same old yarns. These things show that the new country soon gets up with the old, and may go by. North Carolinians have always been on the lookout for good, cheap, land, and they are here, as are also many from every neighboring state. The native is in the minority.

The soils here are: the black alluvial, the gray sand loam and the red "pebbly." In the order named they appear on the flat, the gently rolling, and the hilly lands.

Fishing is one of the chief sports, and is an industry with some of the natives who make a living from the sale of their catch. They usually provide for the accommodation of parties that often go to these rude fisheries for a fry which is prepared by the fisherman's wife while the members of the party try their luck with the hooks. I recently joined one of these parties for an evening on the river. As we went I challenged the crowd with the statement that I never fished, but I caught more than any one else along, and generally as many as all the others. Some of the experts assayed to give me a Waterloo, but my record was sustained by one luckless cat that chose my hook, and the crowd was beaten.

Recently I visited Saint Simon Island, a reviving summer resort near Brunswick. On an infrequented spot still remains some of the old town of Fredereca and the Chas. Wesley oak in the broad shade of which he taught the early settlers a new form of worship, and planted the "religion of feeling" and the seeds of Methodism in the hearts of a free people. Few visitors are shown this ancient village that sleeps quietly several miles removed from the hotels and cheap places of amusement. Perhaps present plans may restore much of the ancient glory of St. Simons. In a large pasture there is one of the prettiest spots ever seen. The old Lovers' Lane is now only a farm road that leads more than two miles between two rows of grand old oak trees whose bows lap and form in unbroken regularity and grace the loveliest vista one ever sees. Other history and relics give some idea of the old landscape beauty of this historic island.

Space is too much taken for further detail.

South Georgia is now a popular section with the home-seeker. He finds here the best land for the least money. Every thing points to rapid development and increased population. R. T. P.

NORTH CAROLINA BRANCH.

Report of Corresponding Secretary.

In presenting to you the ninth annual report of the North Carolina Branch, I do so with the sincere belief that we are advancing and I trust the advance is being made thoughtfully and prayerfully. Our labors, trials, and experiences only serve to bring us closer together, to broaden and fit us for ever increasing responsibility. I can bring you no new story of large increase in members or finance, but I can give to you the story of greater fidelity to our work and a more abiding interest among our workers. Many agencies have come forward to foster and educate and bring together the great throngs who are willing to unitedly engage in this wonderful movement in missions.

God said, "Behold, I have set before thee an open door and no man can shut it." Our part is to make it possible for those who know not Him in the forgiveness of sin to pass through and enter into the joy of a loving Savior; for them to throw off the shackles of shame and degradation and sin and come out on the side of Him who gave his only begotten Son. Last year missionary enthusiasm spread over our country; business men spoke on the commercial side of the subject; ministers preached about it from an educational and religious standpoint; women and children plead for the cause for love and sympathy for their fellow brothers and sisters. This was particularly pleasing to those who have worked and prayed for the spread of the Gospel, and it was easier to believe that the world could be evangelized in the twentieth century.

The work of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions has progressed, not rapidly, but steadily. The women in Japan have proven themselves capable along all lines and have won praise nd respect from high Japanese officials. The money entrusted to their care has been wisely and judiciously spent. Great care has been taken in training students, not only in Christianity, but in everything to make well-rounded, honest, upright citizens. Every influence has been brought to bear upon the women to induce them to establish christian homes. In order for us to compete with the government schools, give our pupils equal advantages with theirs, it has been necessary for us to provide for a new building in which Domestic Science and other branches can be taught. Our treasurer, Mrs. Marshall, has instituted the Gold Bags as a means by which to raise the money for this needed addition . In China Bro. Heininger and his new wife are doing a good work. They need the prayers and co-operation of our people at this time. Miss Mallett, our own missionary, has endeared herself to all who have had occasion to know of her sweet sacrificing spirit. She was remembered at Christmas time with a cash present which amounted to about $15 by some of the members of the N. C. Branch. This came in nicely as she had been in a hospital undergoing an operation for appendicitis. Pray that she may continue to gain strength and be able to serve those for whom she gave up friends and home. During the past year the Ex. Com. has had three meetings. At the first it was decided that the "Contest" plan for increasing attendance, the Birthday Fund for the China work, and Calendar plan for Japan would be adopted. These plans were printed and sent to each corresponding secretary with the request that they be used in auxiliaries. At the second meeting the Cor. Sec. was ordered to divide the names of ministers, send to some willing workers with request that each write and ask minister to send names of two women in each church with whom she might correspond with intention of organizing an auxiliary and getting representatives to attend the Branch meeting. Few responses came. The last meeting was called on account of a request from Board to release them from coming to North Carolina on account of so much expense. This was granted and partial arrangements for Branch meeting made. Thank-offering programs were sent to every minister and corresponding secretary with request that a service be held in each church, as it is the only time during the year that opportunity is given for a collection for the women's work| Your Corresponding Secretary has tried to aid in carrying out the calendar plan and is sending out gold bags. On March 1st report blanks were sent to all the corresponding secretaries and from them the following report has been arranged:

Henderson was the first auxiliary to report. Twelve meetings have been held. Eleven members. $16.42 sent to Branch and Mrs. F. R. Harris responded to the Gold Bag call. They hoped to send delegates to Branch meeting but were unable to do so. Henderson is one of the best and strongest churches in the State, and all of the smaller churches wonder what Henderson and Greensboro are going to do.

Mt. Moriah reports 11 meetings. 15 members. They are using calendar plan, have readings and varied programs. They are always prompt to obey the call of duty.

Elise in Moore county has disbanded, but Mrs. P. A. Williams sent $1.00 in gold bag for Building Fund.

Graham has no society, but Mrs. Geo. L. Curry collected $2.43 for gold bag and wanted to send representatives to Branch meeting, but could not.

Siler City has no auxiliary. Mrs. E. B. Siler sent $1.00 Gold bags. The church is small there, but they are interested both in foreign and home missions.

Burlington report comes full of regrets and good resolutions: interested, willing workers, few leaders. God didn't call all of us as leaders. Some of the best work is done by those who cannot lead. Society has 21 active members, 2 honorary. Five subscribers to Missionary Record. They use mite boxes and calendar plan. Two delegates attended Branch meeting.

The Aid Society at Julian always responds to every call through Mrs. W. T. Hanner. They pay $15.00 toward Miss Mallett's salary. Mrs. W. T. Hanner and Mrs. W. C. Lassiter attended Branch meeting.

High Point comes bristling with the best pledge of $50.00 overpaid by $1.27. An increase of 9 members, making 38. The largest active membership of any auxiliary in the Branch, also largest number of honorary members. 10 subscribers to Missionary Record. They use mite boxes. Total amt. sent Branch Treasurer, $131.84. High Point reports Precious Jewels society, which sent $2.50.

Liberty is disbanded. Mrs. A. W. Curtis is making effort to collect money for building fund.

Kernersville Society has not met since 1907. Mrs. Joseph Hepler doesn't know whether it can be reorganized or not.

Asheboro sends in the best report in the history of the auxiliary here. Pledges $25 this year on Miss Mallett's salary and $15 each year while she is in Japan. Use mite boxes and birthday fund plan: raised $27.23 in gold bags through their efforts by different members sending bags to friends and interested persons. Had a "Golden Shower" meeting and Thank-offering service. Sent $106.68 to Treasurer. Are aiding in carrying out calendar plan. Busy Bee S. S. Class sent $1.70 for Birthday fund.

Mebane auxiliary died, but Mrs. Henry C. Nicholson hopes it may be revived and prays for the success of the work.

Mrs. W. C. Whitaker reports no society on Halifax Circuit, but sends $1.00 from C. E. Society and $1.00 for herself for Golden Shower.

Bethel sends in a letter with report telling of the difficulties under which country auxiliaries work—long distances to drive. Many excuses. On other hand gives account of interesting programs of how some of the dear women love the work and are willing to make sacrifices. They have 20 active members, 2 honorary: held the Thank-offering service and sent $5.42 for Miss Mallett's salary.

Mt. Pleasant, Liberty Circuit, sent a delegate to Branch Meeting. They want more interest and knowledge, two good omens for a progressive organization. Number of members, 14; amount for Miss Mallett's salary, $10.00; amount sent Branch Treasurer, $10.50.

Winston has a very good society, but on account of absence of secretary no report was sent to me. Treasury shows that Winston was heard from.

Fair Grove, Why Not Circuit, is another society that never fails to respond. One plan they use would be helpful to all of us: it is that they have an auxiliary fund, made in various ways—entertainmnnts etc. From this fund contributions are made. If any members fail to pay dues, it is drawn from this fund. Thank-offering service was held. Calendar plan used. Number of members, 14. $4.00 collected in gold bags.

Last but by no means least is our hostess auxiliary, the Greensboro, which sustains her former reputation as to leading in finances, having sent $313.08 to Branch Treasurer. Their $50.00 pledge on Miss Mallett's salary is raised by mite boxes. Thank-offering collection amounted to $23.41. Through the auspices of the W. F. M. Society the Sunday-school has adopted the Birthday Fund plan, but it is too new to be heard from in a substantial way. This society holds the banner also for Record subscribers, the number being 24. A contest has recently been used and the number increased. There are three memorial members in this society, the only ones in the State.

As I come to the close of this year's work I cannot refrain from thanking you all for the confidence placed in me, for cooperating with me in the carrying out of plans to extend our Master's work; and pray God's richest blessings on the work in which we are all interested and especialy on my successor who I hope may have more time and thought for this great work. May we not labor in His vineyard, try to adhere to our motto, "More members, more money, more missions," and in the end hear the words "Well done."

Mrs. W. C. Hammer, Cor. Sec.

MY GATEMAN'S FLAG.

When I get off the train in the late afternoon, I invariably call out to the gateman as I pass his little house: "See you tonight, Mr. Butler." For it is a stormy night indeed when I do not slip over to the gatehouse, after my work is done, to eat an apple with the gateman.

Many a pleasant chat have I had with this old, crippled gateman, when all is quiet at the unfrequented crossing. He can see my student lamp from his little window, and when it burns too long and I come to see him later than usual, he never fails to advise me in a serious manner "to turn in, in good season."

As we became better friends, my curiosity about his wooden leg increased. I thought that the deep lines about his mouth, evidently caused by sorrow and disappointment, had some connection with the Grand Army button in the lapel of his coat and with a tattered flag hung on the wall of the gatehouse.

My curiosity was satisfied and my surmises were proven correct by a chat we had one Friday evening. I was telling him ters, the sugar-houses, and the plantation about ten miles up the river from New Orleans. I had described the old slave quarters the sugar-houses, and the plantation mansion. The mansion was one of the few surviving ante-bellum homes. It was a fine old house, famous in war times. There is still a rumor that it is haunted by a Union soldier who disappeared there.

I pictured for the interested gateman a little hut, the last one out on the way to the sugar fields. The hut was dilapidated when I saw it. Through its broken walls crept fragrant clematis. A stunted banana palm had grown up at the threshold, as a guard, and four magnolias stood as sentinals at the four corners.

An old negro mammy had told me that it was from this hut that some ruffians had dragged a negro to lynch him. It was during war times, she told me, that the lynching occurred, but even now she could remember every detail of the affair. And as she stood there, puffing her pipe, she pointed out to me a tree near the levee, where they were about to lynch the negro, when three Yankees climbed over the levee and interfered. Evidently they saw an open fight was useless, for one of them unwrapped a union flag and wound it around the negro's body, warning the lynchers not to shoot.

But they fired, and with the shot the negro and two soldiers fell. The other clapped his hand on his knee, staggered a moment, and then sank down. The ruffians, realizing that their only safety lay behind the rebel's line, took the wounded soldier and disappeared.

"I allers wanted to know whareber they tuk dat sojer. He tried to sabe ma bruder," the old negress said and her face lighted up with true emotion, under the soiled bandana.

"There," I said, eager to praise the hero, "is an example of silent, unpaid"—I got no further, for Mr. Butler interrupted: "That plantation was the old Craighead place, wasn't it?" and his voice had a tremble in it which I didn't then understand. Surprised that the crippled gateman knew anything about my story, I nodded assent.

"Well, I guess I can finish the story," he said, "but I don't ever tell anybody. Jack Woodman, Henry Dorr, and I were out scouting one day when we heard a fracas and jumped over the levee to see what was up. The old negress told you what happened when we tried to break up that lynching.

"When the rebels fled, they strapped me on a mule and took me along. We traveled fast for a long time, I can't say how long, for my knee bone was crushed and I fainted about every so often. The next thing I remember, I was in Libby Prison, with one leg shy and mighty sick.

"How I lived was a wonder, for the food wasn't fit for a hog. But I worried along, hoping to die, for I had a fever that I could feel rotting my insides. After the surrender they shipped me up North. Once back in God's country, I picked up fast. But the doctor told me that I could not work inside, so I came on here and have been keeping other people from having their legs cut off ever since.

"I wasn't cut out for a gateman," he said, after a pause. "I left high honors at Yale to go to the war. No, I wasn't cut out for a gateman. But I guess that I have had more real satisfaction in life than I would have had if I had let that negro die without a struggle."

Finally he looked up with a queer light in his eye I shall never forget. "Boy," he said, "that is the flag I wrapped the negro in," and he pointed to the tattered flag on the wall of the gatehouse. "I have kept it ever since I grabbed it when I fell, shot through the knee. I knew it would be the only tangible thing I should have to show for my life. This flag has stood for humble duty and sacrifice. I'll be getting through pretty soon now, and, when I do, I'd kind of like you to keep the flag for me. It will help you as it has helped me, if you let it stand for humble duty and sacrifice."

An express was coming, and the crippled gateman went out to put down the gates. —Frederic Batterfield in Zion's Herald.

RITA AND THE BIRDIE.

Rita was getting over a hard spell of sickness. The doctor had left medicine for her to take which did not taste at all good. Rita knew she must take it, but, oh, how she hated it. She cried and make it very hard for mother to give it to her, which worried mother very much, for she was so anxious that her little girl should be well once more and she knew she could not be if she did not take the doctor's medicine.

One day when it was time for the medicine Rita's young lady cousin Isabel happened to be there. She opened her eyes wide when she saw the fuss Rita made about taking it, and how hard it was for her mother to give it to her.

"You'd make a fuss, too, if you had to take such horrid stuff," cried the little girl, with tears in her eyes, turning her head away from the spoon mother held to her lips.

"Why don't you take it the way the birdies do?" asked cousin Isabel, suddenly.

Rita's eyes opened.

"How?" she asked.

"Don't you remember when we were in the country last summer how we watched those baby birds in the nest in the big apple-tree, and how we saw their mother feed them?"

"Yes indeed." Rita's face brightened at the recollection. "They opened their whole heads when their mother fed them."

"Now, you play you are a birdie and I will feed you."

Cousin Isabel took the spoon with the disagreeable medicine in it from mother's hand.

"Open your mouth wide—that's the way!"

Rita laughed and tried to open her mouth wide as she had seen the baby birds do and, before she realized it, the medicine was down, and she had scarcely tasted it or minded its unpleasantness.

"Why, it was not half as bad as it usually is," she said, wonderingly, to her mother.

"That's because you were thinking of the birdie and not of the medicine," nodded cousin Isabel. "You know, whenever there is something unpleasant to do or to take, if you will only try to think of something pleasant at the same time, it helps a whole lot, and sometimes you forget the disagreeable thing entirely."

"Well," said Rita, "if it makes me not mind taking that horrid medicine I'll try it all the time."

After that, whenever it came time for the medicine, mother would say, "Open your mouth, little birdie!" and Rita would open her mouth very wide and, in a twinkling, the disagreeable stuff would be gone.

It came to be a by-word in the family. After Rita got well and did not have to take the medicine any more, there came other times when she had to do or to bear something unpleasant, and then mother would say, "Remember the birdie!" and Rita would laugh and try to think of something pleasant to take her mind off the disagreeable thing and to make the best of it.

Even when she grew to be a big girl, she still "thought of the birdie" whenever there was anything unpleasant to be borne, and, somehow, the hard thing was not half as hard as it would have been if she had thought only of that and worried because of its unpleasantness.—Anna Guilbert Mahon, in The Sunday School Times.

THE COMMON FOLKS.

Madam Frog was taking a sunbath on a clump of moss, close beside a merry little stream that ran, bubbling and tinkling, in the cheeriest way possible, over green slimy stones and smooth white ones, through the clover in the meadow and down to the big dark wood, that cast its giant shadows over everything within reach.

Almost at her elbow, as you might say, she heard a voice: "Good morning, my dear, I hope you are enjoying this fine weather!"

Madam Frog knew that voice, and with one leap she stationed herself on a gray bit of rock in the middle of the water.

Mrs. Grass Snake lifted up her head very close to the clump of moss. She was peaceably disposed at present, as she had just made a comfortable breakfast on two young frogs that ventured too near for their own safety.

Madam Frog's heart was beating so fast she could scarcely breathe, but of course she would not let her enemy see she was frightened.

What a lovely dress she wore—yellow laid upon a bronze-green ground in stripes and spots, the longest stripes at the back, and a short stripe on each side. She fanned herself slowly with the four fingers of the right hand, which was also her front foot, and gazed pensively at Mrs. Grass Snake, who had coiled herself in a lazy heap.

"I am so glad I do not have to creep along like you," remarked Madam Frog, "I should hate to come in contact with the dust and dirt; and, too, it is rather wearing on one's clothes."

"Creeping is a graceful exercise if you are made in the right fashion to indulge in it," replied Mrs. Grass Snake. "I have seven hundred little bones in my spinal column, fastened together with ball-and-socket joints. A pair of ribs is also fixed on each of these bones, and I may really be said to walk on the ends of my ribs. This helps to give me that lovely gliding motion that is so refined and noiseless. Now, your movements are rather jerky; you should practice the glide, my dear."

Madam Frog took a dip in the cool water. Her skin dress was growing dry and liable to crack, as it was a tight fit. When she rose from the water, an insect alighted on the rock. Out went the funny tongue that had been hanging down her throat. It was sticky, and the insect was speedily captured.

Sometimes, when the insect was horny, she would have to use the few teeth on her upper jaw to help grind it up before swallowing.

"What a miserable mouthful!" cried Mrs. Grass Snake in derision. "If you had a skull put together loosely like mine, you might eat something worth having."

Madam Frog closed her lips tight. Any one, to see her, would suppose she might be thinking twice before she answered back; but it was only because she needed air, and, having no ribs, must swallow the air in her mouth, as it was drawn in through her nose.

Seeing that Madam Frog was not in a talkative humor, Mrs. Grass Snake hastened away to find a more congenial companion.

Although it was fall, and cool winds blew the colored leaves in rainbow showers over the ground, still the sun shone warm and bright, and the gray rock was hot enough for any cold-blooded creature.

Grandfather Frog lifted his head above the water, his gold-rimmed eyes blinking with delight as he saw his favorite daughter.

"Good morning, my dear," croaked Grandfather Frog. "I am glad to find you alone, without any of those troublesome children at hand. You should train them better, my dear. Their voices are really earsplitting, so shrill and harsh. They grate upon my nerves, and there is no getting away from such a crowd."

Grandfather Frog was very old. His teeth were worn out, so they failed to grind up the horny insect he had swallowed for his breakfast. He felt grouchy and grumpy, and inclined to find fault, not because there was any true reason for it, but a bad digestion is not apt to make one sweet.

"Look out, Grandfather!" called Madam Frog, in warning tones, as she dived into the cool depth.

Before he could turn around he, too, had slipped into the depths, not of the sparkling water, but Mrs. Grass Snake's throat.

He made a tough morsel, perhaps, but one cannot always select the best for a free dinner.—Lizzie DeArmond, in Zion's Herald.

AN AIRY BEDROOM.

It used to be fashionable when two women met to discuss their respective ailments, but now such talk is altogether out of date. Happily, it is becoming the style to be healthy, and one of the subjects on which the comparing notes is frequent is the various methods and arrangements for outdoor sleeping. One family who have become zealous devotees to sleeping in the open air began the practice in this way:

A playhouse for a little girl of the house had been built by an indulgent uncle on top of the side piazza. The lower part was composed of some old-fashioned inside shutters which had been resurrected from the cellar. Beams rising from the floor of the piazza supported a shingled roof. The space between the top of the shutters and the roof was left open and fitted with mosquito netting. The warm summer weather was just beginning when the playhouse was ready for occupation.

"I'm going to sleep out there," announced the little girl of the house one warm night, "and I want some one to come with me."

After a little demurring on the part of the grown-ups, a mattress was dragged through the window, a bed made up in the playhouse and the little girl and her aunt settled themselves there for the night. The next morning they were both enthusiastic about the delightful coolness and the refreshing sleep they had enjoyed.

A few nights later another mattress was placed beside the first one and other members of the family migrated to the outdoor sleeping quarters.

As the summer wore away and the cool nights of fall came on, other accessories were added to the sleeping arrangements, but there was no talk of returning to the house.

Another mattress was laid over each of the first ones to make warmer, softer couches. The number of blankets and comfortables increased as the weather grew colder. Pieces of oilcloth were placed on the outside of the beds to keep them dry.

As winter approached, hoods of outing flannel were constructed to tie snugly under the chins, leaving only the faces exposed. Hot water bottles put in the beds early in the evening heated them like miniature stoves. It was found that ordinary jugs filled with very hot water retained the heat better than anything else. One of these set upright, the bedclothes forming a tent over it, gave by bedtime as warm and cozy a little nest to creep into as one could desire. It was not necessary to cool the house bedrooms by leaving the window open all night; they could be kept warm and comfortable for the dressing in the morning.

These people found that the sleep in the outdoor air was sounder and more refreshing than indoor sleep. For those members of the family, especially, who must be within walls much during the day, the long nightly draughts of oxygen proved to them indeed an "elixir of life."

Then, too, there was the delightful closeness to nature. Awaking in the morning, the first sight to greet their eyes was always the strip of sky above the roof of the next house. Sometimes it was dotted with baby clouds tinted by the pink of sunrise; at other times it portended a storm, and again it was clear, and the first sun-rays brightened into gold a corner of their airy room. If they chanced to open their eyes in the night the stars in Orion's sword glittered before them, or the planet Mars gleamed ruddily. The moon, too, often wandered into their peculiar strip of sky, and the man in it grinned at them. The birds peered at them from the next roof; the branches of the elm and the apple tree in the yard were about them so close that they felt like the baby in the Mother Goose rhyme who was "rocked in a tree-top."

When their friends shiver and say: "I don't see how you can ever stand it," they smile and reply: "And we don't see, for our part, how you can ever stand sleeping indoors."—Good Health.

PRAY FOR RAIN.

Now up to this, June 12th, we are suffering (as we think) for rain.

We are taught in the word of God to pray for what we need. Of course there is abundant rain for some—for many—but will those who have the abundance pray for us.

Even if you were to learn of better seasons with us, for which we hope, we need your prayers. We need your sympathy, and if you pray for us, even in this case, you will, in connection with the spiritual laws, sympathize with us more.

A distant friend remarked that "We hear from you through the paper, but come to see us." He has had rain of late. Calling through the paper is one of the very convenient ways and is a pleasure, is cheap—if those who publish please. Of course we are not frightened, but this is really a social call. By the grace of God we are contented. "Godliness with contentment is great gain," as we read; but the only way to be contented is to trust in God. We can't trust in God without praying to God, and humbling to God. It is one of the very reasonable things to ask for an interest in the prayers of the people of God. Seeing the parched ground and the danger as it now appears is enough to excite us to see "what helpless creatures we are."

We could not live in this community without rain. However, the promise is that "seed time and harvest shall not fail."

It is our duty to try to do well, and in order to do well for bread, etc., we need rain. It is our duty to pray for rain; to think seriously about what we need and to pray for our various needs. It is a privilege and a great honor to us to call upon God and to look to Him for our needs. The thing to do is to be practically faithful on our part and then we can look up confidently for the smiles of heaven. (It belongs to stupid humiliation, and even degradation, to look to man when we ought to look to God.) But the idea in view is to humble to God. Humility that comes by (human) oppression and degradation does not help to godliness.

The humility connected with worship is the thing for our spiritual good. Of course we are hoping for rain and for the lineage of "seed time and harvest," but it is our duty to pray about it, and it is a grand social privilege that we have of calling on our friends far and near to pray for us and to sympathize. It is a great thing, under God, for us to have to use means to live, and even to be thoughtful of the interests of our commonwealth in church and state. W. F. Grabs.

C. E. TOPIC FOR JUNE 25—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

By Rev. R. P. Anderson.

Missions in China.

Scripture: 2 Cor. 11:21-28.

The Leader's Talk:—One of the most interesting figures at the Nanking Christian Endeavor convention in 1909 was Ding Lee May, a native pastor. When twenty-eight years old, he entered the ministry, in the year of the Boxer uprising, but before the storm burst. One day he was seized and tortured with fiendish cruelty. His flesh, says Rev. Chas. Ernest Scott, was beaten to jelly with bludgeons. Long, flat, saw-edged bamboo staves hissed like serpents and fell on his naked body. When death was imminent at the five-hundredth stroke, he was thrust into a hole so vile that words cannot convey an idea of its horrors. Even there he preached the love of Christ, like Paul, to his jailors.

Deliverance came, however, before his enemies got time to murder him. Then bearing in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, he went forth to do a wonderful work. Revivals sprang up everywhere he went. To give a single example, in Chou Fu 1,398 inquirers were enrolled as a result of his ministry. In other cities hundreds and thousands flocked to Christ.

College-bred Chinese students can get from $30 to $150 a month out of secular work, while the best churches pay only from $5 to $20 a month; hence there has been a dearth of educated Chinese pastors. Pastor Ding visited the colleges, and hundreds of students have definitely consecrated themselves to the ministry. Pastor Ding has been asked the secret of his success. His reply is characteristic: "I have no secret, except prayer.' And this is the great secret of spiritual power. If the church had a baptism of prayer it would have a baptism of power that would bring all the earth to the feet of Jesus

Mission Notes from China.

Five years ago, September 20, 1906, China issued a decree to abolish opium-smoking in the empire within ten years. This is the most extensive warfare ever inaugurated by any nation against a private habit, and puts to shame our half-way measures against alcohol. There are—or were—twenty-five million opium-smokers in China, but the authorities do not say, "It it better to have no law against opium than to have a law that is broken." They punish the law-breakers. One official in Anhwei, disguised as a coolie, found eight dens filled with smokers. He had the inmates bambooed on the spot, the smokers getting 200 strokes, and the proprietor getting 300.

Woman in China is "despised and rejected." When a lady missionary told her that her husband did not get drunk, smoke opium, or beat her, a poor Chinese woman said: "You have been talking to me about heaven and hell in a world to come. Your life now is heaven and mine is hell."

Infanticide is horribly common in China. M. E. Ritzman says that a missionary lady in South China once asked a group of women how many of them had destroyed their baby girls, and all confessed to having killed one at least, while one acknowledged that she had destroyed five. The reason is largely poverty. It is unprofitable to bring up daughters, since they get married before they reach the wage-earning stage, and are only a burden to parents.

Girls are often sold into slavery in China. In ordinary times girl slaves can be bought at prices varying from $5 to $100. In famine times one may get a bargain. During one of the great famines some years ago 3,000 female children were sold to dealers in a large city, and were carried like poultry in baskets. The price of some was fifteen cents. Some are used as domestics, while others are kept for immoral purposes.

A Chinese proverb says, "For each pair of bound feet there has been a whole kang, or big bath, full of tears." The mothers of lily-footed girls usually sleep with a stick near them, and rarely hesitate to use it if the child in her pain disturbs the household with her wails. That is, if the girl is not sent to sleep in an outhouse.

In China there are three hundred million people that cannot read and write their own language. Thought has moved in narrow grooves for centuries, which makes it hard for the people to understand even the simplest teachings of Christianity.

The Presbyterians have a mission at Lien Chou, in Southern China. In a near-by town called Sam Kong there was a riot, and a group of disturbers talked of marching to Lien Chou and sacking the mission. The men of a number of villages near Lien Chou, however, held a mass-meeting and said that they would go to the defence of the mission premeses if necessary. This ended the danger. Thus some of the Chinese began to recognize their friends.

For the first time in human history the Christian Sabbaths are marked, along with Confucian feasts and holy days, in the Chinese calendar. This calendar is in a way an official book. It is a guide to correct conduct for the year, telling what days are best for visiting, for offering presents, and so on. It is said that three out of five Chinese houses possess these books.

In the best-manned province in China there is one missionary for every 40,000 of the population, while five other provinces have only one missionary for every 100,000. Four provinces have one missionary for every 250,000, which would be like having 12 missionaries for New York City. Suppose New York had only twelve ministers, poorly supplied with funds. Somebody might well write books and tell how Christianity had failed there!

The China Inland Mission reports that during the 35 years of its work preceding the Boxer rising in 1900, 12,964 persons had been baptized by the mission's workers. In the nine years immediately succeeding the Boxer crisis the mission has received 20,176 communicants into the church. That is one effect of persecution.

In Hanknow, last December, great meetings were held by native leaders of the Chinese church. The conference discussed problems of religious work during the day, and in the evening held evangelistic meetings. It is estimated that 10,000 people heard the gospel each night, 2,000 of this number being students. Chapels were crowded and hundreds of inquirers were enrolled.

In 1895 nine hundred cities in China were closed to the missionaries. Today every city in the empire is open to teachers and every province has representatives of the gospel.

China has its Pocket Testament League, the members of which pledge themselves to carry a Testament with them and to read it every day. The aim is to have a branch of the league in every Christian Church in the land.

Bishop J. W. Bashford says that China has made more progress during the past year than any other nation on the globe. She has done without a tremor big things that have taken many years to grow in the West. Thus a beginning has been made in representative government, and the old despotism is under the ban. The regent has abolished the custom of the people's prostrating themselves before the sovereign. A decree has abolished slavery. And then, there is substantial progress in opium reform. Besides, lotteries have been abolished.

Leprosy is common in China, chiefly in the southeastern maritime provinces. Dr. John Jackson, of London, says that he found 800 lepers crowded into dark hovels in narrow lanes, one mile outside the East Gate of Canton. A pathetic sight was blind Un Ho hobbling through the street on crutches, one leg having been amputated. She was converted before her leprosy was discovered. When the stroke fell she came to this leper heathen village and introduced Christianity to these "butt ends of human being," as Stevenson calls the sufferers. There are twelve stations where work is carried on for lepers, and the need for more is crying. $25 supports a leper in comparative comfort for a year.

From Shanghai comes an account of a little evangelistic band of native Christians. They visit the homes of the Christians where they sing hymns that soon attract the crowd. Then the gospel is preached. This gives the native Christian a chance to explain to his neighbors what Christianity is, and directs inquirers to some place where they can get more instruction.

A German missionary from the province of Shansi tells of a man who came to the mission station to buy a Testament. He lived a long way off, and never had seen a foreigner or heard a preacher of the gospel. A copy of Matthew's Gospel had come into his hands, and he wanted to know more of the doctrine. When he arrived at the station the missionary was not at home. The man waited, and in the meantime read the New Testament through nearly three times. When the missionary returned the visitor was ready for baptism.

Miss A. M. Jones of South China tells of the village of P'ik-t'aam whose entire population, 200 souls, asked to be received into the faith. They gave an ancestral hall for a chapel. Another village in the same district did the same things. As the missionary taught them the commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," they said that they had no gods, for they had burned the paper ones and drowned the stone ones that would not burn.

WHO CARES?

If Christ be a reality in your heart, if you really commune with him, if you have caught somewhat of the spirit that made your Master forsake the Father's house that he might come to earth to save men, then you will seek for men. You will not wait for the set seasons, when your pastor shall lead; but as you come to know men about you, you will be interested in their welfare, and will find a place for the simple, direct word for Christ. You are not hampered by the taint of professionalism, as sometimes your pastor is. Ofttimes when the preacher speaks out of the depth of his heart, men feel that this is his profession; "we expect him to say such things." Where the man is bigger than the preacher, he will not be seriously hampered by this; but it is a fact that many times the layman has a more direct approach to men than the pastor has.

Next to the fact that the Master cares, the fact that men care for your welfare is one of the most potent forces in constraining men to live as they should.

But the Master did noot hide his great heart of love in heaven; he came to earth to make sacrifices for men, to win men and to tell them of the Father's love. It is not enough that you care for the welfare of the men of your community. You need to make your interest practical and real, and go after men. Then will men see the yearning face of the Christ through the kindly interest of the disciple.—Alabama Christian Advocate.

A MOST IMPORTANT MEETING.

Health Officers of the State to Organize. Meeting June 19th-20th in Charlotte with State Medical Society.

Very probably the conference of the county and municipal health officers of the State, for the purpose of organizing a North Carolina Public Health Association, to be held in Charlotte during the meeting of the State Medical Society, June 19th-20th, will prove to be of more far-reaching importance than any other assemblage that will take place in the State during the year.

One must be blind to the future needs of public health, to the advantages of organization, to the axiomatic wisdom of multitudinous counsel, to the value of interchanges of experiences, to the importance of deciding upon and adopting uniform methods and standards, in short, to a truly progressive step, not to see in the proposed meeting great potentialities affecting the State's valuable asset—the public health. The Secretary of the State Board of Health is in correspondence with the various county and municipal boards of health and with the county and municipal health officers of the State, endeavoring to interest them sufficiently to secure a large attendance at the meetings.

It has been suggested to the various boards of health that the small fees and salaries attached to the public health service will preclude the attendance of many of the health officers, and it is earnestly hoped that county and municipal boards of health will see it to their advantage and will feel able to defray the expenses of their health officers to this meeting. This seems reasonable, because the benefits to be derived from such a meeting will be received by the public at large. The returns of such a small investment by the board of health will be manifold. Their health officer will return to his field of duty with a larger vision of the opportunities of the public health service, with new ideas to put into his work, and with a deeper determination to make his official life worth while.

The following instructive program has been arranged: The health officers will meet Monday evening, June 19th, at eight o'clock, to organize. After a paper by Dr. Richard H. Lewis, the former Secretary of the State Board of Health, on the Advantages of a North Carolina Health Officers' Association, and a paper by Dr. L. N. Glenn, County Superintendent of Health of Gaston County, submitting a Plan of Organization for a North Carolina Health Officers' Association, followed by a general discussion, committees will be appointed to report on the proposed plan of organization the following morning. Tuesday morning the health officers will meet at nine o'clock and hear the following papers: A Proper basis of Comepnsation for Public Health Service, Col. J. L. Ludlow, Winston-Salem; Quarantine, by Dr. O'H. Laughinghouse, Greenville, N. C.; The Advantages of Removing Quarantine from Smallpox, Dr. H. D. Stewart, Monroe; The Importance of a Uniform System of Disinfection for the State, Dr. Morrison H. King, Concord; The Quarantine of Diphtheria. Culture v. Time Limit, by Dr. Spencer P. Bass, Tarboro; The Handling of Nuisances, Dr. Geo, M. Cooper, Clinton; The Relation of Public Health Officers to the Tuberculosis Problem, Dr. H. W. Lewis, Jackson. These papers will be followed by a general discussion, in which each speaker will be limited to five minutes. At 12:30 p. m. Tuesday, June 20th, the report of the Committee on Organization will be heard, and the Constitution and by-laws will be adopted. After the election of officers the meeting will adjourn.

—Bro. W. C. Bain, of Greensboro, bears a striking resemblance to Mr. Carnegie, the multi-millionaire. Numbers have noticed it.

—Our Christian brethren dedicated a splendid house of worship at Revolution (near this city) last Sunday. Dr. J. O. Atkinson, editor of the Christian Sun, preaching the sermon. The house cost about $3,500. The membership is 72. The Sunday school has about 150. They have done well. Dr. Wicker, of Elon College, is the present pastor.

A BOTTLE OF TEARS.

The following story is vouched for by Rev. J. B. Culpepper of Georgia, who received it from a man in Virginia who said he knew the party and confirmed it in all of its features:

"Some years ago a noble young man of Virginia was happily married to one of the most beautiful young women of that grand old State. He possessed a beautiful mansion and a twenty-six mule farm. But a bar was near his home. The bar-keeper became his personal friend and in time induced him to drink and gamble. As the years rolled by his financial interest failed until his sole possessions were reduced to a home and a one mule farm. One night in the gambling saloon of the bar-room near by, he was brutally shot to death. After being buried by some negroes under an apple tree in his own garden his wife received the following note from the bar-keeper.

Dear Madam: "This will inform you that I hold a mortgage over your late husband's mule and farm, also the farm implements, also the household and kitchen furniture, also your household goods including trunks, wardrobe and wearing apparel. As I wish possession you will do me the kindness to vacate at once. I herewith send a man to take charge of the premises, the keys, etc., and represent me in all things."

Signed, ————————

The following is the answer to this note.

"Sir: You demand the keys. I send them herewith. The one with a red string unlocks my wardrobe. In the right side you will find my wedding dress. I never wore it but once. It is yours now, by action of my husband, whom I never disobeyed. In the folds of that dress, you will find a small phial, with a few tears in it, the last I had to shed, but they are historia. They stand for the birth of a little girl born under a happy roof—of fifteen joyous, girlhood, schoolday years, of a short, sweet courtship and marriage, to the bravest, best man I ever knew, but for whiskey, of the day we moved into this palatial and well-kept home, of the—alas! so short honey-moon spent here. You will find all of these sweet sacred pleasures in the bottle of tears. A change, sharp and sudden came. You may read it, sir, in the tears I bequeath you. They will tell you of the first time my husband crossed your villainous threshold; of the first time I detected liquor on his breath, and of how he put me gently aside with a shower of assuring kisses, saying that for my sake, he would never be brought under the baneful effect of strong drink; of how he became a constant tippler; of the first time his step was unsteady; of his rapid decline in home-keeping and home love; of the ease with which he would misunderstand me; of the first time he spoke a cross word to me; of the first oath in my presence. You will find it all in the bottle of tears, sir. You will find there, too, one rainy, wind-shaken, thunder-boomed, lightning-torched night, in which it looked as if the building would be demolished. It was that storm-shocked night that our first-born little Mary, came into this old whiskey-soaked world. You will also find in the bottle of tears, the greedgored part you played in my house that night—for while one physician attending me, in an adjoining room, stood over my poor drunken husband, who was the victim of imaginary serpents, gorillas and devils. In reality, he was only your victim. But you will find it, sir, in the bottle of tears. I saw in the lightning's glare the storm as it toyed with the shade trees, I heard the rain dashing in fury, against the windows; the room was jarred by angry thunder. But louder than thunder, to me, were the groans and screams and oaths of my erstwhile noble and manly, but now fallen and cowardly, husband.

You will find it all, sir, in the bottle of tears. I heard the low strange cry—the advent cry of the baby—a cry which ordinarily fills a mother with joy but which filled me with a new anguish, as I thought of such a fit beginning, to a career, destined to be one of piercing shame. I at first prayed that we all three might meet death in the storm, which now seemed to be urged forward by all the furies of Pandemonium. Then I asked that the little one might live and win papa back to the path of sobriety, from which, you, for gain, had led him.

The next morning, he came and stood uneasily upon his feet, looked from bloated eyes upon us, stooped and kissed me and baby, and vowed he would never drink again. I believed him. The peach came back to my cheek; a girlish lustre kindled in my eye; a wife's and mother's pride began to lay plans for life and home—but they were soon dashed and broken, for before I was up from that bed, he came home drunk again. My sun went out in sudden, irretrievable midnight; my heavens, if heavens they could be called, became starless, my heart petrified. But, sir, you will find it all, and much more, in the bottle of tears. I need not tell you of the next few sorrow-laden years, and the coming of the second girl; of the flight of luxury, of the desertion of friends; of the absence of visitors; of the curtailing of expenses and enforced economy, in order to meet your liquor claims; of the loss of my health; of other efforts to keep the wolf from the door; of the times I have fled, by night, with frightened children, from a rum-crazed husband and father; of a cheerless hearthstone; of a bare table, and the birth of the third child, in the midst of the squalor, to which only a drunkard's home is familiar; of my vain efforts to keep the children clothed and fed; of the deeper depths into which you pulled my, now helpless husband. One night there was such a pain in my heart that I cried out. It awoke Mary, who came to me and asked what the matter was. I told her that I was in so much pain, that I must be dying —that she would have to take mama's place and care for papa and little sisters —that papa was a hopeless drunkard, and that she would soon be the only bread winner. You will find in the bottle of tears, how we spent that night, Mary and I, in praying and planning; how little Mary took her seat, at dawn, in the doorway, and watched for her papa's return, how with the rising of the sun, he came staggering up the once flower-bordered, now weed-infested, road, how Mary ran down, threw her arms about her father and said—O my papa! Our mama came near to death last night. She said I would have to care for you and little sister, too. "O my sweet papa, you won't drink any more, will you?" With an oath, which might become a demon, he raised his strong arm, and slapped the child—a blow that sent her to the gravelled walk, and left her bleeding and weeping, while he came on to curse and beat me. But you can read it all, sir, in the bottle of tears, the only thing I had in my own name and right, to leave you, as a reminder of what these possessions have cost.

Only three mornings ago four of your obedient henchmen bore my precious husband home to me, at break of day, and laid him dead on the floor, and hurried back, I suppose, to the gambling table, over which your victim had just been shot. I found some friendly negroes to dig the grave—in what I thought was my garden. and we laid him down, under his favorite apple tree. I thought to put flowers there in the summer and shells in winter, and teach my girls of how noble he was before he fell into your clutches. But it seems I buried him in your garden, and under your apple tree! Indeed, he was laid on your floor. It is marked with your victim's blood. After some kind colored friends helped me to shroud him, and while sitting up with his precious remains that night, I tried to wash out the stains of blood, thinking I could not bear to look at it and walk over it. But it turns out that it is your floor, on which he who gave his vast property, his manhood, his family, his very soul, found a cooling board. You will find it all, sir, in the bottle of tears. You order me to vacate. I obey. When you read this I will be on my way, down the road east. I take that route, only because it leads me away from you and your den of destruction. I don't know where I, with my three girls, will spend the night. But one thing I promise you. Whatever there is in a widow's wail, or an orphan's cry, if there really be a God, we will meet you at his judgment bar—there to tell, and the truth to say, as to how you came by this home, which we now leave. You will find it all, sir, in the bottle of tears."

A CALL TO THE CHURCH.

God help the church to awaken and go to work. Mt. Sinai appeals to man's reason and says, God is just and will punish sin. Calvary appeals to his heart and says, God is merciful and will pardon transgression. All that could be done to arouse a lost world to a sense of danger has been done; and yet the world sleeps on, and knows not the power of the spiritual life. Satan is busy applying his drugs to all who will take them, as long as he can sooth the conscience of the poor, sleeping church member and quiet the guilty fears. For while the church sleeps the Devil creeps into the church and does his most effectual work as an angel of light.

And so often we fall asleep and dream of bright days that end in dreams. God has taken the Church as His co-worker in this great enterprise to awaken the lost, and how can a sleeping church member awaken a dead sinner. We may talk in our sleep, but we can't work in our sleep. The seasons of refreshing which we all so much need will come when the church awakens and the human instruments are brought into touch with the Spirit of God.

Our Lord seems to have confided His interest to the church, and not only does his glory depend on the fidelity of his people, but the salvation of the world also. There has never been a genuine awakening among men that did not come from the co-operation of a few who were brought in touch with the Spirit of God. May the God of love awaken the church to a sense of her duty and responsibility. Jesus said, Occupy till I come. If it had not been necessary to warn men of the danger of an endless hell to awaken them to a sense of the importance of fleeing the wrath to come, the Savior would not have said, And if thy hand offend thee, cut it off; and if thy foot offend thee, cut it off; and if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out; it is better far to enter into the Kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. It is not only necessary that the gospel should be preached in all its faithfulness, but personal application should be made of its teachings.

There is work here for all who personally enjoy spiritual life. When they had found the life they forgot self, in the fullness of their joy, and brought their friends to Jesus. Yet we have homes, father, husband, mother and wife, brother, sister, and friends, out of Christ, and never speak to them to try to awaken them, and tell them that death is out in the near future. Should we wonder at the unsaved question? It is this state of things that hangs like a pall of death over a sleeping world.

The Song of Solomon three and one:

By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth. I sought Him, but found Him not. A sleeping church seeking Christ.

A church vever will find Christ as long as it is sleeping. Christ is not pleased with a church asleep. The pastor needs the church to help him awaken poor lost sinners, and not spend all of his time calling out danger to he church members.

Yours in Christ,

D. R. Williams.

A LOCAL HISTORY.

If space in the M. P. Herald can be found, perhaps the following sketch might be put into "written history."

This section seems to be "favored" with some crooked "systems." Our R. F. D., instead of being started at King "in due time," was neglected, and then later on started from Tobaccoville. The post office is in Forsythe County, but nearly all the route lies in Stokes. The route is about 20 miles long, and is, perhaps, the crookedest rural route in the world. However, the service is good, and there is no complaint on any part. Since I admire the "romantic" in its place, I "most wish" that our mail route had been called "Crooked Run."

Perhaps the carrier is right often reminded of the "romantic," too, since he crosses the stream at a very rugged, rocky, "romantic" place amongst the hills—and the stream named by shape Crooked Run. The ford is in deep water, shaped by the wide rock in the stream—and is such that whenever the creek gets up a little it can't be forded.

Eighty years ago when my grandfather, John Godfried Grabs, left Bethania and settled here on this stream, he bought a tract of land that was encompassed by a very crooked line—as was the case with several other tracts adjoining.

The case, or cause, was that an aged man by the name of Curry, having to travel on his slide, marked out his dividing lines, and crooked as the slide went he scored the trees. He secured his hundreds of acres of land by entry, and later divided it up amongst his children. Why he should have traveled so strangely, on his slide, and thus made his lines so crooked, is a question. Perhaps it was a freak of human, "romantic"—and perhaps he thought that the lines of his lands might run in keeping with the stream—because he had located on rather the crookedest stream in the country.

One of the main branches to this crooked stream starts from the town of King. The stream, by the roadway, is about seven miles long. We might be reminded that Crooked Run Church got the name from the crooked stream. However, we are glad of the church, and the name seems to be very appropriate—since the church is located on or near the stream that was so very crooked eighty years ago, and since the people in this section live on lands that are deeded with some of the most romantic crooked lines; and because our daily mail is brought to our doors by the travel of one of the crookedest rural routes.

Our "famous" Crooked Run stream empties its waters into the grand stream called the Little Yadkin.

By tradition we have some of the particulars about how very crooked our "Crooked Run" was eighty years ago. At one place it crooked about to the extent of a half mile through a bottom not more than three hundred yards long. This sketch, however, gives but a slight glance at the crooked stream.

The following incident is rather what I thought of when I started to write this article. About eighty years ago, or near those days, a man by the name of Robertson had occasion to build a mill, with a strong new dam, as will be noticed later on, on the Little Yadkin stream, three or four miles southwest from our Crooked Run Church—or from where it is now. One Saturday eve, about the time the mill and dam were completed, Mr. Robertson and hands were in the act of starting away, and one suggested that they leave certain harness, a new set, in the new mill, but one of the company suggested that "the mill might wash away." At once Mr. Robertson spoke by affirming(?) that "God Almighty can't move that mill." They at once went to their homes, while leaving the fine structure secure(?) Next morning the mill and dam, new harness and all, were all clean gone—but all done without any rain near.

The location was in Forsyth Co., a few hundred yards south of the Stokes line. Later it was learned that a mighty rain fell that night up in the mountains of Stokes County, some ten or fifteen miles from the place of that new mill.

By the instructions of my father I wrote out something of the above account near twenty years ago. I have forgotten about the disposal of the writing, wish that I had it. However, if something of it has gone out I hope that this too may find place in the "written history."

Friends at a distance, in the west may be glad to hear, and their request now is that friends near will please bear and forbear. Our churches are on higher ground than was that new mill.

We who live near this Crooked Run Church are still needing rain, as is the case wider out, and we need help; as while we think we so much need the refreshing rain, we need more of the spiritual refreshing. The urgent request is still extended for an interest in the prayers of those who have sympathy and have their hearts tied to the commonwealth.

W. F. Grabs.

P. S. Sunday, the 18th, we had a fine rain, and signs up for more. I hastily send in this post script, hoping that it may serve in the way of returning thanks and acknowledging the over-ruling power of God, and His kind providence.

June 19th. W. F. G.

THE MASTER'S TOUCH.

He touched her hand and the fever left her,
He touched her hand as he only can;
With the wondrous skill of the Great Physician,
With the tender touch of the Son of Man.
And the fever pain in the throbbing temples
Died out with the flush on the brow and cheek;
And the lips that had been so parched and burning,
Trembled with thanks that she could not speak.
And the eyes where the fever light had faded,
Looked up by her grateful tears made dim;
And she rose and ministered to her household,
She rose and ministered unto Him.

He touched her hand and the fever left her,
Oh, blessed touch of the "Man Divine:"
So beautiful then to arise and serve Him,
When the fever is gone from your life and mine.
It may be the fever of restless serving,
With heart all thirsty for joy and praise;
And eyes all aching and strained with yearning,
Toward self-set goals in the future days.

Or it may be the fever of spirit anguish,
Some tempest of sorrow that dies not down;
Till the cross at last is in meekness lifted,
And the head stoops low for the thorny crown.
Whatever the fever this touch can heal it,
Whatever the tempest His voice can still;
There is only joy as we seek His pleasure,
There is only rest as we seek His will.
Ah, Lord, Thou knowest us altogether,
Each heart's sore sickness, whatever it be;
Touch Thou our hearts, let the fever leave us,
And so shall we minister unto Thee.

PRIZING THE CROSS.

If thou impatient do let slip thy cross,
Thou wilt not find it in this world again;
Nor in another: here and here alone
Is given thee to suffer for God's sake.
In other worlds we may more perfectly
Love Him and serve Him, praise Him,
Grow nearer and nearer to Him with delight.
But then we shall not any more
Be called to suffer, which is our appointment here.
Cans't thou not suffer, then, one hour or two?
If He should call thee from thy cross to-day,
Saying: "It is finished that hard cross of thine
From which thou prayest for deliverance."
Thinkest thon not some passion of regret
Would overcome thee? Thou wouldst say,
"So soon? Let me go back and suffer yet awhile
More patiently. I have not yet praised God."
Whensoe'er it comes, that summons that we look for,
It will seem soon, too soon. Let us take heed in time
That God may now be glorified in us.

—From Ugo Bassi's Sermon.

Presenting the case against the cigarette, The Standard says the evil not only reacts upon the smoker himself but draws heavily upon the life blood of the nation. It cites two recent disasters as glaring results of cigarette smoking. One was the Washington Place fire in New York City, in which 143 persons lost their lives; it was caused by the careless dropping of cigarette stubs in a pile of rubbish. The other was a conflagration in Bangor, Me., on April 30th. A spark from a cigarette, thrown on a pile of hay during a high wind, was quickly fanned into a great fire which destroyed one-third of the city before it was checked. Two lives and the destruction of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth of property were the price paid for that "coffin-nail."—Biblical Recorder.

"Preachers are in demand—we mean preachers who know the Lord and are devoting time and strength to His work—no other kind can be useful in any marked degree."

HOW LIFE CAN BE TRANSFIGURED.

Life is strong and peaceful if whatsoever we do is done unto God. Life connected with God is sublimely beautiful and inspiring. Human applause or dissent should die away before one's feet. It is a splendid thing to detach oneself from all bondage to men, submitting himself constantly to God. The life of a Christian would be transfigured in proporion as the apostolic injunction is heeded, living not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart unto Christ; this brings life into living touch with the great fountain of all life. A man-pleasing life is servitude and brings corroding care and chafing anxiety. Living in constant fellowship with God and committing one's work unto him, brings an abounding and abiding peace, and a precious assurance that the life "flows on in endless song." Such a life is transfigured, and in its influence will be a benediction to all whom it touches. Paul declared: "For me to live is Christ." That was his purpose and goal. It transfigured his life.

Human life has a Godward and a manward relation. When its deep under-current flows Godward, it lends dignity to all other rlations, and it becomes sublime; even in its lowliest phases, service will not be menial or commonplace or desecrating. All phases of life are under the transfiguring power of grace and the illuminating influences of the Holy Spirit. All is on God's altar and is sacred unto the Lord, so that the whole life is sacramental. This thought and experience give to the most ordinary life divine honor and permanet rest and delight, as well as permanent value. Every service becomes royal, and every deed noble, and every influence inspirational.—Selected.

THE BISHOPS TO TRY CONTINUUS SUPERVISION.

There will be widespread satisfaction throughout the connection when the recent action of the Board of Bishops relative to episcopal supervision becomes generally known. Our chief pastors have just adjourned after holding their semi-annual meeting at Winona, Minn., and, while many important matters have come before them as the leaders of a great denomination, there was none fraught with the significance that attached to the discussion of episcopal supervision. And the conclusions that were reached are of the utmost importance.

We are violating no confidence when we state that the whole question of episcopal supervision was gone over at length. The recent discussion in the church, the unrest that is being felt among the laymen, as well as among many of our thinking and active ministers—all of this was matter for long and serious consideration. The church is to be congratulated upon the fact that it has for its episcopal leaders so many men who are willing to listen to the voice of the people and give to it due heed.

Zion's Herald heartily congratulates the Bishops upon the action that was taken. After going over the situation with the utmost care, the assignment of Bishops to preside at the Fall Conferences was made in response to the expressed desire of the church for close personal and contiguous supervision so far as it seemed possible under the present system. In looking over the list it will be seen that some of the Bishops have been returned to Conferences to preside for the third time this quadrennium, and in several instances for the second time. Moreover, the assignments were also made with due regard to the residences of the Bishops, so as to give them charge of the Conferences, in so far as possible, in the territory contiguous thereto, thus helping to develop local leadership, or at least giving opportunity for this to a greater degree than is the case when Bishops are given Conferences hundreds or thousands of miles away from their residences. Of course, with the present system still in operation, it was impossible to make both the continuous and contiguous supervision work perfectly at this time. It is gratifying, however, to know that our Bishops have done so splendidly in their attempt to meet the wishes of the church at large.

That this is the very earnest and emphatic wish of the church is not to be gainsaid. It was this that was the burden of the whole discussion on the matter of episcopal supervision at the last General Conference. It is this that is back of the resolutions adopted by Lay Conferences and Annual Conferences. It is this that has prompted the agitation that has taken place during the past few months. And because of all this Zion's Herald is glad to congratulate the Bishops on their action. For in all the discussion in which we have entered on this matter, this has been our only purpose—to interpret and express the mind of the church at large. Our criticism has fallen upon the system under which the Bishops have been working, because convinced, along with a vast majority of the church, that it is entirely inadequate to meet the demands of the present age and needs.

In the course of the debate that took place concerning the matter of episcopal supervision, a most important plan was presented by Bishop Cranston, which was discussed at length, and which will doubtless go before the church in some very definite form. With his usual statesmanlike foresight and his keen and sympathetic interpretation of the wishes of the people, he had thought long and seriously over the situation, and the result was a plan which can be put into operation by the Bishops themselves, and that without any constitutional amendments. The church will rejoice at the announcement of this fact, for it means that our Bishops are to be the leaders in the readjustment that is being demanded by the needs of the present age.

There is onemore year in this quadrennium. That the wishes of the General Conference of 1908 had been unjustly ignored to a very large extent, has been the feeling of the rank and file of the thinking men and women of our church. Of course it has been announced that it was very difficult to bring about continuous and contiguous supervision without great changes in the dates that are usually assigned for the holding of Conferences. Aii of which is true. But it is equally true that many have felt, justly or unjustly, that there was a disposition to iguore the whole matter and go along in the same old way. And many have not been pleased at this attitude. It will cause hearty gratification to know that the Bishops are now determined to give the system a trial even if it be late in the day.

It may be, of course, that our Bishops have not fully realized how serious the church is in this matter. It is not an agitation confined to a few, but rather has it become a world-wide situation, growing out of the urgent needs of the work. Conditions are such that a close and personal leadership is absolutely necessary. That we have grown under the old system is no argument in the tace of the situation as it is today. The church is demanding that its Bishops shall be able to give their time and energy between the holding of Conferences to the work contiguous to their episcopal residences, leading, directing, inspiring, counseling, helping, lifting—doing the real work of Bishops in the church of God, in such a way that it will tell in the spread of the kingdom and the extension of Methodism.

While it was impossible, doubtless, for the Bishops at this time to do as much to meet the demands that are being made as they would desire, we are glad that they have found it possible to make the assignments as they have done. We believe it will result in the increasing advancement of the work. The Bishops who return to their Conferences for the second and third time will know the men and the churches as they did not and could not the first time, and better work will be done by all; while those who are to be given the privilege of looking after the Conferences near to their homes will be able to do so with better success and with greater ease than they could otherwise.

We therefore heartily rejoice with Methodism in this important action on the part of the Bishops.—Zion's Herald, M. E. Church.

PEACE, IF POSSIBLE.

Christ pronounced a blessing on peacemakers and Paul exhorted the Christians of Rome to live peaceably with all men, if possible. If there are men with whom you cannot live peaceably, it becomes a question whether you ought to live with them at all. But it takes two to make a quarrel, and most of the strife among men would be prevented if one of the two parties were duly cautious; all of it would be prevented if both were on their guard.

It is painful to hear of discord in a church, a community, or a family. It indicates a wrong moral disposition somewhere. All parties may not be blameworthy in all cases, but we believe it is commonly the case that there is fault on both sides.

It is amazing what small things will destroy the peace of families sometimes. Two brothers who should be more to each other than any amount of money will fall out about a little piece of property left them by their dead father, and never be brothers in spirit again.

Churches are sometimes split up over very small questions. It is painful and shameful in most instances. Yet there are times when duty demands that one take a position which will not be pleasing to others, which will indeed call forth the condemnation of others. There is a spirit in the world that will always antagonize the cause of righteousness, and with that spirit there should be no compromise. But there is a great difference between standing for a principle and going against the brethren. Quarrels over questions of expediency are out of order. More is lost when harmony is lost than is gained by the triumph of the wiser plan, in most cases.

NOTES.

—Rev. W. D. Fogleman was here on Tuesday, still active in behalf of the new church at Pleasant Union.

—It is rather an uncommon gang of crooks that Brother Grabbs tells about this week.

—Flavius O. Plunkett is among the new doctors recognized by the State Board of Examiners at Charlotte.

—Now it is the powder trust that is to be dissolved. The U. S. Circuit Court of Delaware says so.

—Mrs. B. E. Sergeant, one of Greensboro's oldest ladies, died last Monday, aged 84 years.

—We were glad to have Dr. Fox and wife, of Guilford College, in the congregation at Grace Church on Sunday morning.

—Bro. D. H. Hunter seems to be recovering rapidly at St. Leo's Hospital. He is naturally of strong constitution. The chloroform did not even nauseate him.

—Bro. Suits has received seventeen members into the Thomasvile Church since the last of April. This Church moves forward. Some churches move backward.

—Mr. Fain, the new editor of the Greensboro Telegram, spoke at a children's day service at Centre Meeting House, on "The Importance of Bringing All the Children into the Sunday School."

—An ugly crime was committed near Brown Summit, for which Caleb Hanes is to be tried tomorrow. He is charged with assaulting a young woman to whom he was engaged to be married.

—Mr. James Swain, linotype operator in this office for the past year, has gone home for the summer, his place being taken by the editor's son Warren, who is home from college. We expect James back in the fall.

—Mr. Mickey, of Pinnacle, called in our office on his way from Westminster, Md., where he has been a college student for two years. He expects to return in the fall. He works out part of his expense, which argues well for him.

—In the collapse of a house occupied by 25 convicts, working near Waynesville on the Transcontinental Railroad, four of the convicts were killed and three others were seriously injured. Every man was injured to some extent. The guards were caught also.

—Rev. Homer Casto has gone to Asheville in the interest of his health. He spent some time there before and was benefited. We hope he will be helped this time also. He is so useful a worker that we do not like to think of his being kept away long.

—President and Mrs. Taft celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding with a great reception, attended by five thousand people. Messages of congratulation were received from the German Emperor, the President of France, the Emperor of Japan, the Kings of Italy, Spain, Denmark, Sweden and other nations.

—The revival services that have been conducted in the Methodist Protestant church for the past ten days by Rev. Mr. Bethea have awakened unusual interest. Each service has been well attended. There have been twenty-five or thirty conversions, and a number of reclamations. The church has been much strengthened, and the community benefited.—Mebane Leader.

—Richard Brooks, Jr., the bright little son of Bro. R. H. Brooks, after an interesting life of two or three years, died this morning at three o'clock, and is to be buried this afternoon at 5 o'clock. He had been sick for a week or more, and he was repeatedly prayed for in Grace prayer-meeting last night, but the Lord saw best to take him. This is a very great affliction to his fond parents, but they have the sympathy of many friends in their loss, and the divine grace can sustain them even in this. Surely God thinks most of the life beyond, while we short-sighted mortals are disposed to think too fondly of life here. But how uncertain this life is! How fast we pass on to that!

What is called "the most dangerous animal on earth" is—what do you suppose? Why, simply the common house-fly which has followed mankind since the dawn of history and lives only where man has made his home. It is said that the people of this country spend over $10,000,000 annually for screens to protect themselves against flies and mosquitoes. The fly causes thousands of deaths every year. The fly is a plague today as truly as it was in Egypt when "the land was corrupted by reason of the swarm of flies." Remember that, as our health officers are saying, the fly is born in, lives and thrives upon filth. Renew the war on "the most dangerous animal."—Biblical Recorder.

OUR BIBLE SCHOOL.
Lesson for Next Week.

—Rev. George H. Miller, who was unanimously re-elected pastor of the Methodist Protestant Church at the recent annual election, formally accepted, subject to the will of the annual conference, last night at the Wednesday evening services, and, if confirmed, will enter upon his twelfth year as pastor of the church next September. Rev. Miller has been re-elected year by year by ballot without a dissenting vote in his congregation. This is a remarkable record, and shows the sincere love of his people.—Steubenville Herald Star.

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

Mebane Charge.

Revival services began in Mebane on the first Sunday in June. Rev. N. G. Bethea came on Monday and did all the preaching for ten days. His preaching was of a high order, and judging from the large congregations who heard him from time to time, we would say greatly appreciated. The services resulted in forty-three conversions and reclamations, besides the church was wonderfully awakened. We have heard many who are not in any way connected with our church say, "It was the best meeting ever held in the town of Mebane."

This great meeting can not be altogether due to the efforts put forth within the last six months. But as pastor I feel that much of it is due to the preaching of Holmes, Andrews, and Fogleman.

The church here is composed of faithful men and women, who are always ready to stand by the pastor and church to the very best of their ability. It being the daughter of Hebron, the other church on the charge, we can not expect anything else but loyalty and faithfulness.

The people as well as pastor are very much encouraged, and we feel sure that a good report will go up to the Annual Conference from this charge.

June 11th there were 64 present at S. S., and the following Sunday 55. Our S. S. is very encouraging. Our Children's Day is to be the second Sunday night in July. Bro. Bethea has been assisting Bro. Edwards in a special meeting, with much success. Picnic season will soon be here, which is an enjoyable time of the year.

Bro. Hulin preached for us, giving us a good sermon. I was glad to see as many as were present, but would be glad to see more. Quarterly meeting will be held at this place on Saturday before the third Sunday in August. We feel encouraged. Our preacher gave us such a good sermon today. We only have one a month. I wish Bro. Hulin could preach oftener. May we get on a higher plane of Christianity,and may we get more interested in the work, and I say, Lord, forgive us for being so careless and unconcerned about church work. Living right is the most needful.

It seems to me our S. S. is not what it could be if the older people and young would come and take part. Most all do take some interest. There are but a faithful few that come. We have 50 on roll. We were glad to have Bro. Hulin to open our S. S. last Sunday, and take part in the lesson. We have four classes, one Bible Class.

Mt. Zion.

Brother Hunter filled his regular appointment here yesterday. He gave us a helpful and inspiring sermon. To say the sermon was good does not half express it. He will preach for us again the first Sunday night.

Our Sunday school is moving along nicely. It seems that our people are becoming more interested in the Sunday school than they have been. Let us all strive to do something for the cause. Remember every Sunday school member has certainly a responsibility, that is, being present. Pray for us that we may make this the best year of our lives.

Reporter.

Mt. Pleasant, Guilford Circuit.

Dear Bro. McCulloch:—

As I don't see much in your valuable paper from our church (as our reporter does not write much) I thought it would not be any offense to try to give a few items of news from our part of the Moral Vineyard. I want to say, first, that we are all pleased with Bro. Plyler; he is a strong preacher, a good pastor to mingle among his people. We all enjoy having him and his estimable wife in our homes.

Our Sunday school at Mt. Pleasant is doing fairly well, though it is not what it ought to be. It seems that so many of the older people expect too much of the children and are not willing to go themselves, but send their children.

O how we yearn for the power of the Holy Ghost to come down on the heads of some of the families and arouse them to a sense of duty, that they would come out and help us, as we so much need them. I want to say lest I am misunderstood that we have some godly consecrated men and women that do go and do all in their power to hold up our hands and help carry on the work of the blessed Master.

Our dear little granddaughter, Helen Louise Payne, aged 14 months, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Payne, died June 5th, and was laid to rest in the cemetery at Mt. Pleasant June 6th. She was a precious flower plucked from us, but we trust that the Master had need of her, and that she is now with Him who said: Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

Mr. J. Wesley Craven, near Mt. Pleasant, at a ripe old age, passed away last Monday morning after two weeks' suffering. Funeral was held from the residence by his pastor, Rev. C. A. Davis, of the Primitive Baptist Church. Mr. Craven was of a quiet, unassuming disposition always ready to do an act of kindness for his neighbors, and the large crowd that assembled to pay their last tribute of respect attested in a large measure the esteem in which he was held in his community.

We will hold Children's Day services at Mt. Pleasant on the fourth Sunday in July in the afternoon, as Bro. Plyler will fill his appointment in the morning of the fourth Sunday.

Bethany, Haw River Circuit.

Dear Bro. McCulloch:—

Will you please allow me a little space in your paper this week? I take the Herald and like to read the letters from the other churches on the Circuit, and see what they are doing, and I have not seen a thing that Bethany is doing.

Bro. Raper comes around once a month, and gives us some good food for the people to carry home with them, and we should as church members apply this food to our every day life in such a way as to become a brighter Christian each day, and let us live such a life that will be helpful to our fellow man and will be pleasing in the sight of God.

Bethany is having a nice Sunday school at the present time. Our membership is increasing each Sunday. We organized with 32; we had on June 18th 54 present.

We are now getting some literature for a Children's day and expect to have a Children's day as soon as we can arrange for it.

I would like to say that the year 1911 is passing by and what have we done? Paid our assessments for the different interests of our church and paid our pastor's salary which is due him at this time? If not, let us see that this is done at once, for Bro. Raper has a family to support and a horse to feed and of course he would like to keep those bills all paid as he goes, for we can certainly buy cheaper with the cash. Let us do our part, so far as we can, and I am sure we will feel good over it at the end. Fourth Sunday at 2 P. M. is S. S. and preaching at 3 o'clock. Let us give our pastor a large congregation, and I am sure he will not turn us away empty.

Our second quarterly conference convened at Mt. Zion on June 3, with all the churches represented but two. The business transacted in harmony. Bros. Harris, Hill, and William Thayes are the nominees for delegate to the Annual Conference. There are five live S. S. on this work, but am sorry to say that there are two churches that have no S. S. at all. I trust that God may roll the burden of the great need of a S. S. on this community till they may not rest until they start one and go to work for the souls of the children.

The congregations at all the appointments are good, and we feel that there are some as faithful Christians on this work as anywhere, and we are looking for a good year. But there is not as perfect a union in some of the churches as there will have to be before the Lord can give us the blessing He has in store for us.

I earnestly ask that you pray that the Spirit of Christ may drive back the powers of darkness all over this work, that our dear Lord may give me souls for my hire, though I may suffer financially. This is my first year in the work, and, dear reader, dont' forget to pray that my labor may not be in vain. The prayer of the righteous availeth much.

I am yours for Christ,
Joel Trogdon.

We didn't have a very large attendance yesteray. Our superintendent was absent, but our assistant was present, Mr. Phifer. Our secretary, Mr. Jno. Robinson, was absent also. We havent' decided when Children's Day will be yet, but I was asked to send for the literature for the Children's day exercises. Will you please kindly send it to us as early as possible, for which we will be very thankful.

Wishing the Herald every success,
I am your friend,

Brother Taylor filled his regular appointment here Sunday; he preached a good uplifting sermon to a large congregation. Bro. Taylor announced that he wanted to have an old folks' meeting the second Sunday in July; hope there will be a large crowd out. Sorry our president could not be with us. Glad to say that some of the sick ones are able to be out at church again; hope it will soon be so all can be with us in Sunday school again.

Mr. Jemmie Hawkins departed his life here last Sunday morning about nine o'clock, the 4th of June. He was near seventy years old. His sickness was short. He had the pneumonia and heart trouble; he bore his suffering patiently. He was one of our good strict members at Hawkins' Chapel as long as his health would permit. He lost his eye-sight and couldn't see to get about very much. Some of the family had to see after him most of the time. It was sad and hard for them to give him up. He had been a member of the church thirty or forty years.

Burlington.

Last Sunday we had 213 at Sunday school. New officers were elected for the ensuing term as follows: Supt., J. G. Rogers; Asst. Supt., G. L. Amick; Sec., C. B. Way; Asst. Sec., Miss Dallie McPherson; Organist, Mr. Walter Thomas; Asst. Organist, Miss Flossie Loy; Librarian, Miss Agnes Heritage; Asst. Librarian, Miss Evie Lamb. We feel sure that these officers with the new teachers who are to be elected next Sunday will see some good work done under their leadership during the next six months.

Our special meeting began with the Sunday morning service and is progressing nicely. Rev. T. M. Johnson, of Asheboro, is assisting Bro. Williams, and is preaching some excellent sermons. There have, as yet, been no conversions. The first two nights we were practically rained out.

The Baraca Class is making preparations for Baraca Rally Day in July. The class is expecting a large attendance on this day, and it is hoped to have at least 300 in S. S. that day.

Next week, there will be nothing from this reporter. We believe our pastor, Bro. Williams, has not reported this year, and we want to give him a chance, so have set aside next week for a long report from him. Reporter.

Our pastor, Rev. T. A. Wliilams, filled his regular appointment here June 18, at 3 o'clock, and preached an interesting sermon to a large and attentive congregation, from St. Luke 13:6, 7. To say the sermon was good does not nearly express it, for if the people will only do as he says, there will be many souls brought to Christ before the present year ends. The more we see of our pastor the more we realize his worth and our good fortune in having him with us. On account of sickness Mrs. Williams could not be with us Sunday.

Our prayer meeting is still alive and enjoyed by all who attend.

Third Sunday in May the Lord's Supper was commemorated and we were glad to see so many commune.

Our Children's Day service will be held Sunday night, June 25. There will also be a lawn party Saturday night, June 24, the profits for the purpose of painting the interior of the church.

Pray for us a better S. S. at Tabernacle.

—Our memorial services at Mt. Moriah on Saturday before the second Sunday in May were attended by a large crowd. Bro. Self was with us and gave us a good sermon in the morning. In the evening we held memorial services. Bro. Self also preached twice on Sunday. The people were glad to hear him at his old home church. W. D. R.

Our Sunday school is growing and moving along nicely. The attendance is not what it might be. The average attendance is from sixty to seventy on a roll of one hundred.

We held our Children's day service the first Sunday in June. The children did well. We had a good turn-out; collection a little over twenty-three dollars. There were two premiums offered for the ones that collected the most missionary money. Miss Bessie Mason won first prize, having collected $8.48. She has been a student for the last two sessions at Denton school. Homer Furr won second premium

Obituary.

Solomon Herbert Moser was born Dec. 13, 1882, and died April 28, 1911. He professed faith in Christ at the age of 13 and joined the M. P. Church at Shoals where he was a member at his death. He was afflicted about 11 years, and was confined to his bed 7 years and 8 months. During this time he was a great sufferer all the while and most of the time it seemed that it was more than anyone could endure, yet he bore it all with patience, and submission, never seeming to grow angry because of his afflictions, but bore it all as if he thought it was best; and we trust that there has been much good accomplished by his life of patient suffering, teaching us a lesson that one possessing enough of the grace of God can endure all things, and also cause those who have often visited and conversed with him to live nearer to the Master and feel more grateful than ever before, for the many blessings they enjoy. And while he will be missed in his home more than tongue can express, or pen describe, we all should feel glad to think he is now sweetly resting where there is no more sickness, sorrow, and suffering, but all is joy and happiness. It is said by those who were with him all the time that he often spoke of his church and never forgot to pray for his people, his neighbors and his friends, which were many. Those who knew him best learned to love him most, and no doubt will be greatly missed by all, but who should not grieve for him as those that have no hope. He told his people just before he died that he was going home and asked them not to grieve for him.

Burial services conducted by the writer assisted by Rev. S. W. Hall, at the home of his parents, after which his remains were interred in Shoals cemetery.

The bereaved family have our heartfelt sympathy and especially the afflicted brother who seems to be diseased very much like the other and is now almost entirely helpless. May heaven's richest blessings rest upon them. A. L. Hunter.

In Memory of Helen Payne.

The death angel called at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Payne and claimed for its victim Helen Louise Payne. Helen died June 5, 1911, aged 1 year, 2 months and 2 days.

Gone to the grave where the flowers may bloom;
Sweetly she sleeps in her silent tomb,
And angels their low vigils keep
Over the place where
Helen doth peacefully sleep.
Gone from our side to rest 'neath the sod,
Her spirit to rest with the angels of God;
Ah! yes, she has crossed the mystic tide,
Rejoicing and safe on the other side.

May we all live such lives as to meet dear little Helen when we are called.

MANNA IN THE DESERT.

The most undesirable and unattractive work will develop charm if one puts his whole heart into it and endeavors to do it better than it has been done before. The most commonplace lives have about them possibilities of romance, tragedy and humor that discover themselves to the one who ministers to these lives with a brave and resolute heart. Browning's masterpiece, one of the very greatest poems that was ever written, "The Ring and the Book," sprang out of the manuscript report of a law case found in an old curiosity shop in Florence and purchased for eightpence. To most people that old document would be worth no more than its value as waste paper and of as little interest as the dead leaves that the wind scatters over the fields. So in the midst of the most unpromising conditions, if one puts his whole soul into his work and looks for its values he may find it invested with a beauty and a delight that were quite unsuspected. There the Christian worker will find the companionship of him who loved the common things of life and may see the visions of grace and glory that those of stir and frame never note.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

EVERYDAY RELIGION.

That religion which isn't good for every day isn't much good for any day. If it doesn't stay with a man on Monday, it was only a cloak and a mockery on Sunday. If it doesn't show itself in the home, breathing upon everyone therein a kindly and helpful and strengthening influence, then it will make a fine show in the house of God to very little purpose indeed. If religion doesn't grip a man's soul, if it isn't the one thing in his whole life, Sunday and Saturday, day and night, then it becomes so near to being nothing that it is scarcely worth reckoning at all. When we speak of everyday religion, we speak of the only genuine kind of religion there is. And it is its homely, everyday quality that will commend it to the world and will in the end win for it the allegiance of the world. Religion is for every day. Its blessings and benefits, its comforts and sweet consolations, its guidance and its inspiration are for the commonplace days in the commonplace lives of commonplace men and women. It is something to take with one, something that will never be out of place anywhere, something that will add to life's joy its best touch of sweetness and will mix with all life's sorrows, hope and courage and power. A man who has everyday religion in good wholesome quantity can easily afford to be without a good many other things.—Christian Guardian.

THE PRAYING ENGINEER.

One winter, several years ago, there was a good deal of religious interest in a certain western town, and among those who joined the church was Allie Forsyth, a little fellow twelve years of age. His mother was a widow and had removed, four years before, from their home in Vermont to this town in Wisconsin.

On the evening of the Sabbath when he joined the church, Allie was sitting in the twilight with his mother, and she said to him:

"Allie, tell me what led you to want to be a Christian? Was it your home teaching, your lesson in the Sabbath school, the regular preaching of the pastor, or has it all come through the influence of the revival meetings?"

Looking up at his mother's face he replied: "Mamma, it was none of these. But do you remember when we were coming from St. Albans to live here, that I wanted to go on the engine and ride with the engineer? You were afraid to let me till the conductor, whom you know, told you that the engineer was a remarkable man, and that it would be just as safe on the engine with him as in the parlor car with you?"

His mother assured him that she remembered the circumstances very well.

"Then," continued Allie, "you allowed me to ride on the engine where I was to stay till you or the conductor came for me. When about ready to start from the station where I first got on the engine, the engineer knelt down for just a little bit, and then got up and started his locomotive. I asked him many questions about its different parts, and about places and things which we passed by, and he was very patient in answering. Soon we stopped at another station, and he knelt down again just a moment before we started. As he did this often, I tried to see what he was doing; and finally after we had passed a good many stations, I made up my mind to ask him. He looked at me very earnestly, and said:

" 'My little lad, do you ever pray?'

"I replied, Oh, yes, sir! I pray every morning and evening.'

" 'Well, my dear boy,' said he, 'when I kneel down I pray. God has allowed me to hold a very responsible place here. There are, perhaps, two hundred lives on this train entrusted to my care. A little mistake on my part, a little failure to do all my duty, a little neglect, a little inattention to signals, might send all, or many, of those two hundred souls into eternity. So at every station I kneel for just a short while and ask the Master to help me, and to keep from all harm till we get to the next station, the many lives he has put in my hands. All the years I have been on this engine he has helped me, and not a single human being of the thousands that have ridden on my train has been harmed. I never had an accident.'

"I have never before mentioned what I did or said, but almost daily I have thought about him, and resolved that I would be a Christian, too."

For four years the life and words of that praying engineer had been constantly present with this lad and became at length the means of leading him into a Christian life.—Michigan Christian Advocate.

A PICTURE OF JESUS.

If I were painting a picture of Jesus I would not paint Him as a king with a crown of gold and a garment of purple and a retinue and life-guard. I wouldn't do that. That does not appeal to me. Christ appeals to me when His arms are bare and browned with the sun; when His head is naked, open to light; when His tunic buttons at the shoulder; when His feet are touched with the burning soil, and in His right hand a shepherd's crook and on his left shoulder one lost sheep. When Christ comes so, He touches every fiber in my personality that hath music in it. I answer to him as the pipe answers to the wind. There He stands, bronzed, magnificent in might, crowned with love, sweet with comfort, infinite with tenderness. Then that Christ makes my heart ache, and if He wanted to He could with a lift of his hand and a look of His eye make my heart break.

And I would have Him wear that shepherd's crook for a scepter. When a man is at work, that is a sign a man is kingly. When his hands are dirty with the soil and his face is sweaty with the sunlight and the toil, then the man stands up regal. And what I would have you consider is that this Christ shepherd, this man with help in his left arm, this man with help in his brawny right hand, this man with the springtime wonder of life in His eyes, this man with summer wild smells at His heart, this man hath regality. He is what a man ought to be. He does what a man ought to do. And when we find Christ so vestured and so seen and so engaged, then a Hercules at his task, we know him not; an Atlas holding up his sky we do not see. This man that comes to put His arm through the shield of the world and carry the earth into heaven, that is the man that ravises our souls and lifts us to highest praise. And beside Him they who thought themselves great have found they are very little. "The Beautiful Shepherd." And on the Bethlehem hills and out over the rocks and down in all the dungeons of the deep billows of yellow canyons and out on Galilee's shore and across the green earth, this Christ, the Beautiful Shepherd, is coming to help the world. Oh, beloved, beloved, I want you to look at Him. Is He not the Beautiful Shepherd?—Quayle, in Deaconess Advocate.

WOULD EXTERMINATE THE CHURCH.

"There should not be any compromise with fanatical prohibition. Every American citizen should rise up to exterminate the un-American institution, because church rule is at the bottom of it."

So says a liquor paper published in Texas and so says the liquor traffic and those who advocate it. An uplifting sentiment, isn't it? Opposition to the saloon should be crushed because the church is at the bottom of it? This implies, of course, that the church should be eliminated. It follows that if the church is wiped out the religion of Jesus Christ is to be swept away. Imagine this country without churches and without Christianity! What kind of a country and a government would we have? What kind of a citizenship? What would be our standard? Who would want to live here? What would we be doing?

And yet the organs of the liquor business advocate such a change because the church is opposed to the saloon. The liquor gang would trample the most sacred institution under foot because it interferes with the license of the liquor men in their efforts to debauch and brutalize humanity.

The saloon cares nothing for humanity so long as it can wring money from men. It will ruin lives, wreck homes, break hearts, and damn immortal souls for the sake of the almighty dollar, and when the church objects it cries, "down with the church!"

But the church wil not down. Like a mighty army the church of God is moving forward eradicating the traffic and in its place are found prosperous homes, happy wives, emancipated men and well-fed and well-clothed shildren, and this army of God will march on and on until in this country, founded upon the teachings of Christ, there will not be found one dramshop.—The American Issue.

MY BROTHER'S KEEPER.

By Victor P. Hammer.

Am I my brother's keeper now,
As in the days of old,
To lead him in the ways of right
And keep him from the cold?

Must I forget he is my kin,
Deserving of my care,
As though he lived his life alone
And in mine had no share?

Shall I reproach my risen Lord
And all his works ignore,
In driving goodness from my heart,
Then shutting tight the door?

Yes, I must help my brother friend
And lead him not astray,
But guide him safely on through life
Into eternal day!

Still not forgetful of the tie
Of universal love
That binds us all in one great band
While marching home above.

My risen Lord shall be the first
For me to follow near,
And, when I've blessed mankind as he,
I've helped a brother dear.

To keep my brother from all harm
And lead him home to God
Is charged to me, yea, if I go
The way my Master trod!

Request for Prayer.

Hartis-Johnson Nuptials.

On the 14th of June, 1911, at 2:30 o'clock at the country residence of Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Hartis, of Steel Creek, near Charlotte, N. C., was celebrated a wedding of rare beauty and of much interest to friends and relatives, the marriage vows being taken by their fair young daughter Irene and Mr. Lesker Eugene Johnson. Seated at the organ was Miss Bessie Grier of Steel Creek, surrounded with choice ferns, with evergreens banked in artful profusion about laced windows on the piazza and graceful festoons of clinging vines, when sweetly chimed forth the first faint notes of "Mendelssohn's Wedding March," during which from out the arched doorway slowly proceed the bridal party in order thus:

Miss Elizabeth Brunson, of Beaufort, S. C., wearing opalescent silk and laces, with Mr. C. Sherrell of Statesville, N. C. Next came Miss Rader Stearns, of Matthews, N. C., in opalescent silk and laces, with Mr. Ross McCoy, of Charlotte, N. C. In turn came Miss Bula Johnson, maid of honor and sister of the groom, attired in pink silk and laces, carrying an arm full of sweet peas and maiden-hair ferns, with Mr. Herbert Cline, of Charlotte, N. C., the groom's best man. Just at this point the waiting company were attracted by a vision of loveliness, the bride hanging on the arm of her betrothed, handsomely attired in white messaline ornamented with pearls and rich laces, wearing a sweeping veil caught up with orange blossoms and carrying a shower of roses and carnations in a tangle of ferns; the groom and his men becomingly attired suited to the occasion.

The solemn words which made these two husband and wife were spoken by Rev. W. D. Reid, assisted in prayer by Rev. J. W. Self, of Cleveland and Mecklenburg respectively, and of the N. C. M. P. Conference. The marriage was followed by a delightful reception in the home. The bowl of fruit punch was lavishly dispensed, Miss Grace McDowel presiding in a queenly and efficient manner. Misses Ellen Peoples, Kate Wall and Elva McDowel served a delicious ambrosia in orange bowls, garnished with crisp garden lettuce, with several dainty and toothsome kinds of cakes, this done in the same hospitable way. Guests in numbers, a probable estimate of 125 or more, representing neighbors, school friends and others, with relatives, near and from a distance, of Statesville, Lexington, Charlotte, Matthews, Rock Hill, S. C., and Beaufort, S. C., Providence, and Steel Creek.

Mr. Johnson is a promising young civil engineer of Charlotte, whose life and character are reputed to be such as his bride and new-found relatives can be justly proud; and the bride, cultivated and winsome, as well as useful and domestic.

Immediately after the reception, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson, having donned her going-away suit in cloth, navy blue, black hat and gloves, departed amid a shower of rice, kindly good-byes, and well-wishes galore, for future happiness, to enjoy a few weeks of "honeymoon" with Mr. Johnson's relatives, thence to Asheville in the "Land of the Sky," and other points in Western N. C. and Tennessee.

A wish for their safe return to the home country, spending remainder of the summer with the "old folks at home," sparing them a bit of the keen loneliness that pervades everywhere when "Sis" leaves the home nest to sit under another "gourd-vine," and be his companion for life.

Quite sensibly selected were the many tokens of esteem left them here in the Bride's house, and awaiting them at the "home-coming" in Troutman.

May wafts from the perfumed wings of these tender memories come to them even in the after-years:

"As music heard stealing o'er the still waters,
As the sleepy pines when the wind passes by,
As pearls in the depths of the ocean,
As stars that anamel the sky.
Like June and the odor of roses,
Like dew and the freshness of morn,
Like sunshine that kisses the clover,
Like tassels of silk on the corn.
As notes of the thrush in the woodland,
As brooks where violets grow,
As rainbows that arch the heavens,
As clouds where the sun dippeth low.
Like dreams of Arcadian pleasures,
Like colors that gratefully blend,
Like everything breathing of pureness,
Like these is the love of a friend."

DIED.

Thompson.

Glenn Melvin Thompson, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred S. Thompson, was born Sept. 5, 1909, and died at the home of his grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Monroe Linens, at Bellemont, in Alamance County, on June 11, 1911, at the age of one year, nine months and six days. Glenn was a bright, sweet child, and a source of great joy to his fond and loving parents and other relatives. The writer became very much attached to him while teaching at Bellemont the past winter, and his death brings a pang of sadness. We feel that in some mysterious way this little life was given to be a light to the home for a short space of time, and then taken to shine in another Home where there is no death.

"God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform," so we know that it was best that Glenn should go, for God does not err, and does only that which is best for those who love and trust Him.

May the Lord in His wisdom comfort the bereaved relatives and friends, and show them that although they can not bring Glenn back, they can go to him, and live with him in that celestial clime where death is unknown.

The last rites over the body of the departed child were conducted in the M. P. Church at Bellemont, by Rev. J. R. Burgess, and the remains were laid to rest in the cemetery at that place.

T. T. S.

Burlington, N. C., June 19.

Bro. J. T. Hawkins departed this life June 4th, aged 69 years. He had been so near blind for several years that he could see to walk about but very little. He always submitted to his afflictions with Christian patience. He was confined to his room a few days before the end came with pneumonia. All that a devoted wife, sons, and physician could do was done, but none could stay the hand of death. God in His wise providence called him unto Himself, where there is no more sickness, sorrow, pain, nor death. He had been a member of Hawkins Chapel M. P. Church for a number of years, and was always ready to give of his means for the support of the gospel. He was a good citizen, kind neighbor, and was highly honored by all who knew him. Truly a good man has gone to reap his reward in the mansions above prepared for the people of God. He was twice married; his first wife preceded him to the great beyond a good many years ago; that union was blessed with seven children, five boys and two girls. The boys and last wife survive him. We know that it is hard for the bereaved ones to part with him, yet there is that blessed assurance that you shall meet him in heaven if you only live as he did. We know you miss his voice. The light of a home has been put out by death. Where once were joy and gladness now all is darkness. Grief now fills the hearts of those behind. May we all so live and trust God here on earth that we may meet him in heaven. His remains were laid to rest in the family burying ground on the 5th in the presence of a large assembly of relatives and friends. The burial service was conducted by his pastor, Rev. S. W. Taylor. The pall bearers were G. W. Morgan, P. N. Stainback, Jr., Z. V. Story, T. M. Allen, Richard Morris, W. T. King. The writer would say to the bereaved ones to look to Christ who is able to comfort you.

Our Father in His wisdom called
The boon His love had given,
And though on earth the body lies,
The soul is safe in heaven.

C. M. Hawkins.

Tribute to the Memory of George R. Davis.

Have you been back to the old home when it seemed as if the light had gone out of it, and a sad gloom was over all? So it seems to us now when we go home and miss the familiar presence of our dear Father so sadly. We miss the kindly greeting, the hearty welcome shining in his eyes. Until he became too feeble to do so he never failed to meet us at the gate.

Mr. Davis was one of the best men I ever knew. Kind, gentle, considerate toward all. His good influence and example was felt throughout the community in which he lived. In it I am sure there was not one who did not count him a friend in time of need, helpful and sympathetic in time of trouble. I will never forget the night when through misfortune our little family was thrown out in the world houseless and homeless. Then how kindly Mr. Davis and his good wife took us into their hospitable home, and how surely they made us feel that we were welcome there. After this we lived with him in his own home two years. There I learned to know him and love him as if he had been my own father.

Mr. Davis possessed the faculty so rarely found in our men, of understanding and sympathizing with the women of his household in the petty trials and annoyances of the everyday life; things that are to most men trifles light as air. Many times when I have been hurried and worried with so many things waiting to be done, and perhaps myself getting a little cross, Grandpap would come in and with a kind word and a smile somehow smooth matters over. Then he would take Baby Leah out—and away, thus enabling me to give my time and attention to the work in hand.

Mr. Davis was one of those people who never get to be old, or who grow old so gracefully that we do not perceive it. In the language of the times we would say that he was seventy years young instead of seventy years old. He loved young people, and always had a kind word for our children, whatever they were interested in was pleasing to him.

Through his long illness of six months or more his mind was bright and clear to the end. He spoke freely to the family of his business matters with the same composure that had characterized his life, then quietly fell asleep in Jesus. May the virtues of his useful life and triumphant death be an inspiration to his friends and loved ones.

Mr. Davis was one of our Confederate veterans. How pitiful and sad to look around us and see how thin their ranks are growing as the years go by. It is to the memory of these that our people of the South should pay tribute; a tribute that is justly due, deserved by the living who won it, and by their comrades who have given answer to the roll call on another shore.

"The Boys in Gray are growing old,
Their locks are silvered now,
But courage that has ne'er grown cold
Illumines every brow.
Their battle-flags are rent and torn,
But thus the story tell,
Of those who now all bent and worn
Once fought and fought so well.
They're growing old, the Boys in Gray,
Their march is sad and slow,
Let's help them on their weary way,
They have not far to go.
They're growing old, the brave old boys,
The dear old Boys in Gray.
Let's cheer them on with hand and voice,
Let's help them on their way.

WHAT IS REST?

Eminent Specialists Show Value of Exercise and Dangers of Fatigue.

That no consumptive can hope for a cure of his disease without following the most rigid routine with regard to rest is the conclusion of four interesting articles in the Journal of the Outdoor Life for June, by Professor Frederick S. Lee of Columbia University, New York, Drs. Lawrason Brown and F. H. Heise of the Adirondack Cottage Sanatorium, Trudeau, N. Y., Dr. Joseph H. Pratt of Boston, and Will M. Ross of Stevens Point, Wis.

Professor Lee, writing on the subject "The Physiology of Exercise and Rest," shows by experiments on dissected frogs the way in which exercise tires the muscles and, in fact, all the organs of the body. He says:

"There is no known antidote to fatigue, unless it be rest, with all that rest implies. Sleep allows the reparative process of rest to be performed most quickly and completely. A moderate degree of fatigue, or even a considerable degree when not too often incurred, is not detrimental to a healthy body and is even to be advised. The healthy body is provided with great recuperative powers, and does not rapidly succumb to even excessive demands on its energy. But it should be allowed the proper condition for recuperation, and that condition is adequate rest. There is danger when the fatigue of one day's labor is not eliminated before the next day's work is begun. The effects may then be cumulative, the tissues may be in a continued state of depression, and the end may be disastrous."

Drs. Brown and Heise in an article on "Properly Regulated Rest and Exercise in Pulmonary Tuberculosis," holds that the action of the poisonous germs of the disease on the body is very similar to that of over-exercise. The poisonous irritation caused by the germs gives the organs and tissues of the body a double load to carry. They emphasize the importance of rest in the treatment of tuberculosis, but also insist that properly regulated exercise is very necessary. They state their conclusions thus:

"Exercise when properly regulated and systematically graded is an important factor in the treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis. Through it the patient is in many cases returned to home and family with lessened chance of future relapse. At the same time part of his earning capacity is restored and he is consequently financially less dependent upon others, relieving him of much worry, expense, and hardship."

Dr. Pratt, who was founder of the first Church Tuberculosis Class in the United States in the Emmanual Church in Boston, claims that in the treatment of tuberculosis absolute rest, often in bed, must be extended over a period of months, before the consumptive should take any exercise. He says, "Prolonged rest in bed out of doors yields better resutls than any other method of treating pulmonary tuberculosis. Patients will have a better appetite and take more food without discomfort and gain weight and strength faster than patients with active disease who are allowed to exercise. Complications are much less frequent. When used in the incipient stage recovery is more rapid and surer.

Mr. Ross, who is himself a cured consumptive, and a writer of considerable prominence, holds that unless resting becomes a business to the tuberculosis patient, he might as well give up his fight for health. "The period of infection with tuberculosis," he says, "is not a vacation. It is a twenty-four-hour-a-day job. True it is a period of idleness, but one of intelligent, directed idleness. The day's work should consist of rest; rest should be the only business on hand. The light exercise, or hour of reading should be considered as the reward of a good day's work, like the evening of slippered ease to the tired business man at the end of the day. This recreation, however, should be considered only as an incidental result of the patient's work, not the main object."

REPORTING OF TUBERCULOSIS.

Required in 25 States—No Provision in 28—Value of Registration.

Reporting of living cases of tuberculosis is now required by law or health regulation in 25 states, while in 28 states and territories, no provision whatever is made for keeping record of cases of this infectious disease, according to a statement published to day by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis in its official organ, the Journal of the Outdoor Life for June.

Conneticut, District of Columbia, Kansas, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island and Vermont, are placed in the honor class as having laws which provide specificially for the reporting of tuberculosis and which make provision for the proper registration of living cases of this disease. In fourteen other states, laws or regulations of the state boards of health require that tuberculosis be reported simply as one of a list of infectious diseases. These states are, Alabama, California, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oregon, Pennslyvania, Tennessee, Utah, Washington, and Wisconsin.

The following 28 states and territories have no provision whatever for the reporting or registration of tuberculosis cases: Arizona, Alaska, Arkansas, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Kentucky, Lousinana, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

Several cities in non-registration states, as for instance, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, and New Orleans, have local ordinances requiring that tuberculosis be reported. In all, there are about 100 cities in the United States which have ordinances of this nature.

The National Association insists that the first requisite for a comprehensive campaign for the elimination of tuberculosis in a state or city is a well-enforced law requiring that every living case of tuberculosis be reported to the health authorities.

CLEAN-UP DAY.

It is very gratifying to see so many cities and towns having "Clean-Up Day." It is certainly to the interest of improved health as well as improved appearance in our cities and homes. As usual the women all realize this, and are leading the movement in many places to have their cities improved in appearance and health. Through organization of their clubs they are enabled to operate as a power for good in this and other matters.

Clean-Out Day.

Now let us have in every city and town in North Carolina a "Clean-Out Day"—a day in which we will not clean up our streets and lots, but will clean out our cellars and garrets, and all parts of our houses and premises where combustible matter has accumulated. This will mean a great check to our fire waste. At least two-thirds of our fires are preventive. It is right and necessary for us to spend thousands of dollars to support fire departments with which to put out fires after they once start, but money spent in preventing fires will go further and accomplish more.

Will not our women's clubs and municipal officers help along this line?

Insurance Commissioner.

AFTER GRADUATION.

Stepping out from the halls and shaded paths, coveted diplomas in hand, with clear eyes that shine with the joy of living, and with hearts where the high purpose and confident courage feel only an occasional tremor of doubt and wavering—so comes the latest army of graduates from the many schools and colleges of the land.

The world needs them. It has a place and a welcome for them all—just as the ocean welcomes many rivers, and yet is never full. Nor is the world the cold and hostile place which many of them have pictured it. They will do well to get rid of the idea that life is a battle. Life is a problem to solve, a task to perform, a summit to scale, but it is not a warfare unless the individual prefers to make it so.

Moreover, the graduate makes a mistake if he thinks that life is something complex and complicated, a struggle in which much wisdom is essential to success—wisdom in which cunning and duplicity are leading elements. The best kind of a life is really a most simple thing, after all. A few plain rules, honesly followed, lead to the goal that is most worth reaching.

The graduate will find it desirable to forget some things he has learned, but there are many things he can not learn too well—that push is far better than "pull", that the established order has some commendable things about it, that honesty is the best policy, that most men are good fellows when you know them, that money is an unsatisfactory standard of values, that service is the highest expression of worship, that growth must not be allowed to cease, and that a clean and kindly life is the one fitting expression of gratitude to the Giver of life and all its numberless opportunities.—Youth's Companion.

TO PREVENT MOULD.

To prevent mould on preserves or jellies, put a few drops of glycerine around the edge of the jar before putting on the cover.—Home Department, National Magazine for June.

MILK TO PUT OUT FIRE.

It has been proved that milk will effectually extinguish the flames from gasoline, or any form of petroleum, since it forms an emulsion with the oil, whereas water only spreads it.—Home Department, National Magazine for June.

AN UNEXPECTED DIALOGUE.

There are two linotype machines in the office of the M. P. Herald, one five years old and a new one. The new one stands in the rear of the room in one corner. This may help to explain the following dialogue which the editor caught last night after the hands had all left the office, and everything had become quiet:

Old Machine: Hello, there, little sister!

New Machine: Don't call me "little sister." It is true, I am not quite as tall as you are, but I am not your sister. I belong to a different and better family.

O. M.: I meant no offence. I beg pardon. I felt lonesome, and wanted to talk to someone. But as we are both engaged in the same kind of work, I don't see that you have reason to feel stuck up.

N. M.: Well, I am a new Model 5, and you are an old Model 3.

O. M.: That is true, but don't you see how much more I am thought of? You are back there in a corner. Nearly all the visitors in the office look at me, while very few look at you.

N. M.: You are welcome to all the attention you get. I saw an old woman looking through her glasses at you yesterday: she couldn't tell a type-making machine from a windmill. The greenhorns all stare at you, but I notice when an expert linotype operator comes in, he passes you by, and comes and looks at me, and never fails to speak of the splendid features I have that you do not have.

O. M.: I do more work than you do, in spite of all your new features.

N. M.: But I do better work than you do. Quality counts for something in this world.

O. M.: Let us talk of something more pleasant. Have you perpetrated any jokes lately?

N. M.: I tried to get off a good one the other day and would have succeeded if the Proof Reader hadn't interfered.

O. M.: I came near getting off a good one, too. I was setting up an account of commencement at a high-toned college. The writer spoke of the "exhibit of fine arts," but I slipped the r in before the a, and made him say "exhibit of fine rats." I would have had some fun out of it if Mr. Proof Reader hadn't noticed it.

N. M.: Mr. Proof Reader spoils a lot of fun. I can't see why he is so strict.

O. M.: Nor I either. One time I heard a man offer the editor a reward if he would print an account of a pounding just as it was written. The writer gave a long string of things people had given him, and in the list was what seemed to the man offering the reward a new and strange article of diet—"pork eggs." But Mr. Proof Reader knocked the editor out of his reward by changing it into "pork and eggs."

N. M.: Proof Reader is a dumffigzqxraffkqqxzvbgkqjemfwyparedylwg.

O. M.: Yes, old Proof Reader is a cranfantidagoppqxrrgfirfwgfidlwkfiwfp.

On hearing this, we put on our hat, locked up the office and started for home.

ANGEL MINISTRY.

Of the many stories of the late Edward King, Bishop of Lincoln, the following, is one of the most striking. It appears that in his curate days King was sent for to visit a man some mile and a half away, who was said to be dying. The night was dark and the way lonely, but the young curate trudged on, only to find, however, when he reached the house, that there was no one ill at all, and he returned home puzzled and perplexed. Years passed, and the incident faded from his memory. When he was a Bishop he visited a man in prison under sentence of death, and to his great surprise, the criminal asked the Bishop if he remembered this incident. "It was I," said the man, "who gave the false message; I wanted to lure you out that I might rob you in the lonely road." "Why didn't you attack me then?" asked the bishop. The reply was extraodinary: "I hadn't the pluck. I lay in hiding, as I had determined to attack you on your way back; but when you came near I saw you were not alone." "But I was alone," persisted the bishop. "No, you were not," retorted the man; "there was a mysterions looking stranger walking close behind you, and he followed you to your house and then disappeared. My chance was gone, and I experienced a sensation I never felt before." "Can it be," it is asked, "that in that dark night the angel of the Lord stood by him and made the fact known?"—Selected.

WRONG DIAGNOSIS.

Mrs. Slingchin put her head over the fence and thus addressed her neighbor, who was hanging out her washing:

"A family has moved into the empty house across the way, Mrs. Mangle."

"Yes, I know."

"Did you notice the furniture?"

"Not particularly."

"Two loads and I wouldn't give a sovereign a load for it. Carpets? I wouldn't put 'em down in my kitchen. And the children! I won't allow mine to associate with 'em. And the mother! She looks as if she had never known a day's happiness. The father drinks, I expect. Too bad that such people should come into this neighborhood. I wonder who they are?"

"I know 'em."

"Do you? Well I declare! Who are they?"

"The mother is my sister, and the father is the superintendent of the Sunday-school."

—Some time ago a man joined the Boston Young Men's Christian Association. When he signed the membership roll, under the head of "Denomination, he wrote, "Auth." The clerk said, "Isn't that a new denomination, sir?" "Not much," replied the new member. "I never heard of it," said the clerk. "What?" exclaimed the man in great surprise; "you never heard of that? Why, that is authodox!"—Association Notes.

Federal Judge K. M. Landis at Chicago in sentencing a white- slave trafficker to the penitentiary took occasion to denounce in the most scathing terms the five-cent theaters, which he said were the destroyers of girlhood and altogether a demoralizing agency.

A Pittsburg man while at sea six weeks ago tossed a sealed bottle into the water containing a check for $1 payable to bearer, to see whethr it would ever be found. This check has now turned up and been cashed. It wos found by Pearl Etheridge, an 11-year-old girl of Kitty Hawk, N. C.

C. E. TOPIC FOR JULY 2—A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

BY CHARLES A. HINES.

Scripture: Esther 4:1-17.

This is a Patriotic Consecration Meeting. It has been truly said, "Make a man a Christian and you make him a good citizen." The good and faithful church member or the Christian Endeavorer should be always ready to serve his country.

The majority of people in the United States are moral people. While the church does not have a majority in membership, it has a majority of sympathizers. If immorality openly exists or is carried on in the open, it is because church members are not doing their duty.

Many people still live with the idea deep-rooted in their minds that if they go to church on Sunday, and live reasonably clean lives in the week they have done all that God expects. I have no sympathy with this kind of religion. I believe that negative religion is just what it purports to be—nothing represented by .000.

Church members and Christian Endeavorers must do something positive. Some of the ways of serving one's country are at the ballot box, in civic organizations, in moral movements, in local option fights, for better sanitation, more schools, cleaner public shows, vaudeville and theatre attractions.

The Southern people are moving in this direction. Saloons are gone, and the result was brought about by the church members and the good women of our Southland. Other questions must be solved—our theatrical attractions must be improved, the "blind tiger" must go, the public dance hall must be closed, the pool room must be shut up, or the game lifted from its bad surroundings.

When you compare them closely you will find that work for the country is work for church, and vice versa. The week-day work of the church member is to be a good citizen, a charitable man, one who lifts up the fallen brother, who helps to make better his neighborhood, his town and his State.

Illuminating Illustrations.

When a foreign visitor to an ancient city remarked that the city was without walls he was answered: "But we are walled. The citizens are the walls; every man is a brick."

Are you a brick? If so, are you in your place; are you where you can be of service? If you are not where you can ward off the blow of the enemy, if you are of no service to your country, you are not a brick.

"Nobody has any right to find life uninteresting or unrewarding who sees a wrong that he can help to remedy or an evil within himself that he can hope to overcome."

In an address made at Greensboro a few years ago Mr. Bryan, the famous orator, said: "No man is great on account of any office he has held, by reason of any honor that has been conferred upon him; he is great because he has done something for humanity. A hundred years from now we shall not be remembered by what the world has done for us, but by what we have done for the world."

Do not think that being a soldier is the only way of serving your country, or war the only opportunity of service. As Carlyle says, "It is not the manner of death, but the cause for which a man dies, that makes him a martyr." There are hundreds of ways in which one can serve his country, or his neighbor (for both are the same) without going to war. This thought is very prettily expressed by Joaquin Miller in a famous poem:

"The bravest battle that ever was fought!
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you will find it not,
'Twas fought by the mothers of men."

And again:

"O ye with banners and battle-shot
And soldiers to shout and praise,
I tell you the kingliest victories fought
Are fought in these silent ways."

VICTIMS OF MOODS.

One of the elements which make for happiness and unhappiness in life is the vigor and persistence of moods. Will means something definite; intellect, if it is properly used, moves to certain ends; the affections are positive and real. Moods, on the other hand, are mere states of feeling; drifting fogs which arise now on one point and now on another of the landscape; changing nothing, unstable, unreal, driven away by a passing wind, and yet for the moment obscuring the view as completely as if they had destroyed it.

To a great many people the mood is a finality. They accept and act under it as if it were a normal thing. When certain moods tend to recur at short intervals and merge into what we call temperament, many people yield control to them, and set up temperament as a shield between themselves and responsibility. "With my temperament," a man says, "I cannot do otherwise;" or, "No man with my temperament could succeed in such a position;" or, "With my temperament I can be neither contented nor happy." Temperament is a serious matter. So is a pronounced mood a fog bank which lies persistently over one section of the landscape, and will not move for sun or wind. But to be the slave of temperament, the victim of a mood, is to accept any other form of tyranny.

The beginning of manhood is to keep one's will acting freely and vigorously; to protect one's intellect from the false coloring which comes from emotion and feeling; to assert one's self in the face of the passions and influences which assail the stability of a man's integrity and independence. This is never an easy thing to do. In some cases it is a very difficult thing to do; but it is always an imperative thing, something which no man can leave undone and be a man in the full sense of the word.

For the victim of moods or the slave of a temperament is never a free person. In a very thoughtful discussion of these and kindred matters in his book on "The Temple of Virtue," Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham puts the matter of moods with admirable clearness:

"First of all, there is the district in the mysterius land of selfhood which is occupied by our moods. It appears to me that over this each one of us may exercise a useful, if not an easy, system of control. All of us, that is to say, have our alternating periods of sunshine and storm, of cheerfulness and depression, of energy and relaxation, of faith and doubt, of hope and despair, of confidence and weak uncertainty. Now we are lifted into conscious joy and throbbing hope; but again we feel ourselves forlorn and desolate. Life to-day appears a privilege and radiant opportunity for usefulness; tomorrow we seriously wonder whether anything is really much worth while.

"So there are times when our work, our duties, even our drudgeries are done easily and gladly. Instead of finding them burdensome, we rejoice in the various cares and responsibilties which fill the hours of each day so full. But then deep gloom oppresses us, and we can neither seem to do nor be our best. And all such moods are natural. They come upon nearly all of us. Very few people can hope to live in such divinely ordered latitudes of soul that their sky is always clear. We cannot, therefore, put an absolute end to these various and changeable conditions. But we can and should control them. Little by little we may learn by very commonplace experience that the gloom and the depression need not cause us genuine despair. However dark the curtain of the cloud may hang, the blue sky is behind it still. Night falls, and yet the stars shine out.

"All of us may work out for ourselves a very practical and helpful philosophy in this respect, and we ought to work it out and discipline ourselves to live by it as well. When the soul is feeble to believe, when we feel ourselves indifferent to the good and true, when things seem burdensome and life appears a giant load of care, it is possible to remind ourselves that we have been along that very road before, and have watched the leaden darkness of those same great clouds, and yet beyond them we have come out into sunlight and have been refreshed. We must have our discouragements, indeed, but we need not therefore be utterly cast down. We may despond, but we need not feel despair."

No man or woman, however well poised and vigorous, can at any moment throw off any mood. There are moods rooted in physical and nervous conditions which will persist; there are periods of depression from which one can escape only by long periods of rest. But there is one thing which every man and woman can do, and that is to refuse to be controlled by temperament or guided by mood. Everybody ought to come after a few years to understand himself; and when a man discovers that certain moods are recurrent in his experience, and gains familiarity with them, while he may not be able to throw them off, he may absolutely refuse to be led or diverted by them. In a dense fog it is well sometimes to lie at anchor, to recognize the obscurity, but not to be led into wrong channels by reason of it. In a moment of profound discouragement no man ought ever to decide any important matter. While it is not always possible to throw off depression at the moment, it is always possible to refuse to come to any important decisions while it lasts. It is better to lie at anchor. It is never necessary to follow one's fears and go in the wrong direction. The beginning of strength is to resist one's moods and to control one's self by intelligence and will, and not be the victim of passing conditions and states of mind.—The Outlook.

GIVE HIM ANOTHER CHANCE.

We know that he doesn't deserve it. We have all been there ourselves. That is why we know just how mean a thing it is that he has done. But, strange to say, the experience doesn't seem to give us very much sympathy for the other fellow. True, the meanness in ourselves may not have shown itself in precisely the same way that it cropped out in the other chap; but it is the same brand of meanness, having its origin in the same streak of cussedness which seems to run through the human race.

Just how often and how much we should forgive is a question which has puzzled many a philosopher and a good many more self-appointed judges. There are plenty of men who would enjoy serving in the capacity of the Lord's high executioners, they hate the sinner so much. But the Lord doesn't hate the sinner; he hates sin. These would-be executioners have gotten the thing twisted around. As a matter of fact, we are punished not so much for our sin as by our sin. Few of us need to wait until the hereafter to get what is "coming to us;" we are getting it right along in good, big doses. Perhaps the devil thinks that he will miss getting some of us in the end, so he's giving us here and now some of the punishment that we do sin or shortcoming, ask yourself if it isn't true that you are down on that sin because it has shown its head so often in your own life; and if you've conquered it, be glad, and help the other man to conquer it. Give him another chance, remembering that if you have been thrown down and out for good and all when you fell short, you would be a long way from your ideal, which seems so near. It may not be much of an ideal. No doubt you should have aimed higher, because it didn't cost you much of a struggle to reach it; but who knows how hard the other sinner fought to win out, and how through tears and heartaches he actually conquered where you, put to the same test, would have miserably failed?—Rev. Charles Stelzle, in the Temple Bulletin.

A VERY POISONOUS WEED.

A writer in the Statesville Landmark says that the water hemlock (Cicuta maculata) is becoming very common in Iredell County meadows and several horses have already died from eating hay which contained it. It is described as follows:

"The stem is large, hollow, purplish in color; the leaflets are ovate-lanceolate, sharp-pointed, coarsely toothed or serrate; the umbels or flower-stems are large, many-rayed like the wires in an umbrella; the flowers are white, grow in clusters, are small, something like the wild carrott; the fruit or seed is roundish in shape; flowers in July; grows in wet, marshy places from Florida to Mississippi and northward. The entire plant is very poisonous and is what botanists call a perennial, lasting from year to year and grows from seed or root-stalk."

The only way to get rid of it is to plow up infested lands and cultivate for a number of years. If any reader has reason to think his land infested, he should send a specimen to the State Department of Agriculture at once and find out. Care should be taken also to let no plants ripen seed. In fact, every plant seen should be dug up at once.—Progressive Farmer.

Mr. Blower—Doctor, I'm getting too stout. Can you suggest something to reduce my weight?

Dr. Wise—Yes, nothing reduces flesh quicker than worry. Just spend a few hours every day thinking about that bill you owe me.

EVERLASTING REMEMBRANCE.

Nobody wants to be forgotten. Jesus Himself revealed the longing in giving His disciples the last supper, that He might be remembered. We are making our own memorials all the common days. It is the good and useful whose memory is blessed. They live lives of usefulness and service, and they are remembered by what they have done. Of course, the character of the remembrance will depend upon the life. If we would leave a sweet memory we must do beautiful things. "The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance. Those who do good, who perform, wherever they go, deeds of kindness, will leave behind them a memory which shall always be fragrant. One cannot live selfishly, impurely, dishonestly, or dishonorably and hope to have a good memory.—Exchange.

"HE NEEDS ME."

"Yes, I need Thee every hour—
But can it truly be
That Christ, my blessed Master,
Hath really need of me?
Can one so great, so mighty,
Who formed the boundless sea,
Use such a poor weak creature?
Hath Jesus need of me?

"Oh blessed, blessed knowledge,
That one so weak may know
That he is really needed
To work for Christ below:
To help Him in the vineyard—
The Vine's own branch to be;
The Vine needs all its branches,
So Jesus does need me.

"Needs me? Why not some other
Who works more swift and true?
Hark! I can hear him whisper,
'Your work must be done by you.'
Dear Father, give me wisdom
To live my life for Thee;
So when my work is ended,
Thou'lt still have need of me."

—Bro. R. A. Swaringen, who has just been graduated from the college at Hickory, is to move to Westminster in September to enter the seminary. He has been conducting a sales agency during his summer vacations to meet expenses. He is now in Indiana where he is directing the work of thirty-seven salesmen. He writes: "God has been good to me and blessed me, even in temporal things." Bro. Swaringen has ability that would bring him success in the business world, but he feels that his talent should be devoted to the higher work of saving men, and so he is preparing for the ministry.

CHRIST'S POWER TO BLESS.

Christ must have bene conscious of a mighty power to bless men. His invitations reveal both his power and his willingness to bless. At one time we hear him saying, "Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Rest! what a great boon to the weary and oppressed.

Again, we hear His voice lifted up in the gracious invitation, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." The figure has changed, but the great fact is that Christ is still offering to satisfy the souls of men by a power which He alone posseses.

Again He says: "I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." What relief and comfort in these words to all the perplexed and distressed and ignorant sons of men! The light of life shall shine upon their pathway, and their course shall be plain if only they shall follow the true light.

The figure changes again, and He is the good Shepherd, and knows His sheep, and will lay down His life for them. But He shall take His life again, and His sheep shall hear His voice, and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd. What a comfort to our hearts in this picture! The Lord is our Shepherd! We shall not want.

But in all cases, Christ's power to bless is conditioned upon our attitude toward Him. We must come unto Him, if we would find rest of soul. We must drink of the water He offers us, if we would have our thirst quenched. We must follow Him if we would walk in the light. We must hear His voice if we would have Him for the Shepherd of our souls. To the rich young ruler who came inquiring the way of eternal life, He said: Free yourself from all else, and come and follow Me. Sell your property, give away the proceeds to those that need, and join my disciples. Companionship with Christ is necessary to our good. Apart from Him we cannot receive His blessing. He is the author of eternal life to such as come unto Him and abide with Him. He makes fruitful the ingrafted branch. The severed branch withers and dies.

O that men knew what a mighty source of blessing Christ would be to them! Surely every one who knows Christ in His power to save owes a great debt to those that know Him not.

—An aged brother said in the Herald office a few days ago that he had been studying much of late about what would beome of his soul at his death. He had in mind the question as to whether death is a state of unconsciousness or not. There is a sect known as "soul-sleepers" who teach that there will be no consciousness until the resurrection, but surely the intimations of the Bible are against this view. This view was condemned by councils of Lyons (1274), Ferrara (1438), Florence (1439), and Trent (1545—63), though Pope John XXII (who died 1304) accepted it and openly advocated it. Calvin wrote against it in his "De Psychopannychia" in 1534. Practically the question does not seem very important, it being swallowed up in the infinitely more important question, Where and how will I spend eternity?

PLEASE NOTICE.

All Methodist Protestants near Morgantown are requested to meet Bro. C. F. Silver and H. W. Braswell at the Court House Saturday, July 29, 1911, at 2:30 P. M. We want all Methodist Protestants in reach of this place that are interested in a church home to be present.

Yours fraternally,
H. W. Braswell.

SOME ADVANTAGES IN THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

The question has been asked time and again, Is there anything in the Methodist Protestant Church so essential that will justify us in remaining a separate ecclesiastical organization? One thing is sure, if there is not, then we should, as soon as possible, seek a home in some other denomination; but if we are justified in remaining a separate organization, and realize that we have a divine mission, then we should do our best to build up a strong, vigorous church. While I am free to say that I deplore that the Church of Christ is divided into so many different organizations, nevertheless, I hope that we will continue to exist until we can form a union with some sister church, or churches, where all our excellent advantages can be retained. I will try to point out some:

1. Article 4, in Elementary Principles, is one. "Every man has inalienable right to private judgment in matters of religion," etc. What a blessed fact to know that every member in our church can take his Bible as his sole rule of faith and practice! You can't find that in all denominations.

2. The right to challenge, page 51-2. In our church we need not fear that some pope, bishop or some one else of special authority can select a committee to try an accused person, as he may see fit, and the accuesd have no chance to challenge. This I consider a most precious privilege, which we do not find in all churches. With us no one can be expelled without a fair and impartial trial. What can be more unjust than a prejudiced or packed committee in a church trial? And yet such instances have been very numerous in the past.

3. Being entitled to a letter of standing or dismissal "No pastor shall withhold a certificate from a person whose moral character is fair," page 123-10. How often has it been the case that excellent Christian people who for years have nobly sustained the church, for reasons that they believed to be satisfactory, wished to unite with some other denomination, but were refused a letter of recommendation. Such a refusal is a great offense to any one entitled to such a letter, and a violation of Matt. 7:12.

4. In the full sense of the word our Master's command is sacred in our church, "One is your Master; and all ye are brethren" (Matt. 23:8); "But ministers are forbidden to be lords over God's heritage, or to have dominion over the faith of saints," page 16-6. I have served in the army three years, but I never met such despotic action as I have witnessed a number of times in the church where men believe they have special authority to command and others must obey. I can never forget how I heard a bishop say, "I command you to sit down." While, perhaps, we too have some who would like to use such authority, thank God in our church no one has such authority, and assumed authority no one need obey or respect.

5. In our church people who build or purchase church property need not fear that some one can come and turn the key against them; but while they have members enough to keep up an organization, they control their own property; page 127-6. It is a sad fact that it has frequently happened that after people built and paid for their churches, they were deprived of the privilege of worshiping in the same, unless they would submit to what they believed to be wrong. I consider this a wonderful advantage, that when we give our money to build or purchase a church, we are sure no one can take it from us.

6. In our church ministers stand on their own feet—by this I mean that merit counts. If a man has the ability to fill the best pulpit in the church, who will hinder him? We have no one who can show favors to special favorite ones, nor punish those who may have incurred the displeasure of the man of authority. How well I remember when such a man of authority said to me, "You must go to ——— or we will not supply it." Of course I went, although the same man had promised me a far better field before conference. Neither is there any one who can deprive a minister of a field of labor as long as he is efficient. I can never forget when one of these men of special authority said to me, "I will suspend every man who will oppose me." I believe in due respect to our superiors in church and state, but some of the best service ever rendered to God and man was opposition to superiors when they were in the wrong.

7. In our church the laity have their rights secured in the full sense of the word. They have equal representation in the annual and general Conference. It is impossible for the ministers to enact laws without the consent of the laity. O that our ministers, preachers and laity might see and appreciate our excellent advantages, and then filled with the Holy Spirit we would be a church of wonderful power. So may it be.—Rev. S. Heininger, in The Methodist Recorder.

—We are glad to hear that Bro. Casto is improving.

UNION.

What is meant by Union? What does it take to constitute a union? How are unions frequently formed? A union worthy of the name of union, means something solid; all of its component parts should be of unblemished material, of such solidity and tenacity, that naught but utter anihilation could destroy it. Not all unions are thus composed. Sometimes all parties or parts are not as solid as they seem to be; but in course of time, we see a parting asunder, at a time and in a way we had not thought of.

Such partings are brought about, some from one cause, some from a different cause, but there invariably is a cause; sometimes a just and sometimes unjust ruling on somebody's part. Whatever it be that caused the separating or disuniting of particles or parties, to some extent become visible to the eye or mind more or less to all on-lookers, especially to those parties that are most concerned or most needed.

Such separations or parting of parties or parts, take place in inanimate things, and sometimes among individuals: frequently among individuals, and sometimes there is a just cause, one party being heavily grieved by the action of the other, believing himself or themselves unjustly treated by some one or more by some non-Christian spirit, and when it comes to pass that one or other manifests an overbearing or domineering spirit to the others, calling them heretics, mugwumps, cranks, unworthy of notice, refusing to mix, mingle, or associate with them at home or abroad, denouncing them in almost all conceivable ways that an un-Christian spirit can conceive of. How can that party, that did engage and practice such an un-Christian spirit toward the other party, now in a fawning way approach the other party and say, Come unite with us and we will do thee good; though you were one time unworthy of notice by us; though we now hope by this time the scales have fallen from your eyes and that now you are ready to prostrate yourselves at our feet, and by so doing acknowledge that your forefathers were all wrong, and that they went far astray, and continued thus for a long time, deceiving and leading others from the true and right fold. Now we are believing that you are willing and ready to come back, and by so doing acknowledge that we were right. You now say, Boys, come back, we will take you back. But you must bear this one thing in mind: we of the first part take back nothing we said or did to you, or your forefathers, they are gone. We say, Listen, you that treated our forefathers so un-Christlike, that there are yet numbered among the living some sons and grand sons of those old soldiers of the cross who are willing to and will defend the cause for which they so valiantly fought, and God so gloriously blessed them in so noble a cause, yes, will contend for those same principles that our forefathers fought for, until we too are called hence. How can you who trampled upon the hearts of those old saints so unmercifully, knowing at this time there is so much discontent in your camp, in face of that fact ask us to forsake, as we believe, the true and right way and come and unite with you, whilst your own house is divided as it is. You will first let us see and know that you are at peace among yourselves before you in a deceptive way invite us to fall at your feet.

No, sirs, think not for a moment that we are so blind to the truth that we are not able to see the motive behind your entreaties. There are those that never will suffer themselves by all your sophistry and glazed entreaties return to a non-co-operative people as you are. Now, brethren, with all due respect to you, let us try and live up to the Golden Rule.

MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

The Executive Committee of the Methodist Protestant Church held its third annual meeting in Atlantic City, N. J., July 6—7, 1911. The first session thereof was called to order by the chairman at 2:30 p. m., July 6th. The roll-call disclosed the following members present: Rev. T. H. Lewis, D. D., L.L.D., Chairman; Rev D. C. Coburn, D. D.; Rev. W. W. Lineberry, D. D.; Messrs. G. B. Moore and R. T. Pickens.

Devotional exercises were led by Dr. Lewis.

Of the absent members the death of Dr. J. D. Kinser was announced, and no messag was received from Mr. T. E. Hodges.

By resolution of former meeting the Annual Conference Presidents were made honorary membrs, and a motion was adopted inviting all the brethren present who were not conference presidents to honorary seats during the meeting, and to participate in discussions.

The following conference presidents were present: Rev. J. O. Ledbetter of Indiana. Rev. Jas. McCord of Missouri, Rev. F. E. Long of Pennsylvania, Rev. J. L. Wallace of North Missouri, Rev. J. M. Sheridan of Maryland, Rev. C. E. Shepard of Muskingum, Rev. J. Sala Leland of Pittsburg; and the following pastors: Rev. C. D. Sinkinson of Atlantic City, Rev. C. R. Blades of Lake Como, Rev. C. R. Cassen of Finksburgh.

The order of business was taken up and the several church boards and institutions reported through their representatives as follows: Rev. F. C. Klein, Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions; Rev. C. H. Beck, Secretary of the Board of Home Missions; Rev. G. R. Brown, Secretary of the Board of Ministerial Education; Rev. C. H. Hubbell, Secretary of the Board of Young People's Work, and the Board of Publication was represented by Mr. W. F. Pierpont, reporting for the Pittsburg Directory, and Rev. T. R. Woodford, reporting for the Baltimore Directory.

Reports from Institutions were as follows: Rev. T. H. Lewis, President Western Maryland College; Rev. H. L. Elderdice, President Westminster Theological Seminary; Rev. H. L. Feeman of Adrian Theological Seminary sent written report which was read and filed, as was also the report sent by Rev. D. S. Stephens of Kansas City University. A letter from Prof. E. J. Larrick brought a report from West Lafayette College.

Neither of the Women's Boards reported, nor have they officially recognized the existence of the Executive Committee at any time.

The interests of the boards and institutions of the church were ably and interestingly presented by the representatives present, and their written reports were filed with the secretary and became part of the permanent records of the Executive Committee, and from these will be gathered much material for the committee's quadrennial report to the General Conference.

During the sessions Dr. F. T. Tagg, Editor of the Methodist Protestant, occupied a seat of honor with us and addressed the meeting in the interest of the church organs. Dr. C. E. Wilbur, Editor of the Sunday school papers, was another honorary member and spoke interestingly of the Sunday school Literature, which elicited a general discussion of profit.

An hour was set apart for discussion of the "Advisability of continuing the Executive Committee." Sixteen speeches were made and the time limit had to be extended. A progressive sentiment was dominant, and the co-operative spirit manifested seemed to reinvest all present with a stronger faith in the strength and permanency of our church.

In executive session two appeals from the South Illinois Conference were passed upon, and the decisions will be forwarded by the secretary to the president of the conference.

Baltimore was chosen the place for the meeting of the General Conference on the third Friday in May, 1912.

A communication from the Protestant Episcopal Church asking for the appointment of a commission to meet with a commission of that church to discuss points of difference, etc., was considered. It was deemed advisable to comply with the courteous request and the following brethren were chosen to represent the church: Rev. T. H. Lewis, President General Conference; Rev. B. W. Anthony, President Adrian College; Mr. W. E. Sankey of Pittsburg and Mr. T. C. Miller of Fairmont, W. Va.

The next meting of the Committee was fixed for Tuesday before the third Friday in May, 1912, in the City of Baltimore. This just precedes the General Conference, and will be convenient for all reporting to the Committee.

REPORT OF THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE WOMAN'S BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS HELD AT MEADOW BRANCH, KY., MAY 20—25, 1911.

On reaching Meadow Branch, Saturday evening, May 20, we found a goodly number of people gathered at the church, ready to extend a cordial greeting, and they made all feel welcome. After a short service, we were taken to the homes where we were so kindly and cordially entertained.

The members of the Woman's Board were indeed glad to have Dr. Beck, Sec.-Treas. of the General Board, with them. He encouraged us all by his assurance of their interest in our work and their readiness to counsel and assist us in every possible way. Dr. Beck preached three excellent sermons: Saturday evening, Sunday morning, and Sunday evening. All services were well attended, but the large crowd that gathered Sabbath morning surely manifested more than ordinary interest. After the inspiring sermon by Dr. Beck, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was observed.

Sunday afternoon, Rev. A. D. Luke, of Mich., preached an excellent sermon.

Monday morning, the business session was called to order by the President, Mrs. C. W. Gray; the consecration exercises were led by Mrs. W. C. Hammer, Pres. of the N. C Branch; and the following officers were elected:

Pres., Miss H. Frances Sutton, Greensboro, N. C.

Vice-Pres., Mrs. N. Vice, Franklin, Ind.

Rec. Sec., Mrs. C. W. Gray, Three Rivers, Mich.

Cor. Sec., Miss Alice Conway, Catawba, Ohio.

Treas., Mrs. Fred Neer, Mechanicsburg, O.

Sec. of Mt. Work, Mrs. T. J. Wilson, 46 Bryant Street., N. W., Washington, D. C.

Supt. of Mt. Work, Mrs M. O. Everett, Pine Ridge, Ky.

The large number of delegates present and the full reports that were given show an increasing interest in the work. The obligations of the year had been met with a balance in the treasury and about one thousand dollars on hand for the Industrial School work.

The business session closed Wednesday afternoon.

The delegates left Meadow Branch with hearts full of gratitude for their hospitable entertainment and for the help given in all the services, especially the faithful service of the choir.

On Tuesday we gathered at Pine Ridge for Industrial Day. The attendance of about five hundred people and the interest manifested left no doubt in the minds of any as to the interest of the Pine Ridge people in the Industrial School. Attorney S. G. Sample, of Campton, acted as chairman at this meeting. Senator B. H. Sewell, and a number of our Wolf County citizens made inspiring addresses, after which Mr. G. L. Garrett, in behalf of the Broadhead Garrett Lumber Company, presented the Board with a deed for fifty acres of land including two cottages; also, made known their offer of presenting the entire tract of land (comprising about 280 acres) if there is five thousand dollars worth of improvement placed upon the fifty acres within eighteen months. Mr. Garrett was a mountain boy and is greatly interested in the work. He thinks Pine Ridge an excellent location for an industrial school.

Surely this generous offer will awaken every Methodist Protestant to the need of the work. There were about seven hundred dollars pledged, at this service, for the school.

We trust that not only the women of our society, but that every woman of our church will realize the importance of having a part in this work and send an offering, let it be large or small; remembering, "The Lord loveth the cheerful giver."

Alice Conway, Cor. Sec.

OUR FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

A Reminder.

Sunday school superintendents will please remember that the two handsomely embroidered silk banners, which were made in Japan, will be awarded again this year. One banner will be awarded to the school giving the largest Children's Day offering, and the other to the school giving the largest offering in proportion to membership. The school securing a banner three years in succesison will own it. Also two large paper fish from Japan, nine feet long, brilliantly painted to represent the carp, will be given outright to the schools giving the second and third largest offerings in proportion to membership—including officers, teachers and scholars. A committee will decide these matters, and their decision will be published in a Bulletin later on.

An Urgent Request.

This first quarter of the Board's fiscal year ends July 31. It is very necessary that all available funds be in hand by that day. I appeal to pastors and superintendents to do their utmost to have the Children's Day offering, and any assessment they may have, forwarded to me at once. To hold either the Children's day offering or the assessment, only adds to the Board's financial embarrassment, for large remittances must be sent to Japan the first part of every month. Brethren, please comply with this reasonable request. Send what money you have for the Board of Foreign Missions to me immediately, and a receipt will be sent to you for presentation with your report to Conference. It is not at all necessary for you to take this money to Conference. The Board needs it now. Please send it on. Give the membership of the school when you send the Children's Day offering.

A Word from Japan.

The Yokohama School of English (Night School) promises to be better than last year. The girls' department in the afternon is steadily increasing, and promises to be an important factor in the evangelistic as well as the educational work. The Bible classes are better attended, each teacher holds one, and all the students are thus reached with the Word. The influence of the school is widening, and its work is recognized throughout the city.

The Nagoya College had an enrollment in May of 316 young men, the highest in its history. This, in some respects, is the largest and most promising work we have in Japan. We have there the opportunity of training, under religious influences and teaching, young men from many cities and towns of that populous section of the Empire. They carry home with them to their homes knowledge of the truth, and thus tend to the extension of the work. For this, among other reasons, the Board decided to make Nagoya the center of our operations, and radiate therefrom with all the force at our command.

The Evangelistic work in that section is flourishing, and the indications are that the largest results will be secured throughout the territory of our Japan Mission Conference this year. I call upon the church here at home to invoke the Divine blessing upon the labors of our Missionaries and their Japanese co-laborers that their hopes may be realized.

That Profitable Investment Again.

Investors have not been numerous of late, despite the returns promised, and the needs of the Japan work. A Virginia minister sends $3.50, and a lady in Indiana takes a $10.00 share. Previously reported $948.00, making a total of $961.50. Who will be the next to invest?

DAVID REPROVED.

Attempts have been made to explain away the severities inflicted on the Ammonites, but it is impossible to explain away a plain historical narrative. It was the manner of victorious warriors in those countries to steel their hearts against all compassion toward captive foes, and David, kind-hearted though he was, did the same. And if it be said that surely his religion, if it were religion of the right kind, ought to have made him more compassionate, we reply that at this period his religion was in a state of collapse. When his religion was in a healthy and active state, it showed itself in the first place by his regard for the honor of God, for whose ark he provided a resting-place, and in whose honor he proposed to build a temple. Love to God was accompanied by love to man, exhibited in his efforts to show kindness to the house of Saul for the sake of Jonathan, and to Hanun for the sake of Nahash. But now the picture is reversed; he falls into a cold state of heart toward God, and in connection with that declension we mark a more than usually severe punishment inflicted on his enemies. Just as the leaves first become yellow and finally drop from the tree in autumn, when the juices that fed them begin to fail, so the kindly actions that mark the better periods of his life first fail, then turn to deeds of cruelty when that Holy Spirit, who is the fountain of all goodness, being resisted and grieved by him, withholds His living power.

In the whole transaction at Rabbah David shows poorly. It is not like him to be roused to an enterprise by an appeal to his love of fame; he might have left Joab to complete the conquest and enjoy the honor which his sword had substantially won. It is not like him to go through the ceremony of being crowned with the crown of the king of Ammon, as if it were a great thing to have so precious a diadem on his head. Above all, it is not like him to show so terrible a spirit in disposing of his prisoners of war. But all this is quite likely to have happened if he had not yet come to repentance for his sin. When a man's conscience is ill at ease, his temper is commonly irritable. Unhappy in his inmost soul, he is in the temper that most easily becomes savage when provoked. No one can imagine that David's conscience was at rest. He must have had that restless feeling which every good man experiences after doing a wrong act, before coming to a clear apprehension of it; he must have been eager to escape from himself, and Joab's request to him to come to Rabbah and end the war must have been very opportune. In the excitement of war he would escape for a time the pursuit of his conscience; but he would be restless and irritable, and disposed to drive out of his way, in the most unceremonious manner, whoever or whatever should cross his path.

We now return with him to Jerusalem. He had added another to his long list of illustrious victories, and he had carried to the capital another vast store of spoil. The public attention would be thoroughly occupied with these brilliant events; and a king entering his capital at the head of his victorious troops, and followed by wagons laden with public treasure, need not fear a harsh construction on his private actions. The fate of Uriah might excite little notice; the affair of Bathsheba would soon blow over. The brilliant victory that had terminated the war seemed at the same time to have extricated the king from a personal scandal. David might flatter himself that all would now be peace and quiet, and that the waters of oblivion would gather over that ugly business of Uriah.

"But the thing that David had done displeased the Lord."

"And the Lord sent Nathan unto David."

Slowly, sadly, silently the prophet bends his steps to the palace. Anxiously and painfully he prepares himself for the most distressing task a prophet of the Lord ever had to go through. He has to convey God's reproof to the king; he has to reprove one from whom, doubtless, he has received many an impulse towards all that is high and holy. Very happily he clothes his message in the eastern garb of parable. He puts his parable in such life like form that the king has no suspicion of its real character. The rich robber that spared his own flocks and herds to feed the traveler, and stole the poor man's ewe lamb, is a real flesh-and-blood criminal to him. And the deed is so dastardly, its heartlessness is so atrocious, that it is not enough to enforce against such a wretch the ordinary law of fourfold restitution; in the exercise of his high prerogative the king pronounces a sentence of death upon the ruffian, and confirms it with the solemnity of an oath "The man that hath done this thing shall surely die." The flash of indignation is yet in his eye, the flush of resentment is still on his brow, when the prophet with calm voice and piercing eye utters the solemn words, "Thou art the man!" Thou, great king of Israel, art the robber, the ruffian, condemned by thine own voice to the death of the worst malefactor! "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I anointed thee king over Israel, and I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul; and I gave thee thy master's house, and thy master's wives unto thy bosom, and gave thee the house of Israel and of Judah; and if that had been too little I would moreover have given thee such and such things. Wherefore hast thou despised the commandments of the Lord to do evil in His sight? Thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword, and hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon."

It is not difficult to fancy the look of the king as the prophet delivered his message—how at first when he said, "Thou art the man," he would gaze at him eagerly and wistfully, like one at a loss to divine his meaning; and then, as the prophet proceeded to apply his parable, how, conscience-stricken, his expression would change to one of horror and agony; how the deeds of the last twelve months would glare in all their infamous baseness upon him, and outraged Justice, with a hundred glittering swords, would seem all impatient to devour him.—Prof. W. G. Blaikie.

NOTES.

—Rev. W. F. Kennett visited his parents in Randleman last week. They have been strong, but are now feeling some of the infirmities of age.

—Rev. Chas. J. Edwards goes to Spray today to attend the district meeting of the Junior Order U. A. M., which lasts for three days.

—Bro. and Sister Norman, of Winston, are planning to go away soon for a visit to relatives.

—Bro. Raper and the Sandy Cross people have organized a good Sunday school at that point. This is a good sign of life and a good means to awaken more life.

—Dr. Little, of the Maryland Conference, is in a Baltimore hospital, suffering from liver trouble. He is one of our most useful ministers, and his recovery is to be hoped for.

—July 22nd Texas will vote on statewide prohibition. Though the thermometer marks 100 and over, the campaign goes on with unabated energy. God grant the temperance forces may win.

—Grady Coble is improving. He has partially recovered the use of his limbs. His people are still thinking of placing him in a hospital, but have not decided what one. We are glad to contradict the report of his death published in the Charlotte Observer.

—Did you pray for rain or even wish for rain? Then don't fail to thank God for the rain that has come. It is good to read of the refreshing showers that have fallen here and there, on the dry and thirsty lands.

—Rev. T. A. Plyler wishes to return thanks to the following brethren who have come to his relief, in addition to the brother referred to last week; namely, Bros. A. O. Lindley, J. F. Dosier, C. E. M. Raper, C. E. McCulloch, and some unknown friends in Burlington and Greensboro. His circumstances prepare him to appreciate keenly their brotherly kindness. Mrs. Plyler seems to be on the way to recovery, being able to sit up part of the time.

"A good deed is never lost; he who sows courtesy reaps friendship; and he who plants kindness gathers love; pleasure bestowed upon a grateful mind was never sterile, but generally gratitude begets reward."

GRACE CHURCH, GREENSBORO.

Quarterly Conference (the second) was held on Tuesday night. The reports of pastor, S. S. superintendent, and C. E. president were all encouraging. The pastor reported that over thirty had been received into church this conference year. The Sunday school has had new interest awakened by introducing a system of marking and rewarding faithful attendance. Cards are handed to all who come before the hour set for opening. These are collected by the teachers, and the secretary reports the percentage of each class present on time. A special banner is awarded to the class having the largest percentage of its number present on time. An honor roll is also kept, and this stimulates the young people to greater faithfulness. One thing the superintendent would like to call to the attention of teachers; when any of them see that they cannot be present, they should let him know in advance that he may provide a substitute. Mr. Ferguson, the C. E. president, reported a weekly attendance at the Monday night prayer meeting of about twenty-five, and a good interest in the meetings.

Only one discouraging report was made, (and that might not be discouraging if all the facts were known); I refer to the report that payment on the church debt is being made slowly. It should also be known that we are running a little behind in current expenses, not paying the pastor and other expenses with perfect promptness. The financial secretary would like the help of every member of the church in remedying this state of affairs.

MT. PLEASANT, LIBERTY CIRCUIT.

Both sermon and attendance were good on last Sunday. We are looking for great things during the special meeting here, with such efficient help as the pastor has secured, Rev. Mr. Bethea.

The Green township Sunday School Association will hold its annual meeting here on the fifth Sunday in July.

There were 93 present in S. S. last Sunday, contributing 82 cents. On the same Sunday last year there were 121 present, contributing $1.25.

On last Sunday morning the child of Mr. and Mrs. Emsily Fogleman was buried here. Rev. Fogleman conducted the funeral services. On the afternoon of the same day the wife of Mr. Robert Garrett was laid to rest. Rev. G. L. Curry of Graham conducted the services.

The reporter was not present at either of those funerals—the reason for only a brief mention.

Uncle Alson Amick continues to suffer very severely with rheumatic pains. In spite of his misery he is patient and bears it all without undue murmuring or complaining.

Bethany, Randleman Circuit.

Our Sunday school is progressing nicely. The average attendance is about 95.

Our special meeting will commence the second Sunday in August. We trust it will be one that will always be remembered as being the best ever held at Bethany. There will be children's day services here next Sunday, 23rd, beginning at 10:30. We hope to have a large congregation and a good collection.

Children's Day service was held last Sunday. It was mostly a children's affair, too. They did very well, considering their age and practice. The choir rendered good music. The program prepared by Dr. Klein was used in part. Collection $7.50, which was very good for our church. During the exercise we had a nice rain. The drouth seems to be broken up, but our crops are damaged by the drouth. Our Sunday school has suspended for a while, on account of special meetings. Our special meeting is to begin first Sunday in August. We expect Rev. W. M. Pike with us. Hope to have a good meeting.

A. N. Roberson, Supt.

Rehoboth, Granville Circuit.

The community around Rehoboth was refreshed with "showers of blessing" both materially and spiritually the past week. Our meeting began the second Sunday, but truly a revival had been kindling in our hearts for some time, as we would think and pray over our own needs and the needs of each other individually, especially the unsaved. Much interest was shown from the beginning, even on Sunday afternoon when the heat was intense the attendance was good and the service uplifting. It seems that Mr. Bethea knows how to go about having a revival; at the beginning he asked the young people not to take the week for a time of merriment, in the way of visiting and sitting up late at night, thereby putting extra work upon their parents. Mr. Gerringer from Halifax came Monday to help us. We decided after hearing his first sermon, on the subject of prayer, that he is a thoroughly consecrated young man and realizes the value of a soul. Mr. Gerringer is earnest and enthusiastic in his work. Rehoboth would be glad to be favored with another visit from him. It was decided at the beginning of the meeting that we weren't going to leave out our pastor entirely, so he preached in the afternoon services and led the singing, which was good. He had just gotten a hundred new books for revival work. We've never seen a better collection than these "Familiar Songs of the Gospel." Some one remarked that there were more personal workers than ever before at Rehoboth. We thank Mrs. Bethea for her presence and help all the week, especially did we appreciate her assistance at the organ. There were seven conversions and several reclamations. Three accessions to the church, and there will probably be two more.

Mr. Mundy and family, who moved away from our midst, came a distance of eight miles every day and brought dinner, thereby showing their fidelity to the church. We will be glad to have them back with us next year.

Among the visitors at the meeting were Mrs. L. C. Edwards, Miss Josie Reavis and Master Edison Hicks. We were sorry that Miss Jewel Floyd had to be away on account of having accepted a position as teacher in a summer school at Spring Hope.

Our Ladies' Aid Society hopes to get a half dozen chairs for the parsonage by October 1st.

We hope to have a Sunday school picnic soon.

Hattie Harris.

Granville.

Our meeting at Rehoboth closed last Thursday. We had a glorious meeting. Bro. Gerringer did half the preaching. He did good work. It was appreciated by both pastor and people. People were not ashamed to testify for Christ non to shout his praises. Many praised God aloud. It was what we had prayed for—an old-fashioned revival. We had been suffering for rain, but when the people got ready for divine showers the rain came in abundance also. We had a praise service for that.

We thank the people for laying aside their work and coming out and making the meeting a success. There were twelve or fifteen conversions and reclamations. Three joined the church, one other to join. We thank God for the victory and take courage for another battle.

Meeting commenced at Antioch yesterday. Two services. Largest crowd some said that had been there in twenty years. The children held forth in the afternoon. Good service. They acquitted themselves well. A good collection. Praise to those who trained the children so well. The singing was extra good. We are expecting Bro. Moton today. We are praying for and expecting a revival here also. Many things to encourage as we battle against sin. Pray for us that the word of the Lord may have free course.

Sincerely,

N. G. Bethea.

Asheville.

Miss Mary Young, of Henderson, Miss Mabel Williams of Denton, Rev. Homer Casto of Efland, and Rev. W. A. Lamar of S. C. were present at our services last Sunday. Brother Casto is rapidly improving. Brother Lamar is resting out. Miss Mabel Williams is taking a much-needed vacation. She told our people about our orphanage last Sunday and receivd an offering of $31.00. Brother J. M. Millikan and family worshiped with us also.

Brother Lamar preached a very helpful sermon for us Sunday night. 103 in Main S. S., 37 at Woodfin Hill, 31 at Woolsey Hall.

Our pastor met a good congregation at this place Sunday A. M. He seemed to be laden with a message that we so much needed, trying to impress upon us the importance of living a Christian life, so that we could be distinguished from the world. It was accompanied with the Spirit, and it searched the hearts of the hearers.

Our Sunday school is small in number, yet there are a few who are faithful. Let us not feel discouraged, for God has promised where two or three are gathered together in His name, there will He be in the midst of them.

Our special meeting will embrace the third Sunday in September. Rev. J. E. Pritchard will be the pulpit help. He will not come among us as a stranger, and we know he has something good in store for us, and we want to ask all Christians to pray that we may have an outpouring of the Holy Spirit during our revival, and that we may not have one unconverted soul in our neighborhood.

There has been much sorrow in our neighborhood recently. May these sad afflictions be the means of each one of us living nearer to God.

We were glad to have Miss Finch, of Union Chapel, worship with us Sunday, also Mr. Geo. Rose and Miss Church of Henderson.

Miss Agnes Buchan has been quite sick with fever, but is now improving.

Mr. C. E. Satterwhite spent Sunday at home.

Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Ellis, of Bearpond, spent Sunday with their parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Satterwhite.

Our pastor and wife spent several days at Va. Beach a few weeks ago. They report a good time.

Since the refreshing showers the farmers are looking more like themselves.

S. S. report last Sunday as follows: total enrollment 88; total present 60; total collections $.41, and four new scholars. Our school is very encouraging.

Our picnic is to be July 23. A great time expected by all. Since the wonderful rains we feel more like having a picnic.

Our special meeting is to begin fifth Sunday in this month, services at 11 A. M. and 8:30 P. M. on Sunday, and two services each day thereafter until the close. No special help has been secured, but we feel that Bro. Bethea is sufficient with the help of the members.

Bethesda, Yadkin College Circuit.

Our pastor, Bro. Powell, filled his appointment at Bethesda the second Sunday, giving us an inspiring sermon.

The Sunday school is getting along all right. The special meeting begins the second Sunday in August. Children's Day services in the morning and preaching in the evening. Rev. and Mrs. Dixon, of High Point, are expected to help our pastor in the meeting.

The third quarterly conference will meet at Friendship Church Tuesday, Aug. 1. All of the official members are expected to be present.

The Sunday School Convention for Yadkin College Circuit will convene at Shiloh the 26th and 27th of August, 1911.

Mr. Ernest Mickey and sister, Miss Maggie, are visiting at Bro. Powell's this week. Also Miss Lula Tussy from St. Louis, Mo., is visiting Bro. Alex Evans and other relatives and friends in this county.

Bro. Fred Leonard is improving very slowly; we hope he will soon be well.

Mt. Zion Church.

Rev. A. L. Hunter filled his regular appointment here Sunday, preaching a good and uplifting sermon to a large congregation. He was with us in Sunday school. We hope to have him with us again soon. Our Sunday school is very good. We have about eighty on roll.

Our special meeting will embrace the third Sunday in August. Bro. Pritchard will be the pulpit help. We hope to have a good one. Pray for us that great good may be accomplished in this meeting. May the Lord's blessings rest upon the church and pupils, and may they follow in His steps. We hope for a good attendance. We want old and young to come and take some part in the work.

Rehoboth, Granville Circuit.

Last Thursday closed our special meeting at Rehoboth. Good results were visible in a revival of the church and seven conversions. Three accessions Thursday and more to join later. The thought occurs to us, what a meeting we could have had if we all had done our whole duty in work and prayer. Surely we would have had a more glorious revival. Bro. Gerringer was our pulpit help, doing most of the preaching. Bro. Bethea helped greatly in the singing. His wife was with him, helping him and us in every possible way.

Well, we know that we had three or four more preachers as good as ours, but now we would like to add Bro. Gerringer's name to the list. For he preached to us some of the most powerful, soul-searching sermons we ever listened to, sermons that showed deep thought and a knowledge of God, combined with great earnestness and power. It seemed that he was so very loath to leave any one unsaved at the close of the meeting. Surely this should have been a warning to them. Our prayers and best wishes follow Bro. Gerringer wherever he goes.

Our people are feeling greatly refreshed and encouraged over the blessed showers of rain we have had in the last week. Crops are looking better, water is plentiful, and we are thankful. Praise God from whom all blessings flow.

We are having a good Sunday school this summer, with Mr. W. W. Tise as our superintendent. We all like him very much. We held our Children's Day exercise the second Sunday in July. There was a large crowd present. The children all rendered their pieces well. The collection amounted to $8. We enjoyed a short talk from Bro. Plyler, Bro. York, and also Prof. Cheek from Wallburg.

We all like our pastor, Bro. Plyler, and are sorry to note that Mrs. Plyler is very sick. Hope she will soon be well again.

After an all-day service at Friendship the writer took a flying trip to Shelby on third Sunday night. We were met by a good congregation, who listened to the word with unusual interest. I never saw a congregation more attentive to the word. They are moving forward here. I found a new organ in place, which added much to the choir. By enquiring I found that under the superintendency of Bro. J. F. Carter the Sunday school was in a flourishing condition. I was informed that Lincolnton church is also completed and painted. The work is prospering in Bro. Braswell's hands.

Our pastor filled his regular appointment Sunday, preaching a good sermon, his text being Malachai 3:8, Will a man rob God? He also taught the S. S. class for us; hope to have him teach for us every third Sunday.

Our special meeting begins here the fifth Sunday in this month, Rev. A. L. Hunter to help. We hope to have a good meeting.

Denton Mission.

We held our quarterly conference on Saturday before the second Sunday in May. The usual business was transacted in a spirit of love and harmony. Some were made to praise the Lord aloud in the devotional service. We had preaching at 11 A. M., and dinner was served on the ground, and the quarterly conference was held in the afternoon. Bros. C. H. Surratt and W. A. Loflin were named for delegate to the Annual Conference. We are moving on nicely with our work. Our good people and kind friends deserve much praise for the sacrifice they have made for the Orphan's Home and the church. They have done well.

We have been honored with a visit of some of our most worthy laymen and ministers. They have visited Denton in the interest of the Orphan's Home and the School. We thank each one of them for the interest that they have manifested in the work here, and we hope they will come again, and we hope others will visit us soon.

Our third quarterly conference will be held at Denton on Saturday before the first Sunady in September. We hope to have a full turn-out then with good reports. We have begun work on the church at Denton. It will be a nice church when it is finished. Will all those who have promised any amount on the church at Denton please send it as soon as it is convenient, as we need it at once; and if any one that has not subscribed anything wants to help build a nice church right near the Orphan's Home for the little orphan children to attend, please send it to me or Bro. A. A. Hill at Denton, N. C., and we will appreciate it. And you know these dear little children will appreciate having a good church to worship our Father in. This is a chance to show our loving faith by our works.

Bro. Williams was with us again Sunday, July 15, and preached an uplifting sermon from Acts 12:5,6. Our Children's Day service was held the fourth Sunday night in June. The collection amounted to $7.08.

The protracted meeting will begin here the third Sunday in August with Rev. Mr. Austin, one of our former pastors, for pulpit help.

The proceeds from our lawn party amounted to $22.87.

It was our privilege to have Prof. T. C. Amick with us Sunday. He preached a good, strong, helpful sermon. He made a strong appeal to the young people to better prepare themselves for their life's work, whatever it may be. We are glad he talked to the young people so much, and we hope it will encourage them in whatever is their position in life. We need educated men and women.

It has been our pleasure to have several visiting preachers with us this summer. We appreciate their kindness and services and hope to have each one of them with us again. They all have preached excellent sermons, and it was a treat to us. We were proud to have them.

We hope to have our editor with us some time; we have spoken of him several times. Not many of our members have met him.

We are having a splendid Sunday school.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

Quite an increase was to be noticed in the Graham congregation on last Sunday morning. At night, when Children's Day service was observed, we found it impossible to accommodate the people. The church was soon filled to its utmost capacity, crowds left because they could not even get standing room, while numbers remained on the outside, resorting to the doors and windows endeavoring to see and hear. The good attention of every body and the many compliments expressed indicate that the people were well pleased with the exercise. The collection was $15.50.

Sunday school attendance was 104 at Graham and 92 at Haw River.

On Sunday, July 30, the Haw River church will be dedicated. Dr. W. E. Swain will conduct the service. At 3:30 P. M. the same day Dr. Swain will preach at Graham.

Thomasville.

On last Sunday we had children's day service in the 1st M. P. Church, which was a success from start to finish. Bro. Suits and Mrs. Boyles instructed the children. They did credit to their instructors. It was inspiring to hear the little children say their speeches; it showed the work of good instruction, and all present were highly elated.

Little Beulah Harris' piece was The Heavenly Railroad, and it brought tears to many eyes. Success to you, Beulah, and may you ever be a bright and shining light to our church. After children's services Bro. J. M. Morris spoke to the children on the subject of how to become useful men and women. His talk was very interesting and inspiring to all present.

Our Sunday school is in fine condition, and I trust will do great good.

Denton Charge.

Our children's day was postponed to some future date on account of the sickness among our children. Rev. G. L. Reynolds preached us an excellent sermon yesterday; also at night. The S. S. is progressing nicely, though a little drop-off on account of our sister churches using the same hour that we do. Still we number above sixty on an average, with 158 on roll.

Our church building is moving forward nicely. We expect holding the corner-stone service tomorrow. It is estimated that it will cost us about three thousand dollars.

Master Paul Hamilton is slowly recovering from a six weeks' hitch of typhoid fever. An inmate of Orphan's Home, Arthur Brittain, is pronounced by Dr. Austin to have typhoid fever also.

ANTIOCH, MECKLENBURG CIRCUIT.

We had a good school yesterday with average attendance and every one with a glad heart because of the recent rains. Our suprintendent was full to overflowing. He gave us a nice talk after the classes were through. For the last quarter our school paid for all the literature and had a little sum left in the treasury, for which we are very thankful.

With best wishes to The Herald and all good works,

NORTH CAROLINA COTTAGE.

A Report.

We are glad to report that the North Carolina Cottage is now in process of erection on the campus of the Westminster Theological Seminary. It is "a thing of beauty," and will prove to be a "joy forever"—at least so long as brick and mortar and lumber stand the test of time. To meet the payments of the workmen every week and to pay for materials we were compelled to borrow $500 because many of the subscriptions which were due had not been paid. If these delinquents can not meet their obligations in the very near future we shall be compelled to borrow about $1000 more. This leads us to make

A Request.

It is a double-barreled request aimed at two classes of subscribers. First, those whose subscription is already due. We appeal to them, if they can do so without detriment to their other obligations, to forward their subscriptions on or before Aug. 15th. The second class of subscribers are those whose pledges are not due until next Conference. Of course we have no right to expect these to pay before their subscriptions are due; nevertheless, since they are now familiar with the local situation here, we can use their money before it is due should they be disposed to forward it.

A Word of Thanks.

This is a big word and I feel like writing it in capitals and underscoring every letter. I wish to assure the North Carolinians that in all my money raising I never found more willing or liberal contributors than those who responded to my appeal for the erection of the North Carolina Cottage. I shall try to show my appreciation by building a house of which they will be proud, and by seeing to the comfort of their fellow citizen who will occupy it—Dr. C. E. Forlines.

The latchstring will always be on the outside of the door for every North Carolinian.

Sincerely,
H. L. Elderdice.

RIGGAN.

Mrs. Eveline Lyles Riggan was born 1844, died at Bolin, N. C., June 17, 1911. She was the daughter of Robbin and Sallie Lyles and was reared in the Aurelian Springs community, Halifax Co. In May, 1883 she was married to Mr. Sam Riggan and lived happily with him until her death. This union was blessed with eight children, all of whom are living but one. Sister Riggan became a Christian in early life and united with the Methodist Protestant Church of which she remained a consistent member as long as she lived. During her illness, which lasted for five years, she was always cheerful and patient, and just before her death she praised God and assured her family and friends that she was not afraid to die. She was a faithful wife and a devoted mother, and her death has no doubt made a vacancy in the home that can never be filled. We commend the bereaved family to mother's God who is able to make all grace abound toward them. May they so live as to see her again in all the glory of her inheritance, which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away.

Turner.

Herbert Oscar Turner, son of Rodman and grandson of Rev. J. H. Turner, died in the hospital at Portsmouth, Va., July 4th, and was brought to and buried at Rose Hill M. P. Church, July 5th. A large congregation attended the burial service. We have never witnessed a more solemn occasion than when the body of this noble young man was laid to rest in the presence of weeping relatives and friends to await the resurrection of the good. We could but contrast between this sorrowing and sadness and the joy and gladness that shall be when our blessed Lord shall come to raise the bodies of his loved ones, and change in the twinkling of an eye those living when we shall all ever be with the Lord. O blessed thought, so full of comfort. May the writer and every reader share in the blessedness forever. Bro. Turner was 23 years old, and had been a consistent member of Rose Hill church for eight years.

He leaves a host of friends, for all who knew him loved him and speak of his noble life, which ended so soon in the body, but his soul lives on. For the good there is no death. The stars go down to rise on that fairer shore, and bright in Heaven's jeweled crown they shine forever more.

W. P. Martin, Pastor.

I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people.—Hebrews 8:10.

Let us apply this ancient declaration to our time and nation. Every American citizen should know and feel that this nation was begun and established under God's directing care. He has been unto us a God, and He desires that we should be unto Him a people. The history of this land is written testimony to God's wisdom and providence. He kept this land hidden until his own good time, until the nations had come to a point where a new era was dawning on mankind; until He had prepared Himself a people who would lay its foundations in God-fearing freedom. Surely God intended that this last continent upon the earth to be opened to civilized man should be the cradle of the highest manhood which the world has known. Here He has made provision for the highest national development, and given us every blessing which nature can bestow. He has been our God, and surely He intended that we should be His people. Do we recognize that God places upon us the responsibility of carrying to greater perfection that which has been begun? Truly in the past the Lord has been our God. Shall we not answer, We will be to Him a people?

A. M. Hamilton.

—There were, so Governor Kitchen said, twenty-five men who wanted the position of corporation commissioner recently made vacant by the death of Commissioner Henry Clay Brown. There are certainly a plenty of patriots left yet who are ready and willing to serve their State in a public capacity. How men love office is a caution.

OBITUARY.

A Tribute to the Life of James P. Satterwhite.

I have often seen ships in harbor drifting round and round the anchor when all preparations for the voyage had been made; but they were waiting for the command to sail. It was in the sixty-fourth year of his life that Bro. J. P. Satterwhite found himself waiting for the comamnd to cut loose the anchor that held him to earthly ties, and sail to the homeland shore, where happy hearts waited to greet him and where his Savior waited to crown the head of a faithful servant and say, Enter thou into the joys of thy Lord."

As the time for his departure drew near he never seemed disturbed or excited, but looked upon death as nothing to be dreaded by those who are prepared. Hour by hour his physical frame weakened and the light of his earthly life burned low until it flickered and flickered and went out. While at the same instant no doubt on that other shore a new light sprang up, and if our eyes were not veiled by the mystical gloom that hides from us the glories of eternity, we could see the everlasting gates and doors lifted up and a child of God in the form of Bro. Satterwhite walking victorious over sin and death through the gates into the eternal city of God.

He will be missed in the home by the wife to whom he was so faithful, and who by association knew his inner life better than all others could. She will miss that protective care that none other than a good husband can give, and the noble, honest, faithful life he lived kindled in her bosom a love and trust that the things present nor the things to come cannot erase.

His children will miss that care of a loving and anxious father—one who spent hours on his knees in their behalf, pleading with God for the salvation of his dear boy and girls. They will miss the stern but loving reprimand and good advice of the noble man, their father. Shall it all be forgotten, boys and girls? Shall you depart from it? In heaven's name say no!

The neighbors will miss an honest man, the needy will miss a friend that "loveth at all times." The church will miss those shoulders that never shirked the responsibility that was placed on them, and that seat in the front pew will never find a more willing hearer and doer of the Word.

His pastor feels that one of his best friends is gone, and it makes his heart ache to be deprived of the association of that big-hearted Christian man, who ever stood ready to aid his pastor in defending the right.

We thank God for having associated with such a life, and being reconciled to his will say with the poet:

Sweet is the scene when virtue dies!
When sinks a righteous soul to rest,
How mildly beam the closing eyes,
How gently heaves the expiring breast!
So fades a summer's cloud away,
So sinks the gale when storms are o'er,
So gently shuts the eye of day,
So dies a wave along the shore.

His pastor,
R. C. Stubbins.

Mrs. Addie L. Finch.

We rarely appreciate the rose and the lily until the summer is over and they have faded away. But this was not so in the life of Mrs. Finch, for her sweet disposition and rare gems of character made a lasting imprint on those who well knew her while yet she was living.

Her parents can never forget those trotting feet and that childish voice in infancy, nor the sweet obedience she sustained in youth and how they looked forward to see a successful future for her. Now they may feel crushed, feeling that by some mysterious cause her future was cut off. No, her life was not a failure, for Addie lived more in a few short years that some who live their three score and ten. Our lives are not counted by our number of days, but by the good we accomplish.

The husband who mourns her loss, and whose heart will bear a scar, feels now the power of her influence helping him to do the right. He can never forget that dear one who cherished him in hours of discouragement and despondency, and may the tie of love that bound them here be unbroken in eternity.

Darling little Bettie will miss her mother, though loving hands will do all in their power to make her happy. But who can fill a mother's place? The Bible says "they are all ministering spirits," and we believe mother will closely watch and lead little Bettie safely home.

'Twas a young life ended at noon day,
When the harvest had not yet been,
But Addie responded so sweetly,
And the angels ushered her in.

IN MEMORY OF W. J. PAGE.

The subject of this sketch was born in Randolph County June 2, 1847, and went to the other world last June at the age of a little more than sixty-four, having spent most of his life in the county of his birth. As a lad he served as page in the Legislature before the Civil War. He enlisted as a sixteen year old in the Confederate army, but instead of active service as a soldier he served as chief door-keeper of the State Senate. After the war he was register of deeds in Randolph County for two terms.

In recent years prior to his failing health a year or so ago he was local manager of the store and plant of the Asheboro Lumber Company at Seagrove and Hemp. As a public official and business man he was systematic, accurate, and obliging; popular with the public and with those whose interests he handled. He was industrious but never too busy to be courteous and attentive to any stranger or friend who chanced to be about him. In this he excelled. It was innate; he did it intuitively.

His interest in and attentiveness to business was equalled by his interest in and attentiveness to church; when the church hour came during business hours he endeavored to so plan his business that he might attend church. When from failing health he was too feeble to attend church, he made it his part to endeavor to induce others to attend.

His hospitality was hearty without ado. He seemed never so happy as when he was helping somebody somewhere in some way. His first thought was of others, and many a time it seemed his only thought. Especially was he the children's friend. They called him "Uncle Billie" and all of them who knew him reckoned him as their friend and they were not mistaken—children usually are not. He was a friend of the poor and of charitable and religious institutions. And all these, as did the children, knew it.

But that trait which appealed most strongly to the writer was his courage. Not mere courage which enables one to stand rather than run away from danger; but that higher order of courage that enables one to make a brave fight to a worthy end when the odds are against him. His courage enabled him to maintain two such efforts. The first was his hopeful, patient effort to live when poor health indicated and physicians said it was no use trying. The other was like unto it but greater and nobler, namely, his painstaking, persistent, unfailing, unwavering, manly effort to live right.

His body was laid to rest in the cemetery in Asheboro, to which town he and his wife had moved only a few months ago.

MARTIN LUTHER.

We are upon the threshold of the four-hundredth anniversary of the Reformation History. The few years preceding the posting of the 95 theses were decisive years in Luther's religious development and experience generally; so that this period belongs in the Reformation History quite as much as the eventful days following the publication of the theses. Already ambitious literati and enterprising publishers here and abroad are beginning to exploit, or perhaps to anticipate, a rising tide of interest in the reformer; and we shall doubtless witness a large output of books, monographs, magazine articles, etc., before the next ten years pass away. The possible enrichment of Luther literature from a revival of interest in his work is altogether to be welcomed. We need good books in English very much. It might be supposed that the market is already surfeited; in point of fact there are very scant resources available in English for a thorough study of the great reformer's work.

As a recognition of present and prospective press activity, and also as a means of awakening interest, we may select out of several publications the recent book, "The Life and Letters of Martin Luther," by Preserved Smith, for brief comment.

Judged as a whole, the book is a very excellent piece of work. It is designed as a life of Luther, and not as a complete history of the Reformation, not even that part of it spanned by Luther's lifetime (p.214). Following this plan, the author has given us a series of monographs, many of them most excellent, on the leading topics in Luther's life and letters. Into these essays a great deal of valuable information has been condensed. We also have a good survey of his life as a whole in its endless complications with the whole history of the time. In our judgment the chief merit of the book lies in the marked success with which a thoroughly sympathetic view of Luther is combined with strictest impartiality in portraying him as he was. Protestants have idealized him; Catholics have demonized him. Our author, in keeping with the highest traditions of modern historical scholarship, sees in him a true child of our race, a Titan to be sure, but of that race which is slowly toiling its way upward out of darkness into light. At the same time the ideal aims and interests of the mind are not sacrificed in showing how Luther's faults fit into the social framework of his life, how common they were to his age. In explaining Luther by the standards and limitations of the times, he does not exempt him from the higher moral judgment which the reformer's own work did so much to establish in Christendom.

The brevity of this article forbids an extensive appreciation of the book referred to, inviting as such comment would be. Suffice it to say that the book is a real contribution, and altogether the most valuable work available in English, on the life of Luther. In two or three particulars the work is open to criticism. In the first place, the book has altogether too much "padding" in it. The extensive excerpts from Luther's writings are always interesting and quite instructive, as indeed a great deal more of what Luther wrote is always interesting and instructive; but to use up at least one third of a large and very extensive book with verbal translations, and that, too, of materials already in large part accessible, sins grievously against the highest standards of book-making.

Again, the 37 essays which make up the volume are too loosely connected. The materials are not organized as they should be, nor grouped in luminous outline. If Luther's life as a whole, or if any part of it, has any true unity, that fact ought to be brought out more clearly, and the fragmentary views of his life arranged accordingly. Authors might not agree on the plan to be adopted, but there should at least be some plan whereby the author's own conception of Luther's work—its historical significance—would shine through the details and give unity to the whole treatment.

With regard to periods, Luther's life and writings submit themselves naturally to the following arrangement: Period I. From his birth, Nov. 10, 1483, to his appointment as instructor in the University of Wittenberg, probably in the fall of 1508. Period 2. From his call to Wittenburg to his return from the Wartburg—from the latter part of 1508 to March 6, 1522. Period 3. From the return to Wittenburg until his death at Eisleben, March 6, 1522, to Feb. 18, 1564.

Whatver interest attaches to Luther's early life, it becomes of historical significance with his advent at Wittenburg. Moreover, although a good deal has been said very little is really known about the first twenty-five years of his life; and much that is known is purely incidental in character. If the really significant facts about that early period were known, most that now stands in the books would appear irrelevant. We should also see more clearly how far back the springs of Luther's moral and intellectual being lay in the history of the Middle Ages. Luther was far less the antithesis, far more the child, of the Middle Ages than has commonly been supposed. Luther's historical significance must, therefore, be apprehended practically on the basis of his work in Periods 2 and 3.

The second period of Luther's career, in which, according to Professor Harnack, he appears at his best, may be summarily described as the forging out and proclamation to Germany, and indirectly to all Europe, of his new understanding of the Gospel, with its radical practical consequences for the church, for the state, for the entire social and individual life of his contemporaries. There is very little, if anything, which does not relate organically to this conception. In this period, beginning with the study of Scripture in the original tongues, and ending with the translation of the Scriptures into his native German, Luther's work in thought and deed is cast in the prophetic mold, and he appears at his greatest and best.

The third period was the period of organization in the midst of the struggle for existence. Luther came back from the Wartburg to conserve the fruits of his work, to save it from the perils of fanaticism within, even more than from the dangers of Romanism without. He took direct control and began to provide the Reformation churches with the necessary means of self-preservation. It is probable that some of Luther's problems in the years 1522—1546 would have defied the sagacity and wisdom of the ablest statesmen and organizers, even a Hildebrand, a Richelieu, a Wesley. But Luther, while great in idea and in his proclamation of the Gospel, great in personal courage and steadfast conviction, was singularly wanting in the capacity to organize the results of his own prophetic work His conduct aptly illustrates the sentiment of Tell in Schiller's drama: "The giant is mightiest alone." The enormous difficulties, however, which the strong man met in his way, his own lack of genius for organization, combined with the gradual declension of his powers of body and mind, due more to ill health than old age, resulted in far less brilliant and successful achievement in shaping the oak than had been achieved in planting the acorn.

The author's titles for the chapters are also not always well chosen. They do not sufficiently discriminate the subject matter of each chapter. The title of chapter 30, "At Work," would fit almost any other chapter equally well; chapter 16, called "Private Life," is largely taken up with Luther's public work at the University, and in laying the foundations of German education; while the epilogue leaves upon the mind the impression that a foreign element has been added after the biography was done. Although the scholarship is of a high order, there is an occasional slip. The footnote on page 23 states that Denifle knew Luther's Commentary on Romans "in some notes taken by students now in the Vatican archives;" whereas the copy in the Vatican actually used by Denifle was not a student's note book at all, but a copy, "ex-autographo descriptus" (translated from the original), and made for Ulrich Fugger, the J. Pierpont Morgan of the sixteenth century. The Vatican copy is, in fact, a magnificent transcript, the text of the Romans being in capital letters, and the rest of it, made by three scholars, was afterwards diligently compared with the original and corrected throughout. It is really a very excellent edition.

The author's distinction between Luther the character and Luther the theologian is, in our judgment, a barren one. The distinction as commonly drawn is quite artificial, and in Luther's case altogether so. No man ever fused, or, if we choose, confused theology and religion so completely as did he. They were one in his mind and experience. It was largely because so much of traditional theology had lost its practical influence upon him that he rejected it. We think Harnack right in saying that the greatest thing about Luther's character was his theology. It was in the knowledge of God, won from the Gospel, that Luther was greatest. And for this reason we think his biography should not contain the picture of so many foot-hills that the reader can scarcely see this mountain. If Luther is a living issue about which earnest men should still take thought, it must be in his answer to the question: What is Christianity? In our judgment interest in that question should always dominate his biography.—Prof. Geo. C. Cell, Ph.D., in Zion's Herald.

HIS GEOGRAPHY.

Said little Ned, "The man who wrote
  This big geography
Has surely made a big mistake
  To leave out little me.

"Why, only think, as I now stand
  All toward my left is west;
In front of me is north, and back
  Is south, as you have guessed.

"All on my right is east, and so
  'Tis very plain to see
That north and east and west and south
  Begin right here with me.

"So I must write and ask to have
  My picture pasted in,
That other boys and girls may learn
  Where all these things begin."

CUPS OF WATER.

"I think it is a very little thing to do," Fanny Clare said, as she shook out her ruffles and buttoned her kid gloves. "Just to think! Nothing but a cup of water! I would give that much to anybody."

"It wasn't so very easy," Miss Holden said. "In that warm country, where water was so scarce, it involved some sacrifice. But, Fanny, do you remember the 'because'? 'Whosoever shall give the cup of water, - - - because ye belong to Christ.'"

"O well," Fanny said, "I don't see that that made any difference."

"Do move along! How you do jam up against one!" This remark was made by Fanny Clare, not to Miss Holden, but to a little girl who sat next to her in a faded blue calico dress and broken, sunburned straw hat, trimmed in faded blue ribbons. Miss Holden apparently took no notice; and while she questioned some others in the class, Fanny Clare whispered to Laura Goodwin, who sat on the other side: "What a little fright that girl is! Should you think she would like to be in a class with us?"

Presently Miss Holden said: "I hope and trust that I belong to Christ. Are there any others who think so?" And Ruth Peckham said softly: "I think I belong."

"I am so glad," said Miss Holden; then she went back to another part of the lesson. "Laura, why do you suppose the disciples did not answer Jesus when he asked them what they had been talking about?"

"I suspect they were ashamed of it," said Laura.

"I think they were," Miss Holden said.

Detaining Fanny a moment after class, she asked: "Did you find the cup of water easy to give?"

"Ma'am?" said Fanny in bewilderment.

"Why, you had a little one who 'belonged' to Christ right beside you! Did you fill a cup with kindness for her?"

Fanny bulshed to the tips of her little ears, but, like the abashed disciples, she "held her peace."—Herald and Presbyter.

SOME CHINESE SUPERSTITIONS.

This morning, on looking out of my window into my neighbor's yard, I saw over the doors little willow switches, with just the merest suspicion of tender green leaves, sticking in the thatched roof or in the door frame; and upon inquiry I was told that they were put there to prevent the inmates from becoming "yellow dogs" after death. It is on this day, too, that the graves have to be rounded up and an offering made to the deceased ancestors. The Chinese propensity to deceive is even carried to the grave, because it is a rare thing that one sees a bowl of food on the grave for the spirits of the departed to partake of. Instead, on the top of the mound will be seen a disk of sod about two inches thick, put there to make the spirits think it is food placed before them by some dutiful son or daughter.

There is a pretty little story being circulated here accounting for our feeding the children of the famine sufferers. And, by the way, it is the first report I have heard which attributes to the foreigners any good motive for what they do to help these people. The story is this: On a lot Mr. Grier bought, and which as yet has no gate, there is a vacant house in which some of the famine sufferers have sometimes spent the night. At one time a beautiful large white bird, such as was never seen around here before, came and lighted on the roof of this house; and it was recognized as a sign that inside the house were a mother and her baby girl, and that this baby in her mother's arms was destined in future years to be the wife of the Emperor of China. The foreigners, they say, recognized the sign, but did not know which baby it was; and fearing that the baby might starve to death and China be bereft of an Empress, they determined to open up a soup kitchen and feed all the children who came. Hence the thousand or more hungry, dirty, ragged children who are daily receiving their bowlfuls of hot food in this unused property. Mr. Grier has taken some pictures of these children, and it is said that when he is taking them and sending them off in the hope that some one may in some way know which child it is.

It is a pity not to let this story stand for our reason for feeding these little ones. The beginning of it all was that many children were brought to the hospital to be treated, and it was found that it was not medicine that would cure, but that the trouble was lack of food. So this Mr. Grier began to give a few, and the number gradually increased.

The famine is worse than that four years ago. We have seen more starved people, have had more to die on the streets, and have come in contact with more suffering; and the present prospect is that this one may not end with the time of harvest, as that did. The winter has been a severe one, and now we are having a season of rain, which, it is feared, will ruin the wheat crop; and one shudders to think what another failure to gather a wheat crop means to this country.

We are thankful that the plague, which raged to the north of us with such fury, has not reached here; and as it has abated there, we are encouraged to believe we may be spared that horror. To be on the safe side, in mixing with the famine refugees, we were given the plague serum, and that made us all so uncomfortable and miserable that we trembled when we thought of the real thing reaching our borders.—Mrs. Lettie Taylor Grafton, in Christian Observer.

THE GIRL WHO INTERRUPTS.

Tell a girl it is bad form to interrupt, and she will say: "Who doesn't know that?"

Unfortunately knowledge and practice are not one, and girls are inclined to this habit, whether they realize it or not.

A visitor in a family of young people began a story three times, then gave up in despair. After lunch her hostess suddenly remembered that she had not heard the end of the tale, and asked why it had not been finished.

The friend, irritated to the plain-spoken point, replied: "Because you have never taught your children that it is ill-bred to interrupt."

In that case, as in many others, it was less a lack of training than a lack of interest. The young people were self-centered and impatient of all but their own special topics. When they broke into their guest's story with information about a ball game or a joke in their set, they were unconscious of rudeness. They simply had not been listening.

Sometimes this habit is acquired at home, where all the family talk so much that none gets a chance as a soloist. Interruption becomes a matter of course in the home life; but strangers do not take to it so amiably, and the reputation of the family for good manners suffers.

Again, one is given to breaking in on a conversation because she has been closely associated with a talker who would drone on indefinitely unless some one else forcibly took the floor. The excuse is plausible, but one doesn't excuse her when the habit follows her into other circles.

Nothing makes a girl so unpopular as unwillingness to give another a fair chance in talking. She may be a veritable chatterbox at other times, but she should have the art of holding her tongue when some one else is talking.

A man, in commenting on a girl, said: "I like her. She always gives a fellow a chance to get in the point of his stories."

True, there is such a thing as listening to the point of stupidity. One young girl gave as an excuse for speaking but five times in the course of a dinner that she thought people enjoyed a listener. The guests present would have thought more of her mentality if she had not been so perfect.

One need not rudely interrupt to be a curtailer of conversation. All that is needed is a wandering eye or an inane "Is that so?" thrown in pointlessly to cause the other half in the conversation to realize that she might as well save her breath.

Another unconscious interrupter is the listener who sits with a stolid face while another is telling a good story or touching on some subject of the day. She is bored and hides it not, which does not increase the fluency of the talker.

There is a wholesale interrupter who switches a whole group of people from an animated conversation by breaking in with some others subject which may or may not apropos. You may much prefer to go on with the old topics, but cannot refuse to answer; and when you try to get back, all the interest is gone.

Of course you know better than to interrupt. Perhaps; but it will not hurt to do a little watching.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Gossip is always a personal confession either of malice or imbecility, and the young should not only shun it, but by the most thorough culture relieve themselves from all temptation to indulge in it. It is a low, frivolous, and too often a dirty business. There are country neighborhoods in which it rages like a pest. Churches are split in pieces by it. Neighbors are made enemies by it for life. In many persons it degenerates into a chronic disease, which is practically incurable. Let the young cure it while they may.—Dr. J. G. Holland.

The clock measures out the hours to us—but we fill them at our own choice.
"What time is it?
Time to do well,
Time to live better,
Give up that grudge,
Answer that letter,
Speak the kind word to lighten a sorrow,
Do that kind deed you would leave till tomorrow."

THE SUFFERING OF JESUS.

From the 53rd Chap. of Isa.

When trials and troubles oppress us,
And dark seems the way as the night,
We then must remember Christ's suffering,
And our darkness will be turned to light.

He was a man of sorrows,
Acquainted with bitterest grief;
Despised of men and rejected,
That our souls might find relief.

He was bruised for our transgressions,
Afflicted and deeply oppressed,
That we through His anguish and sorrow
In heaven might gain sweet rest.

He knew that we would wander,
Each one in an unknown way,
Like sheep in their pitiful weakness
We, too, would go astray.

In meekness He endured the anguish,
The stripes, the bitter despair,
To retrace our wandering footsteps,
That we heaven's blesings might share.

When I think of the patient suffering—
Of the blood that was shed for me—
Oh, Jesus, my heart aches so sadly,
For not living nearer to Thee;

And now I beseech Thee, dear Father,
That strength to our souls be given,
To praise Thee when trials seem hardest,
And at last join the angels in Heaven.

"Please, ma'am," said the servant, "there's a poor man at the door with wooden legs."

"Why, Mary," answered the mistress in a reproving tone, "what can we do with wooden legs? Tell him we don't want any."—Lippincott's.

NOTES ON C. E. LESSON FOR JULY 30.

BY CHARLES A. HINES.

Topic: A Missionary Journey Around the World. VII. Missions in Burma and India.—Acts 17: 16-31.

In her palmiest days Rome ruled over not more than 120,000,000 people, yet in the kingdom of India thre are about 300,000,000 people. This is a population greater than three times the entire number of people living in the United States. The area of India is about half of that of the United States. Thus it will be seen that the people live about seven times as closely together throughout the country as here.

India and Burma are rich in history. Every Endeavorer should get a good history and look at the story of the country and its people; their ancestry, traditions and works on the subject. Stoddard's lectures contain an especially interesting story of the people. There are many good missionary works on the subject.

Most will be accomplished by mission effort if we direct our energies first toward the large centers of population. Next to China, India presents the most inviting field. Only about one per cent. of the present population—one in every one hundred people are professing Christians. Under English rule much has been accomplished, and while the rule of England has not been ideal, the advantages it offers far out weigh the abuses practiced.

Missionaries of India and Burma tell us that the World's Christian Endeavor Convention at Agra, India, was the greatest religious gathering ever held in that whole country. Some go so far as to say it was the greatest ever held on mission soil. More than four thousand were present, from all over India and Burma, chiefly natives, having representatives from all denominations. Many foreign lands were represented by delegates. These meetings were full of power, and were sources of great strength to all the missionaries, and native Christians.

Last year the Episcopal Christians of South India gave for missions practically a half dollar each for every man, woman, and child. This is more than the average gift by the Christians in the home land, at least among the Protestant churches. Many of these native Christians denied themselves the necessities of life. Mission work in many parts of India has become self-extending, the natives themselves taking up missionary work with much self-denial and devotion. They go or send their brethren to other parts where there are no missionaries. Thre is fulfilment of Christ's commandment pure and simple.

There were only three hundred miles of railroad in India fifty years ago. Now it has thirty-thousand miles, standing fifth among the nations. This country also has two hundred thousand miles of good highways. India has fifty millions of acres of land under irrigation, far more than any other land. The Christian influence in India are wonders in many ways.

Many of the India Christian Endeavorers that attended the Agra convention walked fifty miles or more for this great meeting, and prached Christ all the way. Hindu Endeavorers are not afraid to testify. It is not an uncommon thing to read of India Christians giving up meat and fish and living on rice in order to have something to give to missions; or even as some do, give up rice and eat bread.

"A Brahman interrupted a native Christian woman as she was pleading for Christ, and required her to prove her religion by a miracle. "See me," she answered, "I am a low caste woman speaking to you, a Brahman, these wonderful words of life. What greater miracle could you ask?"

The centennial year of Burma missions will be in 1913. The missionaries in Burma are almost all Baptists, and do a mighty work among the hill tribes, who worship spirits. They were without a literature till these missionaries came to them. Now there are thousands of strong, intelligent, aggressive Christians among them. The Gospel of Christ is still the power of God for saving the souls of the heathen.

A. McLean tells us that less than a century ago there was not a single Christian in Burma. The statistise he gives are now far out of date, but he speaks of vast numbers of self-supported churches. "They set aside as much of the harvest as may be needed to support the native pastors before they take anything for themselves. They also send out missionaries to Siam and support them fully. When the work began among these people it was said that they were as untamable as the wild cow on the mountains. Then they were a heathen power, now they are an evangelizing power."

THE MONEY MEASURE.

A good base-ball player gets a larger salary than the average minister. That is to say, people put a higher value on good baseball than they do upon the service rendered (not merely the sermons preached) by the average pastor. For, somehow, this old world has got into the habit of estimating values in cash.

Two young men of equal mental ability enter college together. One becomes a lawyer; the other, a minister.

Ten or fifteen years after the day of their day of graduation the lawyer will be earning much more money than the minister. Yet the service that the pastor is rendering to the community is immeasurably greater than that which the lawyer renders. The large reward goes to the small service.

This does not mean, of course, that the lawyer's calling is not an honorable one, or that lawyers do no good in the community. It simply means that the minister's calling, the ideals which he preaches and for which he stands, the sweetness and uplift that he brings into life, are, after all, the best things.

It is well to remember this in estimating values and success. The king among men may wear a threadbare coat. Honor him!

The Man that did most for humanity received nothing in return. Jesus stood alone. No one could do His work, the value of which we can only begin to realize. Yet "He was despised."

The greatest service was accounted worthless. "The Son of man had not where to lay his head."

Men will pay for houses and lands; they will pay for passing pleasures and thrills; they will put down hard cash for silly amusements; they will write out big checks for business ideas; but fail to value the enormous service of the preacher of righteousness.

Men see things, sometimes, upside down!

STRONGEST ANIMAL FORCE.

Ask ten persons what is the strongest animal force in the world and nine will reply that it is a blow from a lion's paw. The tenth man may have a checkered career and express the belief, based on experience, that it is a kick of a Missouri mule.

As a matter of fact, the blow of a whale's tail is incomparably the strongest animal force; a blow delivered by a full-grown whale placed at just the right distance would smash in the side of a wooden ship as though it were an egg-shell.

The second strongest force is the kick of a giraffe, and this terrible kick is very adequate protection to these otherwise helpless animals.

The stroke of a lion's paw comes third on the list.—Harper's Weekly.

THE BEAUTIFUL LIFE.

Two lovely characters, in many respects, had been antagonistic to each other for a long time. A dangerous and impassable prejudice had been formed, forged with an iron chain of hatred which appeared too strong to ever be broken; but when love, forgiveness, and friendship were established between them, then they began to live the beautiful life. Oh, how beautiful it is to have the life filled with the fulness of God! The profound reality of such a life can be attained. Looking up to Him by faith, while the stars gleam through immeasurable distance, and wheel through space with incalculable velocity, we feel safe standing on the everlasting Rock.

Try not to think of so many of the unpleasant things of your life, when you can dwell in higher realms; live a sublime life, repent, be forgiven, and think of the beautiful and lovely things which invite you to move through the great field of Christian activity. Turn to your Bible and read the charming words of a great, grand, good and godly man, and they will help you up to God and heaven. These are the words: "Whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." When we rightly think on these things their beauty and purity greatly help to develop us into greatness and goodness. How much then is it to be desired that all minds and souls be influenced by these things. For, "if you know these things, happy are you if you do them." The greater life, the purer life, the beautiful life invite us to use them. If we were to do these things, it would be the beginning of heaven to us, and the bright star of hope would gleam on the way with new beauty, and our hearts would beat with gladness every day. We are social beings—we want to keep in touch with company and with the world, and by these associations we are influenced by good or evil. It will be one or the other—which shall it be? We can not—we will not do nothing. The loafer, the idler, the sinful, the dissipated, are doing something all the time. They are injuring themselves and setting a bad example to others. The one who is honest, true, religious, and good is living a life of usefulness. What a vast difference between the two classes, and yet they are all at work—each in his way.

Our conduct will influence some one—it matters not which way we turn nor in what direction we look or travel, some will follow us, or be inclined to do so. There will be a silent influence intruding itself in the way whether we desire it or not; and if we do not want it to lead us, we will have to put extra caution as a guard so as not to be deluded by its destructive sway. Traps have been set all the way down the line of life—plans have been devised to catch the unguarded and the innocent. Ignorance of their plans may have been deceived and ruined for time and eternity. Go where you will—stand upon the topmost round of success—walk the highways and byways of life—sit with wonder and admiration in pleasant places—lie in ease and luxury—run toward the goal for human greatness—but there is danger and death for all who travel the wrong way. Like a storm-tossed wave, which is dashed to pieces on a rocky shore, so sin has destroyed the beauty and brightness of many a life.

TAKING MINUTES OFF.

Your true farmer's wife imagines there aren't any minutes to take off.

She keeps on trotting, from kitchen to hen house, back by the dairy to the dining room, and around through the garden patch, from the time she gets wound up in the morning until she drops exhausted into the old rush-bottomed rocker at night.

Why, a woman wouldn't treat an alarm clock that way! She winds up her clock, and when it has worked itself around to a certain point, it goes off,—on time. But then it stops and rests, and thinks what hour it's to be set for next.

Isn't your body more delicate than an alarm clock? I knew a farmer's wife once who kept winding herself up and ringing time all day long. Then, when all the rest of us were in bed, she would sit up till 2 A. M., reading, in the back kitchen. Poor thing! She realized that, somehow, clock work wasn't life. She died early of apoplexy.

If you have never felt that luxurious feeling that comes from stretching out flat on your back for ten minutes at 11 A. M. and 4 P. M., and drawing long breaths,—try it!—Edith R. McComas, in Farm Journal.

Gallagher came home, and after tea and a wash-up he put on his best Sunday clothes.

"Where are ye goin,?" asked his wife.

" 'Tis the election day," replied Gallagher, "and I'm goin' into town to see the run."

Now Mrs. Gallagher was a thoughtful wife.

"Ye'll be takin' yer shillelagh wid ye?" she remarked.

"Sure and I will."

"And ye'll be puttin' a brick in yer hat?"

"What for?" asked Gallagher.

"Don't ye remimber the last election when ye came home wid a broken head?"

"Hould yer tongue, Biddy," replied Pat. "I'll tell ye what I've done this blessed night. I've put six dynamite cartridges inside me hat, and, if any of the bhoys stroike me on the head, sure I'll scatter the whole crowd o' thim."

Ample provisions are being made for a good athletic season next year at Elon College, advertisement of which occurs elsewhere in this paper. The authorities have not yet announced the name of the new athletic director. He will, however, have charge not only of the baseball team and its coaching, but he will have general oversight over tennis, basket ball and track exercises. Mr. W. H. Fleming, Burlington, N. C., who is manager of the baseball team for next year, is getting together a strong aggregation of players and is arranging a very satisfactory schedule. The physical exercises of the young ladies of this institution are under the direction of the teacher of expression. We will thank readers, in writing for catalogue or information, to mention this paper.

ELON COLLEGE (Co-educational).

When choosing a school in which to place their children, parents wish to consider the following special points:

MORAL AND SPIRITUAL INFLUENCES. The moral atmosphere of Elon College is of the highest type. The Spiritual influences surrounding the young man or the young woman will not allow them to go far astray.

HEALTHFULNESS. Good water from a deep well, buildings well cared for, good heat and lights, plenty of fresh air, and a situation in the best part of North Carolina insure the healthfulness of the students here.

STRONG COURSES OF STUDY. Entrance requirements equal to those of the best colleges in the country, a strong faculty of university men, and courses requiring sixty-nine hours for the Bachelor's degree, make Elon a college whose graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of the leading Universities of the country. Courses in Business, Elocution, Art, Music, and Pedagogy are offered leading to certificates and degrees.

EQUIPMENT. Splendid Library and Reading Room, ample grounds, laboratories, large dormitories, buildings equal to the best, with every equipment and appliance makes Elon stand among the from rank of colleges in the South. All buildings are heated by steam and lighted by electricity, and have water and bath rooms on every floor.

ECONOMY. All expenses can be paid for the college courses for from $125.00 to $200.00 a year according to the student's power of economy and his place selected for board and room.

COEDUCATIONAL. Parents who read The Methodist Protestant Herald can send both their sons and daughters to Elon College with the assurance that they will have the best that the educational world has to offer.

WORM THAT GNAWED AT GRECIAN HEARTS.

Only one worm gnawed at the heart of Athens, Corinth, Phocis, and other capitals of Greece—the ownership of slaves, which in time brought industry into disrepute with free men, built up a supercilious aristocracy, increased profligacy and vice, and brought into power autocrats who sould not sympathize with the humble needs and interests of the people.—"Nobility of the Trades—The Merchant," Charles Winslow Hall, in National Magazine for July.

THE NAMELESS FOLD.

O Shepherd of the nameless fold,
The blessed Church to be,
Our hearts with love and longing turn
To find their rest in Thee.
Thy kingdom come! Its heavenly walls
Unseen around us rise,
And deep in loving human hearts
Its broad foundation lies.

From out our low, unloving state,
Our centuries of strife,
Thy hand, O Shepherd of the flock,
Is lifting us to life;
From all our old divided ways
And fruitless fields we turn
To Thy dear feet, the simple law
Of Christian love to learn.

O holy kingdom! happy fold!
O blessed Church to be!
Our hearts in love and worship turn
To find ourselves in Thee;
Thy bounds are known to God alone,
For they are set above:
The length, the breadth, the height are one,
And measured in His love.

OUR NEED OF GOD.

Men need God above all. God is more to us than all else. When all else fails—health, property, friends, life,—God will remain.

Men need to believe in God to steady them amid the catastrophes of life. When the things in which we have trusted are taken from us and the foundations are shaken, if we could not believe in God, we would be in a desperate condition. But amid all changes the ever-living God abides, and the thought of Him calms our souls in time of trouble.

Men need God as their chief counselor. They cannot see the way clearly, and would be in hopeless perplexity often were it not for the wisdom of God, which He without upbraiding gives to all who seek it. "Without upbraiding." How different from many human advisers! They can give us advice in abundance, but it is so permeated with their upbraidings that it is hard to appreciate its value or even to receive it.

Men need God as a friend. Human friendship is good, but not good enough. God's friendship is satisfying. Happy are they who know God as a friend, who go to Him with all their joys and sorrows, and have confidence in His sympathy. Human friends may fail to understand us, but God understands us perfectly, and never fails to manifest His regard.

Men need God as a ruler. He rules ever wisely and always for our good. What He does may seem severe at first, but later it is seen to be best for us. Glad should we be that God really rules the world. He rules so gently and so firmly that some fail to recognize His over-ruling hand, but He rules none the less, and because He rules we may be confident, we may be calm, we may lie down and sleep.

We need God's inspiration. Without it, our purposes are unworthy. With it, life takes on a higher value. Our hopes are heightened, our efforts take new direction, our prospects are made glorious. If we should think of ourselves as mere creatures of the earth, limited to earth's joys and sorrows and achievements, how vain and poor would life seem to us! But God has granted unto us an inspiring vision of a larger life, a life that begins on the earth and extends to all the universe—, life of largest liberty, and most delightful activity.

We need God as our comforter. Life's changes bring us loss and sorrow. Men try to console us, but how weak are their words. God speaks to us, and our hearts are comforted. He wipes the tears from our eyes, and bids us be of good cheer.

We need God all the time, and God is never absent. He never forsakes us, He never forgets us, though we often forget Him. Asleep or awake, we need God, and He knows we need Him, and never closes His loving eyes to our need of Him.

We need constant communion with God. As we need the air physically, so we need God spiritually. In Him we live and move and have our being. He breathes into our souls the breath of spiritual life, and our spiritual powers are quickened and strengthened. Happy is the soul that enters fully into communion with God.

We need God's pardon. Without that, the thought of God is pain to us. With that, the sense of God's presence brings peace and joy and love.

O that men whose vision is filled with the petty things of earth and the creature-realm could see how much better it is to be filled with all the fullness of God, the Creator.

—While Rev. A. G. Dixon was gone to California, Mrs. Dixon hustled around and raised money to pay off a nine-hundred dollar debt on the parsonage. It is not a every preacher's wife that can be a helpmeet in this way.

ANGEL MINISTRIES.

"Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Heb. 1:14.

In a recent article in the Herald regarding angel ministries, we were reminded of a very striking incident related to us by an intelligent consecrated Christian lady as having occurred in her early years, and which had left so pleasing an impression upon her that she never had forgotten it, but remembered it always as a special providence.

The lady said that she was born in the city of London, England. Her parents were of a very high order of moral excellence, her father being a Wesleyan Methodist minister, and this lady was the eldest of their five children. The mother at this time was something of an invalid, making the family cares rest heavily upon "Annie", and she had to assume a woman's place before her time. When she was nearly twelve years of age her father suddenly sickened and died, leaving his family in somewhat reduced circumstances. But as he was nearing his end he told his wife that if he was permitted to do so, he would surely come back in the spirit and minister to her in her loneliness and distress. But it was almost more than the stricken wife and mother could endure to see the grave close over the tender loving husband, and she learned at once to put her whole trust in Him who has said He would be a father to the fatherless and a husband to the widow. One night about two months after the death of her husband the mother was taken violently ill and there was an imperative demand that a physician be summoned at once. It was then between one and two o'clock and the family physician's home was at least half a mile away on the same street. But the mother roused Annie out of her sweet sleep and asked if she could get Dr. Gray there at once. She arose and dressed hastily and alone and seemingly unprotected she started for the doctor's house with a prayer on her lips for protection and help. The faithful little girl sped on her way up the dimly lighted street when she suddenly tripped and fell full length and in a moment an unseen hand was placed under her and she was gently lifted to her feet; and looking around, to her intense joy, she saw her father standing by her side. She was not alarmed as he tenderly led her on, looking just as he did in life. But a strange awe seemed to fill her heart and mind so that she seemed incapable of uttering a single word. But he kept close to her side and she seemed ta be carried the remaining distance without any volition of her own. He carried her straight to the doctor's home and gave a loud rap on the door and then disappeared as the doctor opened the door and recognized the child. He said, "Little one, you came alone. Just wait a minute or two and I will take you back with me." She had told her errand and the kind old physician was soon with the little girl speeding his way back to the home where he quickly relieved the mother. But not until the next day did the child tell her mother of the strange apparition and then the mother confidently believed that the father had been sent as a special protection to his poor little frightened child. The lady said somehow her life had been happier since that night as she felt constantly that God had permitted her Father's guardian presence to attend her through life.

The lady in question was a much traveled woman of brilliant mind and intellect. Her mother sometime after her husband's death went as a missionary to distant lands and accomplished much good during her long life. She finally came back to London and by this time Annie was a woman grown and she soon after returning to London married a Methodist minister and soon after her mother's death she and her husband came to New York and made their home in Brooklyn. The lady was sent to our city to attend some religious gathering which convened here, and we entertained her in our home during her stay. We found one of the most brilliant attractive women it was ever our privilege to have known.

DO CATHOLICS SUFFER?

Some while ago a writer in the Herald asked, "Are Catholics not happy? are they oppressed? do they suffer?" The editor's reply was, "I had thought it a well known fact that they suffer, that they suffer a loss of freedom, and a consequent loss of the highest development of manhood and womanhood." The Roman Catholic Church holds that when a Catholic marries a Protestant the marriage is void if the ceremony is not performed by a Catholic priest. It seems that there is an old law in Canada giving validity to this claim. A year or two ago a Catholic man and a Catholic girl were married by a Methodist minister, though the fact of their being Catholics was unknown to the minister at the time. They lived together as man and wife till a child was born. Then the union was dissolved by the Archbishop. Then the case was appealed to the courts and the Archbishop's contention was sustained, and the most sacred of unions was destroyed. I confess I haven't a sufficient command of language to express my feelings at this. Do you ask if these people suffer? As well ask if the negroes of the South suffered during slavery, or if Israel suffered in Egypt, or if France suffered under Napoleon. The slavery of the negro, the bondage of Israel, or the iron hand of Napoleon was not more exacting that the officers of Rome. The negro of the South had only to obey his master, Israel had only to make brick without straw, Europe had only to comply with the mandates of Napoleon; and the subjects of Rome have only to yield implicit obedience to the mandates of the Pope and his officers. To judge from the above case, and certainly it is in perfect harmony with the highest will of the Catholic Church, to say that the machinery of Rome is oppressive does not express it. To say that it is cruel does not express it. To say that its members suffer a loss of the highest development of manhood and womanhood does not express it. It can only be expressed by saying it is an enemy to society, it is damnable and damning; for it is an enemy to the home unless formed so as to promote its own selfish ends. No wonder Mexico, Spain, and other countries which have been controlled by Rome have become corrupt and stagnant. How could it be otherwise? The most sacred vows, the tenderest ties, the strongest love, the closest unions, all this is as nothing if it comes in between Rome and her selfish ambition. I can think of nothing more anti-Christian than the case under consideration. A church which will break up a home, which will separate man and wife, which will blacken their characters by declaring them to have been living in adultery, which will brand an innocent child with the disgrace of illigitimate birth, will not hesitate to commit any other crime against society that may lie between it and the realization of its fiendish purpose. This case shows that the only reason it no longer casts men into dungeons, or stretches them upon the rack, or burns them at the stake, is that it hasn't the power. In this case it went just as far as it could; and if it could, and had burned these unfortunates, it would not have done much worse than it has, as it is. I have called this a church. I want to apologize for this. It is not a Church, only in a heathen sense. I do not say there are no Christians in it. I think there are hundreds of thousands in it. I am speaking rather of its machinery and its purpose. Certainly these are not Christian, but pagan. I am satisfied that the great body of Catholic people are not in sympathy with the course of the leaders in the above case, but under Rome they must submit.

The argument by which they justify themselves in the above course is: If the members will disobey the laws of the Church they must be disciplined, they must bear the penalty which the head imposes. This in substance is the argument which Rome employed when she burned men at the stake and stretched them on the rack. They knew the law. They did not have to disobey. If they did they must take the consequences. It is true that what I have said shows some feeling. I confess that I have it. The above case has exasperated me. Are the Catholics oppressed? do they suffer? Gentlemen of the jury, you have the case.

MUTUAL RIGHTS.

Some of the most important things we usually think but little about. This is the case with this subject. I venture to say that the majority of the members in our M. P. Church think comparatively little on this subject, and that there may be a few who have an idea that the question need never be brought up at all. Often by the force of circumstances we are thrust into the light of things—and often in such cases we are glad of the "force" after we see the light. Perhaps I had as well mention my father again—since I will not be able to say what I want to unless I make the mention.

I have mentioned that he refused to write to the papers—said that he would not "meddle with the editors." However, my idea is that all the editors that believe in such good principles as mutual rights are glad to be "meddled with"—but there are some who do not believe in such mutuality at all, only when they have the advantage all on their side, but soon as it is self-necessary they turn from the mutual. I will now give a case. I had an uncle who was very liberal, was a member of the M. P. Church, believed in its doctrines, and believed in mutual rights. Once when starting out on a trip with a wagon, he happened to travel for several days with another wagoner—a stranger. When the stranger saw my uncle open his box of provisions he said, "Mr. S., how would it do for us to eat out of your box first, then eat of my provisions later on?" My uncle agreed to it and it seemed to go on all O. K. Later, after box No. 1 had run out, my uncle, in "good faith," as he thought, started to help the stranger eat out of his box, but "No," the stranger said. Uncle tried to reason, but no, the man urged that he needed all that he had for himself, and my uncle being a quiet man, just retired and allowed the strange stranger to have his own way. The project was the way of the stranger from the start, but my uncle did not know it. There was no need of giving the stranger such advantage, but he asked for it.

Let us not forget that there are many who really ask for an advantage, and that they get it—get their living by the advantage that they ask for. Someone said that my uncle ought to have given that stranger a whipping; but no, but he ought not to have given the stranger such an advantage.

The idea is, in order to keep peace, all concerned ought to be mutual. My uncle was mutual, but the stranger only pretended to be. There are thousands of people in the world today who are so circumstanced that they only seem to be mutual. Things are so shaped that they live their whole life out while eating out of box No. 1—and thus are able to appear mutual and clever while life lasts, but are deceivers. Mutual rights and self-denial belong together, and can't be separated.

It was on my mind to say that my father had a better insight into the subject of mutual rights than some of us M. P.'s have. Before my time he read a paper (a secular paper, a weekly) that he claimed was wonderfully edited. I don't know what all he got out of it, but I am supposing that he got much of his information from that paper, such as fixed his mind on the doctrines of mutual rights. I say "doctrines" because of the great and wide reaching body of the whole subject.

I will mention, too, that my father bought the history of our church and read it.

I was glad of the writings in our Greensboro paper on this subject—and I felt like saying that the subject deserved our exhortation about once a week. I used to hear my father urge and tell about the folly of fellow mortals having the advantage over their fellows—and I am glad that I have not forgotten it.

Some one might ask, But what has such an article as the above got to do with mutual rights? This article may not have much to do with it, but if there is exhortation about it, the exhortation would urge about the fact that the people of our world have need to have much to do with it. We all live and let live, and, if you please, we help live by means of mutual rights. We need none of that set who would such advantage as to eat out of the liberal man's box. The idea is to urge that we honest folks all have the same rights in the world, and that we have no moral right to give a fellow man advantages that he can impose on us by.

Again the question might be asked why I mention my father as I have in connection with this article. I am not half through with this subject, and I have need to mention something in connection with what he said so as to be able to say what I want to say. As a rule, when one has a subject in view it is best for him to attend to it (to be the responsible man), but if any must criticize, of course they have their responsibility.

However, if this article is published (and more, may be), and any would criticize, I would suggest that they write me, and not bother the editor.

But I would urge that this article is not out after criticism or controversy, but I write this while feeling that we have need to be stirred right often on these things. The honor and nobility of mutual rights was the thing in view when I commenced this article—and I would be glad to be privileged to say more in an article later on. My language is not as clear as that of the gifted and the "ready" writers, but one fact in the case is, I believe in progress and liberty and liberality and free speech and mutual rights as well, perhaps, as those who are able to write with fewer words.

—We are hoping that Senator Swanson, of Virginia, will get through Congress a bill which he has introduced calling for an appropriation of $20,000,000 a year for five years for the improvement of country roads. Any State, or locality, to share the benefits of the proposed appropriation, would have to put up an amount equalling that given by the national government, and the total is to be divided among the States according to population. It may seem a departure for the government to go into road building, but why unreasonable, or incompatible with the appropriation of millions annually to open up and improve "rivers" which are called so for financial reasons only. Road improvement, as well as river improvement, is the need of the hour.

MY GIPSY MOTHER'S DEATH.

Mother knew she was dying. Our hands were stretched out to hold her, but they were not strong enough. Other hands, omnipotent and eternal, were taking her from us. Father seemed to reallze, too, that she was going. He sat beside her one day and asked her if she thought of God. For the poor gipsies believe in God, and believe that He is good and merciful. And she said.

"Yes."

"Do you try to pray, my dear?"

"Yes, I am praying, and while I try to pray it seems as though a black hand comes before me and shows me all that I have done, and something whispers, 'There is no mercy for you!'"

But my father had great assurance that God would forgive her, and told herabout Christ and asked her to look to Him. He died for sinners. He was her Savior. My father had some time before been in prison on a false charge and it was there that he had been told what now he tried to teach my mother. After my father hed told her all he knew of the gospel she threw her amrs around his neck and kissed him. Then he went outside, stood behind the wagon and wept bitterly. When he went back again to see her she looked calmly into his face and said with a smile:

"I want you to promise me one thing. Will you be a good father to my children?"

He promised her that he would; at that moment he would have promised her anything. Again he went outside and wept, and while he was weeping he heard her sing:

"I have a Father in the promised land,
My God calls me, I must go
To meet Him in the promised land."

My father went back to her and said:

"Polly, my dear, where did you learn that song?"

She said: "Cornelius, I heard it when I was a little girl. One Sunday my father's tent was pitchéd on a village green, and seeing the young people and others going into a little school or church or chapel—I do not know which it was—I followed them in and they sang those words."

It must have been twenty years or so since my mother had heard those lines. Although she had forgotten them all these years they came back to her in her moments of intense seeking after God and His salvation. She could not read the Bible; she had never been taught about God and His Son; but these words came back to her in her dying moments and she sang them again and again. Turning to my father she said:

"I am not afraid to die now. I feel that it will be all right. I feel assured that God will take care of my children."

A CAUTION.

The time is here when most of our preachers are to be engaged in revival meetings for several weeks. The preachers as well as the other good people are expecting great things which, of course, is right. But I fear that many times we look too much to the preacher for results, and not enough to God. The preacher perhaps is to be a new man among the people, but they have heard of his ability as a preacher or of the success he has had elsewhere. Or perhaps he is to be one who is well known among the people and is loved by all. In either case the people are too apt to look forward to his coming with anxious hopes that he will bring desired results, forgetting that results are to come only from God, and that the preacher is only an instrument to be used of God. The revival effort many times results in flat failure, all because the heart of the church was set upon the preacher and not upon God, expecting the man to bring results such as he could not. This is unfair to the preacher, as well as a great loss to the cause we represent.

A revival is not to be had through a man's reputation or through any regard the people may have for him. But when people, because they have great faith in God, become so consecrated to Him that they are willing to properly pray and work, their souls will meet with the Holy Spirit and a great revival may be had even if the preacher has no great reputation as a revivalist, or even if he is not an eloquent speaker. These lines are written with the hope and prayer that some one may see the error of his ways and learn that "it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man."

THE END OF TIME.

It has been said, "There is no death,"
But, be that true, there is a goal
To earthly life which separates
The mortal body from the soul,

Which, by transition, enters through
The open portal of the night,
At which the body seeks its dust
And bids the soul to take its flight.

The sun of life, gone down to rise
Again upon some other shore,
May shine again in fairer climes,
Or be in darkness evermore;

The veil that's drawn to mark the end
Will seal the fate of you and me;
And, when the soul goes thence to dwell,
It will behold eternity!

Resplendent on his heavenly throne,
Behold the one who judges all,
Decrees the fate of everyone,
Remembers both the great and small;

And, by his wisdom, candor holds,
Rewarding not with partial guise,
But dealing justice out to all,
For he could not do otherwise.

And whether light or darkness is
The last reward the wise Judge gives,
Depends not on his power and will,
But deeds one does, the life one lives.

So, that is mortals' timely end—
To live a little while and then,
Pass on beyond the sullen grave—
The way of all children of men!

Henry Ward Beecher, referring once to ministerial changes, said, in his blunt way: "A dead sure call is a pull in front and a kick behind." There are some poor ministers who are unfortunate enough to receive the "kick behind" before they are wrought upon by any "pull in front." It is a happy experience for any man, minister or other, to commend himself strongly by his work to the strangers who want him, before he has worn out his welcome with the associates who know him too well. —Zion's Herald.

—Last Saturday afternoon, pursuing a program made by Rev. W. F. Kennett. the pastor, I found myself on the way to Flat Rock church. I was met at Summerfield by Mr. Nicholas Johnson and taken to his father's home for the night—my first visit to this pleasant home. Bro. B. W. Johnson and wife, who is a sister of Rev. D. A Highfill, are among the excellent of the earth, and they have an interesting family of three sons and two daughters at home, and three sons and one daughter gone out from the home and now living in Greensboro. The time here passed quickly away, and a buggy ride of half a mile brought us to church in time for Sunday school. Bro. Walter Williams is still superintendent. The session Sunday morning was brief, but interesting. Much is added here by good singing led by an organ played by Mrs. J. B. Ogburn. Preaching service immediately followed the Sunday school. There was a fairly good congregation, though a protracted meeting was going on at Glenco, a few miles away.

Some additions have been made to the church building since my last visit to this point. A vestibule has been added, surmounted by a bell tower with a real bell. Also a marble vault has been placed in the cemetery for Mr. Price, deceased.

After service, Bro. J. B. Ogburn and wife took me to their home and cared for me in their kindly way, aided by Mary and Richard, who seem to be trying to out-grow each other.

Sunday evening Bro. Ogburn took his family and me out to see his mill-pond, the scene of the tragedy of last week in which young Finley lost his life, he being drowned in an effort to swim across the pond with his clothes on. Bro. Ogburn told of an experience of his own in which he came near being drowned. He corroborated the common statement that the entire past life flashes before the mind of a drowning person. Especially is it true that one's misdeeds will come to mind. What a fearful record sin makes! It is engraved on conscience and seemingly imperishable. Only one thing can blot it out—the "precious blood." We cannot thank God enough for that.

On Monday morning Bro. Ogburn brought me to Summerfield, and soon I am back among the noises of the Herald office machinery, but a litle rested and more able to endure because of the change. What a blessing is the sight of the green fields and woods! And what a privilege to mingle with the good people there are in this world that seems to some so bad!

Very truly,
W. E. Swain.

TO ALL THE FRIENDS OF ASHEVILLE.

All the readers of the Herald are friends of Asheville. All the members of the Methodist Protestant Church are interested in the enterprise of the North Carolina Conference.

May I the servant of the Conference give you a reminder? The lot for the new church was cleared in the early spring. We have been hoping to be able to commence our new church all along. I beg to ask the leading Methodist Protestants of the Conference just what they expect to do to help us to build a church in this city. Somebody has a thousand dollars—two or three somebodies have this amount each. There are a few five hundreds and many hundreds.

If five would give one thousand each; if two would give five hundred each; if ten would give one hundred each; if twenty would give fifty each:this added to the smaller gifts from the rank and file, and added to the local gifts and to the offering by the Board of Home Missions, would place us inside a furnished church within a few months.

You, dear people, whom God has blessed, what are you thinking about, I beg you? What part are you taking in the Kingdom? If you wish our denomination to perish, if you wish your servant to fail, if you wish the hundreds of souls you could bless in these parts to perish, if you wish to deny our denomination a worthy home in this American resting place, just be quiet and pay no heed to our appeals. We have kept you informed of the situation here from time to time. We have told you of frequent conversions, of many who have confessed Christ, of hundreds who have been blessed by the ministrations of this your agency in this city, of a Sunday school attendance of more than 125 for three years, of a faithful membership of more than 100, of at least 1,000 people whom you have blessed and who are praying for you to help in providing for a church home.

We have not told you all—all the good. We have never told you of the financial stress many have suffered to carry on this work. There are many men and women in our North Carolina Conference, any one of whom could build and furnish a $20,000 church and pay its pastor a good salary for ten years and more. No one person is asked to build a church alone. A very few have almost been asked to build a church alone and with no money. It is every one's privilege to put what he has into this church. It is a Providential affair. The opening here has been Providential. The good that has been accomplished by this church already justifies every cent that has been expended here.

As pastor of the Asheville undertaking I wish to know what our able people intend to do, if you please? We must know at once what to expect. We appreciate most profoundly what has been contributed to this work.

Your servant in His Name,
J. S. Williams.

Wish to correct the mistake made in last report report, that is, our picnic was July 21st instead of July 23. It was a grand success. I can say conscientiously that there was no one present but what enjoyed the day. Provided for the children were games and other amusements, and for the young people an able swing, and for the grown-up people a set of quoits, and for all a sufficient supply of lemonade and dinner. I can safely say that it was the most enjoyable day that I have spent in many.

Though there were several absent because of the beginning of the special meeting at Union Chapel church, there were fifty-one present last Sunday anyway.

Littleton Circuit.

The Children's Day program at Weaver's Chapel last third Sunday was a success in every way—unless the collection marred it a bit. This was smaller than we liked—only $6.51. The program was well prepared and was listened to by a large and attentive congregation. Only about half the people could get into the house. The church at this place ought to be remodeled and enlarged. The people have outgrown their present quarters, and should make these improvements this year.

On last Sunday night another well prepared program was rendered at Vaughan. The congregation was large, the attention was good, but the collection was painfully small—$4.14. The collection is one purpose of Children's Day, but it is so small at times that we are led to think the result would hardly justify the effort if that were the only good accomplished. But it is not: the emphasis the program gives to foreign missions tends to keep the church interested. It helps the adults in the church to realize their responsibility to unchristian lands and develops in the children the mission spirit. It also puts the church to work, and this helps to keep life in the church and to develop the mental, social and spiritual resources of the church. So whether the collection is large or small, Children's Day is worth while.

Our special metings are scheduled for the following Sundays: Hawkins' 2nd in August; Weaver's 3rd in August, Corinth 1st in Sept., Vaughan 2nd in Sept. Littleton in October, but the date has not been fixed.

Bro. Tom Fishel is recovering from an attack of typhoid fever. Lonnie Fletcher, son of Bro. Bob Fletcher, has fever also and is not yet out of danger.

Bro. George Rightmyre is taking a much needed vacation this week. We hope be will be as faithful in his rest as he is in his work.

Mrs. Tom Evans was received into the church at Vaughan Sunday night. Glad to have her unite with us.

Bro. Nat Harrison, Jr., preached in the M. P. Church at Littleton 3rd Sunday morning. His subject was prayer, and his effort was favorably reported.

The third quarterly conference will be held at Corinth on Saturday before the third Sunday in August. Hour 11 A. M.

Mt. Pleasant, Guilford Circuit.

We held Children's Day at Mt. Pleasant on the fourth Sunday. We had the pleasure of seeing a large crowd of people out to enjoy the day with us.

The children rendered their pieces with credit to themselves for the small amount of training. We used the program prepared by Dr. Klein for the children in the morning and the afternoon we had old people's day and had a good time. The Spirit of God was with us throughout the day. The following brethren made good talks for us: Bros. J. M Morris, E Searles, G. A. Berrier, Robt. L. Stone, J. P. Long; also brother Plyler was with us throughout the day, and spoke with much earnestness for the cause of missions. Our collection was $7.70.

Sunday school is doing very well, but not as large as it should be. I want to say that we have some as loyal members in this S. S. as any where, and among the heads of families. I can not refrain from calling the names of two brothers that are always at their posts ready to hold up my weak hands; viz., Bro. S. S. Welborn and Bro. H F. Murphy. While we have many good people ready to help, yet they seem to think somebody other than themselves should lead the way. We have also a number of young ladies that are a great strength to the Sunday school. Upon a whole I think our people are as good as you will find, but do not seem to be as active as some.

Oh that we may become a peculiar people, noted for our loyalty to our church and our service to Almighty God. We can never become a power for good until we are willing to make some sacrifice for the uplift of humanity and bring them to a knowledge of the saving grace of Almighty God.

We are striving to raise money to repair our church building at Mt. Pleasant at an early date, which is badly needed.

Asheville.

One lady confessed Christ in the service last Sunday evening. It was the best service for some time.

Sunday school attendance: Main school 115, Woolsey Hall 30, Woodfin Hill 45. Brother and Mrs. J. L. Carpenter, of Fairmont, W. Va., have received their letters to unite with us. They have purchased property here and have recently moved into their new home.

Miss Addie Paris of Rocky Mount and Mrs. Joe Paris of Wilson worshiped with us Sunday. Also Mr. Booze of Kentucky, who is here in the interest of the Long Distance telephone company. He will join our Baraca.

On Wednesday night, the 19th, we had an unusual prayer meeting. More than fifty friends came loaded down with packages for our bodily comfort. It was a complete surprise.

Next Sunday is to be our midsummer rally day. We hope to have a good all round day. J. S. W.

Closed meeting at Antioch last Wed. No conversions but a good revival in the church. No material. Have held three services in meeting at Union Chapel. Nine professions so far, and we seem to be on the eve of a great revival. Pray for us. Bro. Moton is with me preaching with power. Helped me at Antioch, and will be here till Thursday. For these great spiritual uplifts we thank God.

Mt. Pleasant, Uwharrie Circuit.

Our S. S. is still growing; we had 72 present today. Our worthy pastor, Bro. Joel Trogdon, could not be with us today. He was called on to preach a funeral near his home by one of his neighbors. He sent Bro. Laughlin of Cedar Falls to fill his appointment. He gave us a good sermon.

I had the pleasure of spending the night with our pastor at his home. He is blessed with a nice home, good farm, and it shows that it has been well cultivated. It certainly is enjoyable to hear his loving wife and his obedient children sing their sweet songs. I thank the Lord for sending us a good preacher, one that is filled with the Holy Spirit. We held our children's day 4th Sunday in June; had a large congregation. Collection was something over $12. I am glad to say, by the help of the good people, we have been able to paint our church.

Pray for us, friends, that we may hold out faithful.

G. F. Cashatt.

Spring Church.

We have been silent for awhile so far as reports are concerned, but I trust that we are not idle. The main reason why I have not reported before now is not because we are not doing anything worth reporting, for we few workers are busy all the time.

We expected to have our president to preach for us the second Sunday in June, but to our great disappointment, Bro. Ashburn received a 'phone message that he could not be with us, giving no particular reason for not coming. But we trust that he can visit us sometime during this year. Bro. Ashburn filled his appointment here to a very interesting audience that assembled to hear Bro. Swain. Bro. Ashburn was with us again the 4th Sunday in June and filled his appointment at the usual hour.

On the fourth of July we had a picnic here. Refreshments were served for the benefit of our new church. Several of our good ladies deserve much credit for working so faithfully that day, and at night I am sure they were pleased at their day's work when they found out they had cleared $35.00.

We have had our church painted on the outside, which adds very much to its beauty. By the time we send out another report, I hope that we will be able to say that we have a new Bible and carpet for our church.

Third quarterly conference was held here last Saturday; the business was transacted in harmony, with a very few members present.

Our annual children's day service was given here last Sunday morning. It was mostly a children's affair. They did exceedingly well. The splendid program as prepared by Dr. Klein was carried out. There was quite a large congregation present. The church was filled to the utmost capacity, and a large number remained on the outside. Our special meeting will commence here the fourth Sunday in August. We are praying for a glorious revival and ingathering of many precious souls. Reporter.

NOTICE.

All Sunday school superintendents of Yadkin College Ct. are requested to meet at Shiloh on the first Sunday in August at 3 o'clock for the purpose of arranging plans for the circuit Sunday school Convention which convenes at Shiloh on Saturday before the fourth Sunday in Aug.

—Mrs. Dr. Harris Glascock went to Midway church, Haw River Ct., last Sunday, and made an address in the afternoon on foreign missions and the duty of supporting them. There was a large congregation, it being the beginning of a special meeting. Pres. Swain preached in the morning and went to Bethany for an afternoon service.

—Rev. W. R. Lowdermilk went to Bro. Raper's assistance at Midway on Monday.

High Point.

After an absence of just one month in a trip across the continent, and in attendance of the International Sunday School Convention in San Francisco, California, I am now back in my place in High Point. Have been back about two weeks. I learned upon return that the Sunday school and church attendance had kept up well. Our Sunday school has kept well above the 200 mark during all the hot weather of this season. ,

I wish in this way to express my most hearty thanks to Rev. G. L. Reynolds, Rev. T. J. Ogburn, Rev. W. E. Swain, D. D., and Rev. C. H. Whitaker for their kindness in filling the pulpit here one Sunday each during my absence. The congregation also appreciated your visits and have said some very kind things about your preaching.

The congregation had planned a social and thanksgiving service for the first Wednesday evening after my return to celebrate the payment of all indebtedness that was upon our congregation.

The indebtedness when all summed up amounted to nearly $1000.

Mrs. Dixon was asked to do the collecting, and with the very efficient help of some others that she pressed into service the entire amount was collected and paid over on July 12. So it was a happy meeting for us when it could be announced that "there is no indebtedness against our church." The congregation stood and sang "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." Mr. R. T. Pickens, on behalf of the congregation, presented Mrs. Dixon with a $20.00 bill in appreciation of her services in collecting money to meet the indebtedness.

I had a very fine trip across the continent and return, and had the pleasure of attending one of the greatest conventions of recent times. It was a wonderful eight days of spiritual uplift for S. S. workers. If there is any way in which I can help the S. S.'s of our church in N. C. without injury to my own work here, I am anxious to do it.

Yours for the Master,

A. G. Dixon.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

At Graham on last Sunday, both morning and night, there were a number of visitors who worshiped with us. Among them were Mrs. Johnson of Greensboro, Mr. Causey of Liberty Circuit, and Misses Carrie and Cora Stowe, of Asheboro and Why Not respectively.

The congregations at the preaching services were as good as usual, but Sunday school attendance was considerably off. Graham S. S. numbered 79 and Haw River 71.

Denton Orphanage.

Don't that sound good? It appeals very dearly to my heart, and I am always looking in this paper to see what is being done toward advancing this work and think we could encourage each other and do lots of good if we would use our brains and pen to let each other know what was doing and what was needed.

To my mind, more interest is needed to get this work on human hearts, and as so many are not so fortunate as we who are so situated as to see and know what is being done, I for one feel it my duty to give you a few facts as I know them.

But first I want to say, Denton is proud of her orphanage and will always take off her hat to the good women and all to whom credit is due for giving us this M. P. Orphanage. We see great big things in the future for it, and will always lend a helping hand toward its success.

There was no mistake made by these women when they decided to start up this orphanage, and no mistake has been made since, although it has not been sailing on flowery beds of ease; by no means, it has taken sacrifice, patience, and lots of work to do the good that I am going to tell you about now. I know all the children, and they all know me. I've been with them in their home and church and surely can show you some good training of their young, tender minds, for which Miss Mabel and Miss Etta are due much more credit than I or you can give them. They are training them to work such as they have to do, raising vegetables, chickens, milking, cooking, and general work around the home. On Sunday they all come out to Sunday school light hearted, bright and happy as little angels. It would touch any heart, seems to me, to tell you all how these little ones from different points come together and join one another in love and sympathy. They love each other and are very fond of their home and surroundings. They have to work some and get to play some. They are taught good manners, taught to say their little prayers at night, taught to be very nice in church, and taught to give thanks before eating, and act extra nice at the table.

They are all together looked after closer than most of outside children. But let us not look at one side all the time. It has some dark sides, too, but I don't think I have heard one complaint. It takes lots of courage and faith to go ahead and shoulder this great responsibility through the darkest part of this work, which is the beginning, when there are only a few carrying the burden. I'll tell you why it is the darkest time. Most times we don't want to help do little things, we want something great, and we haven't taken time to look into the future to see what a great thing we were doing when we helped these good women pick up these little unfortunate ones, giving them food and raiment, training them to be men and women for the future good. Can you see why they wanted an orphanage? If so, and you want to join in and help them, they need your service, prayers, and money. They are living plainly, and haven't sufficient money in the treasury now to do what is needed to be done, and they are looking in the future to yon and me, whom God is blessing, to do our little part, what ever you may find it. I do not know their plans for raising money, but I think it would be very nice and acceptable for you to send Miss Etta Auman, Treas., just exactly what you feel you want to give them now, and I will assure you it will be appreciated, no matter how small, and will be spent to the very best advantage. And then I think another good way would be if you have this work at heart to try to teach your friends to get interested, and let us all do the littles, and we can encourage each other, and I know God will bless all we do for His sake, and know it will not be wasted nor in vain.

So let us try to be encouraged, and work hand in hand and make this orphanage an honor to God and to the M. P. Church, and turn out hundreds of good men and women to look after our work here after we are gone where we will be rewarded according to what we do now.

One more word for encouragement: the situation on which the orphanage is to be built is the very cream of our land. It lies beautifully, nice, high, clean, gravelly, rolling off on back sides, and is a most beautiful grove of large oaks. Just think of a nice 15-acre grove, nice buildings, beautifully laid off in walks and flowers, school and church right by it, and 12-acre garden, plenty of cows and chickens to supply the table's demand. Won't it make us happy to see this before we die? I will, won't you? We can rush it if we all do our part, not lose so much time wondering what others are doing. I am not going to write any more, but count me one to stand by this in all things, trying to do my part as I feel it my duty. J. R. Peace.

Allen Walker Pegram.

On Saturday, July 15, at 1 o'clock P. M., Allen Walker Pegram, the senior member of Flat Rock Circuit, passed to his reward in the 89th year of his age. Bro. Pegram was born January 13, 1823, and died July 15, 1911, being 88 years, 6 months and 2 days old.

On September 4th, 1855, he was married to Nancy Barrow. To them were born four children, three sons and one daughter, all of whom together with the mother survive him.

He professed faith in Christ and joined Bethel M. P. Church in childhood, and while the exact date is not known, it is thought that he was a member of the church for about 75 years.

For 75 years Allen Walker Pegram walked with God. He was a remarkably good man. Charles Case, Esq., of Oak Ridge, said of him on the day of his burial: "I do not suppose he ever did anything that any one would feel like asking, Why did you do that?" None of his acts were questionable. He was always moral—never sowed any "wild oats." As a member of the church he was faithful and active until old age forbade activity. For the past two years he seldom got out to church, but he greatly enjoyed the visits of his pastor and loved to talk of spiritual things.

He was a man of robust health, though not a large man. He was temperate in all things, and moved on in the even tenor of his way. His entire life was spent in the Bethel community. On last Saturday A. M. he was stricken with paralysis after eating his breakfast, and at 1 P. M. his spirit went home to God.

On Sunday at 3 o'clock P. M his funeral was preached by his pastor, in Bethel church from the text, "Thou shalt come to thy grave in full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season." A very large congregation, filling the large church to overflowing, was present.

Truly a good man has gone, and a land mark has been removed from the Bethel community, but he has accomplished his mission. His work was finished, and like a shock of corn, ripe and ready for the gathering, so was he ready to be gathered in the skies.

Geo. Thomas Lineberry.

Thomas Lineberry was born July 27, 1879, died July 22, 1911, aged 32 years, 11 months and 22 days. He had been a member of Mt. Pleasant Church for several years. A few hours before his death, Thomas was, apparently, in normal health. While feeding a threshing machine at his father's house on last Saturday he became sick and fell to the ground. A physician was called, but death came shortly afterwards, regardless of all that could be done. The body of the young man was laid to rest in Mt. Pleasant cemetery on Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. W. D. Fogleman.

The church was packed to overflowing with people who came to pay the last tribute of respect to the remains of one who had many friends. Thomas always seemed to be a good natured boy, full of fun, jovial, and happy; ever looking on the sunny side of life.

The bereft father and stepmother have the sympathy of many friends.

May this dispensation of God's providence help us to more fully realize that "it is appointed unto man once to die."

WHAT THE FARMERS MIGHT DO.

At the last Presidential election there were cast for all parties a total of 14,888,442 votes. The latest available census figures report the number of farms with buildings in the United States to be 5,535,611. Allowing one voter to each farm, which is a conservative estimate, we have a total agricultural vote approximating forty per cent. of the whole.

These figures are eloquent in their suggestion of power. "The fault is not in our stars, but in ourselves that we are underlings," was the reply of one to whom complaint was made of the tyranny of Caesar. Just so; the moment the five and a half millions of farmers in this country, dropping all other issues, stand solidly for their rights and privileges, that moment will justice be done them.

Already the farmers of Germany, oppressed by the excessive cost of imperialism and bearing on their shoulders the burden of an immense army, are joining together in self-defense. How long would the American farmer be compelled to wait for a parcels post, internal waterways, the extension of rural mail facilities, and the improvement of the highways, if instead of being divided upon issues that only remotely concern their well-being, they were unitedly insistent in demanding the things that deeply affect their prosperity?

Think for a moment of what five and a half millions of sturdy citizens mean, the backbone of their country, the very foundation of its industry, and the most potential body to-day inAmerica—if united. No other nation in the world can produce such a force—such a power for righteousness and material prosperity. What a shame that this splendid strength should be frittered away piecemeal upon issues that are not worth while, and in the service of those who are not in sympathy with our aims!—Farm Journal.

NEVER FEAR.

God knows what is best our hearts to give,
Be it clouds or sunlight bright;
He knows what will strength and faith renew,
He knows, he will guide us right.

Never fear when the way seems dark and drear,
Never fear that his love has gone;
Through love and pity he sends the clouds,
That we may be nearer him drawn.

Never grieve over that which you cannot change;
Never grieve for earth's sweet flowers;
Rejoice to know through love God sends
To our souls the strengthening showers.

Sing praise when everything seems going wrong;
Remember that Christ makes right;
Remember, a home awaits us above,
Where all is joy and light.

JUNIOR CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

The Junior C. E. Society is a natural and inevitable outgrowth of the Christian Endeavor movement. Many pastors and churches have felt that while the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor was answering the needs of the young men and women and of the older boys and girls, yet the younger boys and girls, who could not attend the regular weekly prayer meeting held in the evening, were in some degree left out of the plan.

In the college town of Tabor in southwestern Iowa was the first Junior Society formed. There were no older Christian Endeavor Societies in town, because the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations of the College seemed to fill their place; but for the children there was no Christian organization, and the idea occurred to Rev. J. W. Cowan, who was then an earnest pastor in that town, to form them into a Junior Christian Endeavor Society. The date of this first Society is March 27, 1884. There were eleven charter members, all of whom have grown up into earnest Christian manhood and womanhood.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS IN THE BEGINNERS' CLASS.

In seeking the secret of success in the beginners' class, it might be well to ask first, What is the purpose of the beginners' department? Perhaps we have all heard of the little boy who, when asked what the Sunday school was, replied: "It's the place where the little kids give up their pennies, and don't get nothin' back." Surely there was no beginners' class in that Sunday school. All of us have been in Sunday schools where the little children from three to six years of age were so restless and noisy, the older people could not enjoy, nor satisfactorily profit by, the instruction given. What is the trouble in such cases? Just this: they do not understand what is being done and said. It is as if you were to try to teach a little child color by presenting to him fine works of art in which many different delicate hues were shaded from one to the other. If you want to teach a child color, you show him primary colors, red, blue green; these are such things as his mind can grasp. The purpose, then, of the beginners' class is to make spiritual truth and the work of the Sunday school intelligible to children between the ages of three to six.

Since that is the purpose of the beginners' class, it seems to me that the secret of success in this work is to adapt methods to the children's needs and development. Yet, when the secret is discovered, is the problem solved? The key to success in any reationship of life is not necessarily hard to find. The problem of greater importance is the fitting of this key into the various doors of opportunity, which swing open or remain closed for each one of us according to our diligence in inserting the key. For each Sunday school there is a door of opportunity in the beginners' department. Yet, each Sunday school presents a unique combination of conditions, and the key to success must be inserted carefully and persistently until it fits, and the door is unlocked.

One of the first things to remember in organizing a beginners' class is, that the work is to be planned in an entirely different way from that of the Intermediates, the Juniors, and even the Primaries. If different kinds of cultivation are necessary for growing different plants, how much more important it is that methods be adapted to the proper development of each child in the Sunday school, where plants are being grown for eternity in the souls of the pupils. The ages nine, ten, eleven, and twelve include what is known as the "golden memory" period; consequently, memory work is strongly advocated for such pupils. In the beginners' department, however, much memory work has the effect that a great deal of sunshine has on delicate flowers, causes vitality to wilt. During the years three, four, five and six the child's brain grows much more rapidly than in after years, and should not be taxed. Perhaps none of their work will be such that it can be exhibited to advantage. They may not sing their songs perfectly, nor give correct answers to questions. This is the time when the roots of character are busy taking a firm hold on life, and there is no time for showy accessories.

The work for beginners must be chiefly impressionistic. Definite results should not be looked for, as in the higher grades. The teacher of the beginners is the artist; the child's mind, the canvas upon which she works. In some cases, the result of her work is brought out most beautifully, so that almost any one could appreciate its value. In other cases, the result seems incomplete and faulty. Yet, there is often more beauty in these soul pictures than the casual observer sees. The great Master Artist may be preparing through these imperfect sketches some of the finest productions of His art.

No doubt, the most difficult part of beginners' work is the imparting of spiritual truth. This is no easy task to be learned by rote. Moral truths must not be pointed at the children. They should be allowed to imbibe them from the lesson stories, the circle talks, and from the teacher's actions. Far more is gained by what the teacher does than by what she says. The truths to be taught at this time of life are those fundamental in character, obedience, love to God and to one another, love of right and duty, prayer, and childlike faith. The child's relationship to God should be emphasized as that of the child to his father. This relationship is familar to little children, and helps them to gain a true conception of God.

Another important requisite for success in the beginners' class is to have a teacher who is sympathetic with child nature and understands it. She should have a generous supply of imagination, and be able to look at things from a child's viewpoint. She should be so filled with the spirit of youth as to enter heartily into their games and childish pleasures. It is needless to emphasize the importance of faithfulness, patience and enthusiasm, as these are requisites of all good teachers. To be a good story teller is necessary to the success of this department. This art can be acquired to a great extent by studying stories written by Miss Harrison and other good story-tellers, memorizing their stories and noting their methods. The last requisite to be mentioned for the teacher of beginners is one that should permeate all others and bind them together—love for the children, a true, sensible, wise love for them. Those teachers who have not yet had opportunity to prepare fully for this department need not be discouraged. A wise love for the pupils solves many problems that could not be solved by closest study of numerous books.

In seeking to adapt the work to the needs of the children, material aid is gained by proper equipment. It is strongly urged by international workers that a separate room be used for beginners. If that is impossible, space should be curtained or partitioned off in some way. Besides this, at the State Sunday school Convention in Richmond this year, it was emphasized as of great importance that the beginners have a separate session throughout the school period, in order to provide opening and closing exercises they can understand and enjoy. Small chairs the children can sit in comfortably are also necessary. Hooks to hang hats and wraps on are a helpful addition to the equipment. Appropriate pictures on the wall give a tone of inspiration to the room. Reproductions of famous paintings are especially good, such as Little Samuel. the Sistine Madonna, Hoffman's Head of Christ, and the Good Shepherd. A blackboard, a musical instrument, and a cabinet to hold books and papers are desirable.

The program for the beginners' class suggested by the International Association, with a few changes, is as follows:

1. Before the session opens, the teacher or assistant should be present to provide hand work to keep busy early comers. They might help in the arrangement of the room, look over pictures, or assist one another to remove wraps.

2. Circle Work.—Call to order by quiet music.

(a) The Children's Greeting Song—"Good Morning to You."

(b) Prayer Song, to encourage a reverent, prayerful attitude.

(c) Prayer, led by teacher, repeated by chidren:

"Dear Father, we thank thee for our church,
And for our Sunday school, so dear,
We thank thee for the Sabbath day,
And for thy ever loving care.
For Jesus' sake, Amen."

Instead of this, the following kindergarten prayer may be used:

"Dear Father, we thank thee for the night.

And for the pleasant morning light;
For rest, and food, and loving care,
And all that makes the world so fair.
Help us to do the thinsg we should,
And be to others kind and good.
In all we do and all we say,
To grow more loving every day.
For Jesus' sake, Amen."

(d) New scholars and visitors welcomed—song.

Cradle Roll Service—song.

Birthday Service. A special exercise is provided, including an appropriate song and prayer.

(e) Offering received and attendance marked. To give variety, the children may march while making their offering. Letting the class count the pennies in concert awakens interest. To teach the true beauty of giving, Miss Frayser, at the State Concention, suggested having two offerings, good money and best money. The good money is that which some one has given the child for Sunday school; the best money is what he has earned or saved by denying himself. She arranged to use the best money to help some needy person the children know of, so that they could appreciate the joy of giving.

(f) Several songs chosen by the children.

(g) Circle Talk. This should prepare for the lesson, and should be directed with simplicity, about things with which the children are familiar.

3. Rest Exercise.—Marching or some other physical exercise.

4. Story Period.—This is the climax of the hour. A slight pause after the story often adds to its effectiveness.

5. Hats and Wraps put on.

6. Good-bye song.

7. Papers and cards distributed

It is strongly urged that throughout the program the children be kept occupied, though not taxed. They are bundles of energy; the need is to direct this energy in a way beneficial to their development. Simple kindergarten games are often very helpful, finger games especially.

Flowers in the room create a pleasant, uplifting atmosphere.

Repetition of the same thought from Sunday to Sunday is encouraged. Their minds ought not to be overcrowded with many new thoughts.

A few memory verses are prescribed by the International Committee as supplementary work. They are very short, however, such as "God is love."

The secret of success, then, in the beginners' class, is the adapting of methods. such as those already discussed, to meet the child's needs. When these are applied to suit conditions, and are united with earnest, believing prayer, success must be the result, even if not discernible at once to the human eye. Would we dare neglect this important part of our Sunday school work in this day of kindergartens, when so much helpful literature on child study can be secured? In this day, too, when people are realizing more and more the need of preventive rather than corrective measures for the improvement of social conditions, will the Sunday school be found wanting in so important a branch of its work as that for its youngest pupils? Too many young men and women, and older people, too, are out of God's fold because they did not in earliest childhood receive training in a way their minds could understand. Surely we are not willing for the children of our Sunday schools to grow up without the advantages which, with a little labor and perseverance, it is within our power to give them.

(Miss) Margaret Brickhouse.

OUR STUDENT POPULATION.

Just about this time the attention of Canadian people is called rather forcibly to our schools, colleges, and universities on account of their examinations and closing exercises, and we note with considerable pride the fact that the schools still call for the very best of our young men and women. A nation without high intellectual aspirations will soon become decadent, and we are unfeignedly glad that school and college life still appeals strongly to so many thousands of our Canadian youth.

And we are glad to note the efficiency and agressiveness of our educational institutions. There is an undoubted tendency in purely academic education to become bookish and possibly more or less out of touch with the world about it. But in this century events are moving so rapidly in the development of the material resources of this and other continents that the swing of the pendulum seems to be now the other way; and education is apt to be narrowed all too much to special training, but leaves him with an outlook upon life that is too often most woefully narrow.

But whether it be a one-sided or an all-round education which our students are securing, the most important matter is what they are going to do with it. The scholar who loves his books (and what true scholar does not?), and who dreams of a life of pleasant companionship with them alone, has surely missed the path. And the student whose brilliant course has given him a taste of fame, and whose life goal now is the applause of his admiring associates, has failed to see the deeper meaning of life. And the one whose sole idea it to coin his skill and knowledge into yellow gold has failed still more lamentably to seize the real value of his education.

Education helps a man to enjoy the society of men and books, but this is not its end and aim. It sometimes opens avenues to fame, but this is not its mission. It often, like Midas, is possessed of "a golden touch," but its chief value lies elsewhere. It helps the man that he may help others. Education is largely wasted when it becomes selfish. The educated youth has many privileges, but to every privilege is attached a responsibility. The educated man should be always a center of refining and enlightening forces. The man who sulks in his tent because he is not properly appreciated is but a poor sample of manhood.

To the men and women who have had college advantages the country looks naturally for exceptional helpfulness and exceptional public spirit. Canada is deservedly proud of her student population, and at the same time she feels that she has a right to expect of them a broader outlook, a clearer vision, a wider usefulness, and more heroic self-sacrifice than from others whose advantages have been more limited. To whom much is given, of them we reqiure the more.—Christian Guardian (Toronto).

COCA COLA.

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, says that the sale of drug drinks should be prohibited.

The promoters of the best known of these drinks, Coca Cola, have always insisted that their beverage is harmless. Evidently the government chemists are not of that opinion, for on page 268 of the report referred to in the foregoing, this is said: "The prevalence of the "Coca Cola" fiend is becoming a matter of great importance and concern."

Some Southern newspapers are now warning against Coca Cola. One Atlanta paper has recently dared to speak out in behalf of the children who are being sacrificed in health to the avarice of the manufacturers of this drink. The Atlanta Jeffersonian says:

"Any man, woman, boy, or girl who tampers with Coca Cola will form the Coca Cola habit. Any man, woman, boy or girl who has become a slave to the Coca Cola habit is on the road to ruin.

"The appetite, like the whiskey thirst, will establish a mastery over the victim. It will demand more and more. It will go from one glass per day to two, from two to four, loosen the moral structure."

BOYS, BEWARE!

Little by little, your life-work begins,
Little by little, boys, soon you are men;
Little by little, sin comes along,
Honor repulses, won't dwell with wrong;
Then there's a struggle, but manhood is near;
Near to defend, which he values most dear.
If it be honor which wins, ah, then
The bright light will shine in his pathway again—
If it be sin which wins in the strife,
Poor fellow will blindly go struggling through life;
And when in the end he nears the dark stream;
His life will appear as a terrible dream.
A dream that will haunt him by night and by day;
A dream that all earth cannot drive away—
He will think of the time and how nobly he stood
When satan came to him, and called him too good;
"Goody goodness is nonsense" he heard him say,
Let's have a good time, chase dull care away.
His conscience reproved him, plead with him long,
But sin conquered all, poor fellow, was gone;
Away to a realm, where satan has sway—
Away in a dream of the jolly and gay—
Away through time, in a boaster's balloon,
Away to an awful, enternal, sad doom.

MISS MATTIE'S BIRTHDAY GIFT.

The Third Class was going up to the well in Miss Mattie's yard for a pail of water. Not that it needed the whole ten of the Third class to do this. Teddy Raglan and Bobby Foster, who were the only boys in it, carried a pail and headed the procession. Behind them came four pairs of little girls, arm in arm, and each little girl wore a gay pink sun-bonnet and had bare, plump feet.

The Third Class was always glad of an excuse to go over to Miss Mattie's. Miss Mattie lived in a little brown house just across the road from the school-house. It looked like nothing so much as a bird's nest, a little larger than common, among its apple trees and lilac bushes.

When the Third Class was recrossing the yard after its visit to the well, Miss Mattie came to her gate and called to it. She had two jelly cookies apiece for each member of it, and, besides, she gave each of the little girls a bunch of lilies of the valley from the bed under the lilac bushes.

"Isn't Miss Mattie lovely?" said Rosella Brown, as they went down the lane.

"I wish we could do something real nice for her to show her how much we think of her," said Tessie Baker.

Every one looked at Nanny Miller. They were sure Nanny would have an idea if any one would. Nanny was famous in the school for her ideas.

Nanny felt that the occasion called for reflection. She thought very hard all the way back to the school-house, and the others were careful not to disturb her. Then, during the afternoon, she continued thinking hard, to the neglect of her fractions and spelling. She lost five marks in dictation, but she had her reward elsewhere. By the time school was out Nanny had her idea, and the Third Class, understanding this by reason of her triumphant expression, encircled her on the playground.

"Let's make Miss Mattie a jar of potpourri," said Nanny.

"What on earth is that?" asked Teddy.

"I know," said Rosella, nodding sagaciously. "It's a rose-jar."

"Yes, and this is my plan," said Nanny. "You know Miss Mattie is always so good to us. Well, every time she gives one of us anything, or does anything nice for one of us, let that one give a handful of rose leaves for the jar, as long as the roses last. Then, when her birthday comes in November, we can give it to her, and tell her it's just all the nice things she did for us coming back to her in a rose jar."

The Third Class beamed. Nanny had sustained her reputation. Little Ruth Clark sighed privately in relief. She had been so afraid that Nanny's plan might call for some money, and she was so very poor. But she was all right now. There were ever so many big pink roses in the Clark dooryard.

"Of course we must keep it a dead secret until the time comes to give it to Miss Mattie," said Tessie, warningly.

It was agreed that the rose jar should be in Nanny's charge, because she lived in a central place. Mothers and sisters, being told of the plan, approved of it. Mrs. Brown said she would give them a jar, and she sent it over to Nanny, a quaint, dainty, old-fashioned one of blue and gold. Nanny's big sister, Jessie, said she would give the oils and spices necessary, and attend to the curing of the rose leaves as they were gathered.

The roses were just beginning to bloom when the rose jar was started; and from that time for the next two months scarcely a day passed that a chubby fistful of rose leaves—rich red or creamy white, or pale pink or sunshine yellow—was not dropped into the blue and gold jar on the Miller sitting-room table.

Then Jessie Miller took the rose-jar in charge, and put in dear-knows-what delightful things, and the lid was shut down and the jar put away to ripen for two months.

Miss Mattie's birthday came on the first of November. It was very cold and bleak, and the flowers in her garden were all dead. Miss Mattie sat in her little kitchen and sighed. She felt very lonely and sad. There was nobody to remember her birthday, she thought. She could not keep the tears out of her soft brown eyes.

Just then came a rap at the door. Miss Mattie opened it, and there stood the whole Third Class, looking more important than ever a Third Class looked before.

"We have brought you a birthday present, Miss Mattie," said Nanny, politely, "and we wish you many happy returns of the day."

Nanny felt quite relieved when she had got her little speech off. She had rehearsed it a graet many times, but she had been afraid that she would forget it at the critical moment.

"Deary me!" said Miss Mattie.

She opened the little note on the top of the rose jar and read it. Miss Wright, the teacher, had written it.

"Dear Miss Mattie," ran the note, "you have been so good to the boys and girls of the Third Class that they wish to show their gratitude by giving you this jar of potpourri. For every kindness you showed to one of them,a handful of rose leaves went into the jar. The idea was their own, and I think it was a very sweet one; and I am sure every breath of perfume that comes from it will speak to you of the affection and gratitude of your little friends."

"Deary me!" said Miss Mattie again.

She lifted the lid of the rose jar, and it seemed as if the room were filled with the sweetness of a hundred summers. Miss Mattie felt lonely and sad no longer.

She made the members of the Third Class come in and treated them to cake and raspberry sarup in honor of her birthday. When they had gone she read the note again, and took a long, deep sniff of her rose-jar.

"The dear little souls!" she said, very lovingly.—L. M. Montgomery, in Congregationalist.

DECIDEDLY MATTER OF FACT.

A teacher in a near-by town is noted for his patriotic fervor. One day in class, while in a particularly uplifted mood, he turned to one of his pupils, an average boy of twelve.

"Now, Tommy," said he, "tell us what you would think if you saw the Stars and Stripes waving proudly over the field of battle."

"I should think," replied Tommy, "that the wind was blowing."

THE TWO ROSES.

"The rose of Life or the rose of Love,—
Which will you have?" he said;
And one was white as the virgin snow,
And one of the deepest red.

The rose of Life will wither, I thought,
It will fade ere the close of day;
And so to the angel I made reply;
"I will wear Love's rose alway."

The angel smiled as he gave to me
The roses so white and red:
"Who chooses Love's has thus gained Life's,
And 'tis fadeless now," he said.

WHAT IT MEANS TO BE FREE.

Aunt Hitty sighed heavily. "I wonder if we really are free!" she exclaimed to the little company of ladies in the parsonage parlor.

The school teacher, who had taught for twenty-five consecutive terms, quoted glibly: "We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

"Well, it don't say anything about women," grimly remarked Aunt Hitty.

"As a nation we are free," observed the pastor's wife, "but as individuals, I fear we are yet in bondage in many ways."

"Let's draw up another Declaration of Independence," suggested practical Aunt Sally.

"Here's the minister!" exclaimed Aunt Hitty, as he was passing by the door on his way to his study.

"Do come in, Mr. Knight," she called.

"A new Declaration of Independence?" he repeated, musingly, when they had told him of their discussion. "But what sort of liberty do you want?"

"Is there more than one kind?" inquired Aunt Hitty in astonishment.

"There are at least two kinds," the minister replied. "For instance, there is the liberty of the house-fly—a perfectly irresponsible freedom."

Aunt Hitty vigorously flicked a fly from her face. "I don't want that sort of liberty," she remarked. "It's a nuisance."

The minister smiled. "Yet many people do want that sort, especially young folks," he answered. "They are like the man who thought he might fire in any direction he pleased if the powder and shot were his own. They would be free to do wrong as well as to do right."

"What's the other kind?" inquired Aunt Hitty, with a gesture that indicated that this kind was not to be considered.

The minister's face grew serious. "The other kind is that which Phillips Brooks meant when he said: 'Liberty is the fullest opportunity for man to be and do the very best that is possible for him.' In fact, this is the only true liberty."

"But people cannot always have this kind," objected Aunt Hitty.

"Ah!" said the minister, "Bishop Brooks tells us that everything which is necessary for the full realization of a person's life, even though it may seem for a moment to have the character of restraint, is the bringing forth of that person to a fuller liberty. For it comes only through discipline."

"But how, then, can it be liberty?" persisted Aunt Hitty.

"Because only through such discipline is it possible to be and to do one's very best," explained the minister.

"It is hard to believe that this is real liberty," murmured an interested listener.

"Let me illustrate. Giotto could not have drawn his perfect circles with a hand which, in the common sense of the word, is 'free.' A great surgeon has said that his hand could check itself within the two-hundredth of an inch in penetrating a membrane, and this without the aid of sight, but by sensation only. With help of sight, and on a substance which does not quiver or yield, a fine artist can measure to considerable less than the thousandth of an inch."

Aunt Hitty looked awed, but unconvinced. She did not understand science.

"True liberty is always under law," continued the minister, "but the law is not irksome. It is a help rather than a hindrance, for it guards men against the irresponsible, licentious 'freedom' of the house-fly sort."

"In our educational development we are under laws of restraint and self- denial before we can enter into the larger liberty which results from greater knowledge when one has finished a course of study," remarked the school teacher.

"Exactly," said the minister. "We sacrifice our love of ease and many things which seemed pleasures to us before we desired this larger liberty. When a man becomes a Christian, to some he seems to have entered upon a life of bondage and slavery, but Christ says to all His disciples, 'Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.'"

"I wonder why it is that we get such a wrong conception of the Christian life!" exclaimed another of the ladies.

"Because most of us fail to fully understand what it means," replied the minister, earnestly. "Bishop Brooks beautifully illustrates this point. Before becoming a disciple of the Christ, a man is like a bit of iron or steel lying upon the ground. It is bound to be nothing there. It is absolutely separate, distinct, individual and alone. There it lies. What is to make that bit of iron a free bit of iron—free in the true sense? What will let it go forth and do the thing which it is meant to do, but the taking of it and the binding of it at both ends into the structure of which it was made to be a part? Just so, the binding of a man is not the yielding of his freedom. The iron is a free bit of iron only when it is doing what is was made to do when it came forth from the forge of the master who had this purpose in his mind. And we are free only when we are doing and being what God purposed when He made us but a little lower than the angels."

Aunt Hitty nodded approval, and the school teacher said: "This makes true liberty very beautiful and noble."

"Yes, and instead of shutting the gates of men's possibilities, it opens them wider. Life becomes larger, grander, instead of more cramped and restricted. The colonists refused to pay the tax imposed upon them so unjustly by England. But sin imposes a heavier tax upon its subjects, for it robs them of manhood, womanhood, and love for all worthy things."

"I do not like that term, 'serving the Lord,'" remarked the minister's wife. "From such expressions I fear we get our erroneous idea that the Christian life is one of bondage and slavery. Christ said, 'Henceforth, I call you not servants, but friends,' and friends do not talk of the slavery of friendship."

"This is very true," agreed Aunt Hitty. "Don't you remember that when the King told those on his right hand to inherit the kingdom because they had fed, clothed, and given Him drink, they asked in surprise when they had done all those things for Him? They were not thinking of 'serving' Him. Their hearts were so full of love to Him and to others that whenever they saw needy ones they did what they could to help them."

"That is just the point!" exclaimed the minister. "Until people really love Christ they will fail to understand that the life of His followers is not one of prohibition, imprisonment, and restraint, nor even of 'service' in a slavish sense; but a life of true liberty and highest opportunity. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and the love of the Lord is the beginning of liberty."—Zion's Herald.

BY CHARLES A. HINES.

Topic: Lessons From Great Lives. VIII. Job...Job 6:1—11; 42:1—6...(Consecration Meeting).

God often allows the possessions and dear ones of a good man to come to harm, and the entire story of Job is a discussion of why He allows it. There are many posible reasons, and different cases are for different reasons. Sometimes it is to wean us from the world. Sometimes it is to test our faith. Sometimes it is to set the good man before the world as an example of faith in the midst of trial. Sometimes it is to drive us to God for help us and to make us less self-conceited. Sometimes it is to strengthen us by the conflict with difficulties. Sometimes it is to punish us for our sins and lead us to hate them and abandon them forever. Job's three friends insisted that the last reason was the only one; but Job knew that they were wrong, as they certainly were.

There is no finer lesson in Job than his beautiful resignation to God's will: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." If we can honestly say this, we can met any sorrow with a smile.

There is nothing in all literature that is finer than the book of Job. It contains the most superb poetry and the highest philosophy. Study it with a good commentary, and it will become one of your favorite Bible books.

Remember that it is Satan who said, "All that a man hath will he give for his life." The saying illustrates how Satan is a liar and the father of lies.

The climax of Job comes with the appearance of God to the patriarch in the midst of the storm. Not all the arguments of his friends, including Elihu, could bend Job's confidence like a single word from God.

"The Lord turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends." They had been heaping abuse upon him; he would heap coals of fire upon them. Indeed, is there any act in which we come closer to Christ than this prayer for our enemies?

It is rather singular how the same or similar conditions will affect different people. The storm that uproots one tree strengthens the oak. Hard experience that drives some people from God, draws others closer to God, draws others closer to the Lord. Not every vine is like the ivy; while many cling to their supporters with tendrils, the ivy puts forth its thousands of roots.

Trouble came not in Job's life singly. Much lighter affliction has turned the hair white over night, has driven to drink, upset the mind and brought on such despair that suicide seemed a remedy. Less losses have cast a life-long shadow over sunny countenances, and ploughed furrows across youthful and beautiful cheeks.

We sometimes criticise Job's wife, but before we condemn her and withhold from her our sympathy, let us sum up her losses. Seven sons and three daughters—not through sickness, and one at a time, but all at once without a moment's notice, by a heartless cyclone that tore down upon them the house in which they were celebrating, doubtless, the birthday of the oldest son, suggests some one.

Job had wondrous wealth. His substance, including "a very great household," made him "the greatest of the children of the east." His wife could wear the latest hats and dresses, entertain box parties at the most fashionable operas, ride in the costliest automobile. But one day she found herself poorer than penniless. The flight of a meteor is not more swift. These were sore trials for human experiences.

We deplore the counsel of Job's wife, "Renounce God and die," but at the same time she commands sympathy. Too bad she represents a large class of modern times, who, as long as the sea is calm, ply their barks regularly; but as soon as the waves begin to stir, are seen no more. Like the man who built upon the sand, they plan for fair weather only.

We all need a reserve fund faith. Life is troubled with many afflictions, and when these come, if we are only equipped for normal conditions, there is danger of our failing in the storm. The trials of such men as Abraham, Daniel and others of the Bible should strengthen us.

There are other "vexatious experiences" than bereavement and loss that cause shipwreck of faith. "Dost thou still hold thy integrity?" is a question to many today in high places. If sorrow has slain its thousands, "greed for gold" and "thirst for power" have slain their ten thousands.

Job had much occasion for sorrow. His ten children, and all of his property were violently and suddenly swept away from him. Sometimes the loss of some piece of property, or of a friend will cause some unthoughtful person to curse God. Even though all were gone, he said, "Jehovah gave and Jehoveah hath taken away; blessed be the name of Jehovah." "In all this Job sinned not nor charged God foolishly."

Job's friends misunderstood his trouble. They tried to convince him that he had some grievous sins for which God was punishing him, therefore confess and be forgiven. One says, "Whoever perished being innocent?" "Behold happy is the man whom God correcteth."

Paul tells us, "God is the Father of mercies and God of all comfort. He comforteth us in all of our affliction through the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God." We should bring to the sorrowing a knowledge of God and his mercies. Let his consolation be a sufficient message to the afflicted.

THE FRUITS ARE BAD.

Those who have accepted the teachings of what is called "higher criticism", but which is really destructive criticism, are saying that they now have much better views of the Bible than they had in former years. Some preachers of this kind say that the Bible is a new book to them since they obtained the modern methods of studying it. They say that they are not now obliged to believe many things in the Bible which they once thought that it was necessary for them to believe and preach. Of course, such ones can see no harm in the theory which leads its subjects to disbelieve those things in the Bible that are contrary to their own big reason. They do not see that their faith in God is being lessened; nor do they seem to realize that their former reverence for God's word is being destroyed. The fact is, the general fruit of an acceptance of such views is bad everywhere. It must be so, for anything that leads one to indulge in doubts about God and the Bible is decidedly bad. I quote some words from Prof. F. Bettex, of Germany, who is a competent authority. He says: "Suppose that all the teachings of this criticism were true, what would it avail indeed. For then, sitting beside ruined temples and broken-down altars, with us? It would put us in a sad condition no joy as respects the hereafter, no hope of everlasting life, no God to help us, no forgiveness of sins, feeling miserable, all desolate in our hearts, and chaotic in our minds, we should be utterly unable either to know or believe anything more. Can such a view of the world, such a religion, which, as was said of Prof. Harnack's lectures in America, only destroys, removes and tears down, be true? No! If this modern criticism is true, then away with all so-called Christianity, which only deceives us with idle tales! Away with a religion which has nothing to offer us but the common-place teachings of morality! Away with faith! Away with hope! Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die!" One would better have no religion at all than to have one which is beguiling the souls of people and teaching them to fall. I urge you to cling fast to the holy Bible, and defend it with all your might.

C. H. Wetherbe.

RIGHTEOUSNESS.

The uplift of righteousness has been the theme of many a sermon and many a song. But what is righteousness? The dictionary says it is purity of heart and rectitude of life, being and doing right. But what is right? The American people are very much mixed on this question. We have so many people from so many countries with so many different standards and ideals that there seems to be much confusion.

Some console themselves that since there are so many conflicting opinions it is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to determine what is right. Many are right glad that it is difficult, for they think it makes little difference what a man believes or what he does; for one man's opinions are as good as another's and no one is bound by the standard of his neighbor. They say that what is right for one may be wrong for another, and what is right at one time and in one place may be wrong at another time and in another place.

Amid all this fog and dust what is becoming of our convictions? One may hear scoundrels lauded as honest men and unscrupulous politicians praised as good citizens.

Yet it is not difficult for any one who really wishes to know and to do right to find the way. If men will abandon the search for what is popular and fashionable and expedient and profitable, and seek only to know the truth and obey it, they will not be troubled with many doubts. The fog will clear away and they will see plainly. Let us go on to do the right as God shall give us to see the right, and we shall know. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." If we are as eager to know what is right and to be right as we are to find some excuse for doing as we please, we should find the way.

There is one God and one way of righteousness. The law of righteousness is as simple as the law of gravitation. There is but one. Men may dispute and quibble and confuse their own minds and throw dust in the eyes of their neighbors, but the law of the Lord is right, and the way of the transgressor is hard.—N. Y. Advocate.

MAKING FRIENDS.

We know a few people who move about the world in a doleful way and with an ever-present feeling that nobody likes them. They are unhappy and they would be glad to be liked, but they are waiting for people to take hold of them.

It is our duty to make friends. We must have a will to do this. They are to be made by an active and thoughtful effort on our part to be friendly. We must do things for people, be considerate and thoughtful of their wants and their comforts and convenience. It is well to remember that we all have in the long run all the friends we are entitled to have. The good Book has something to say to the effect that he who would have friends must show himself friendly.

The second rule to observe, after we have on our own part shown abundance of kindness to those about us, is that we must not be looking out to see whether people respond to our overtures for friendship. At least we must not look too narrowly and too closely to this. Let it take care of itself. Do not open up an account of credit and loss with people, and watch them to see whether they keep the account up on their sides. Deal generously with the world.

SOFT DRINKS.

The American Bottler's Protective Association (an organization of soft drinks manufacturers) adopted a resolution deploring the tendency to put upon the market beverages on the order of the extract of Cola nut, Coca leaf or other caffeine, or cocaine extracts, declaring them detrimental to public health and placing the organization on record as opposed to their sale. Mrs. Allen, National Superintendent of Medical Temperance, says: "As cocaine is the most destructive drug known to humanity its presence in so-called temperance drinks is a frightful evil calling for speedy legislation. It is pratically impossible to cure a person of the cocaine habit. This drug causes insomnia, dyspepsia, chronic palpitations, and complete paralysis of will-power, with a tendency to criminal acts. When a person becomes habituated to its use he suffers torments when not under its influence. The real cocaine fiend will rob or kill to get the drug. What can be thought of men who, knowing the deadly nature of this drug, will hide it away in a drink sold as harmless to children and women who would never touch beer or wines? It is placed in the drink to form a craving for that drink and thus create a demand that will enrich the conscienceless manufacturers."

There is an open field for white ribbon endeavor, to purge soda fountains and soft drink stands of dangerous articles and cultivating a demand for cleanliness and more sanitary conditions thereabouts. These refreshing drinks may be made to serve a mighty influence in the struggle against the saloon, but every particle of deterioration must be removed from ingredients and environment.—N. C. White Ribbon.

DUKE WAS NO COMMON MAN.

Two of Britain's greatst fighters, Lord Nelson, the hero of Trafalgar, and the Duke of Wellington, nicknamed "Old Nosey," met but once in their lives, and that meeting occurred in the little hall of No. 10 Downing Street. Beside the quaint old fire-place there they entered into a general conversation, and Nelson was so impressed with the Duke that he asked a servant who was the man with the striking nose.

"Major-General Sir Arthur Wellesley, my lord," replied the servant, astounded at the sailor's ignorance.

"Ah!" said Nelson. "I thought he was no common man."—Oscar Frichet, in "No. 10 Downing Street," National Magazine for July.

Entrance requirements equal to those of the best colleges in the country, a strong faculty of university men, and courses requiring sixty-nine hours for the Bachelor's degree, make Elon a college whose graduates are admitted to the graduate departments of the leading Universities of the country. Courses in Business, Elocution, Art, Music, and Pedagogy are offered leading to certificates and degrees.

EQUIPMENT. Splendid Library and Reading Room, ample grounds, laboratories, large dormitories, buildings equal to the best, with every equipment and appliance makes Elon stand among the from rank of colleges in the South. All buildings are heated by steam and lighted by electricity, and have water and bath rooms on every floor.

ECONOMY. All expenses can be paid for the college courses for from $125.00 to $200.00 a year according to the student's power of economy and his place selected for board and room.

COEDUCATIONAL. Parents who read The Methodist Protestant Herald can send both their sons and daughters to Elon College with the assurance that they will have the best that the educational world has to offer.

PARSON KENTON'S FAREWELL SERMON.

Parson Kenton made a great mistake in his farewell sermon. Other parsons had made the same mistake, and he should have avoided it. But there was great provocation, and he yielded to the temptation.

There were four factions in Parson Kenton's large church; a Smith faction, a Jones faction, a Barnard faction, and a Bruton faction. These factions were about equal in numerical strength and about equal otherwise. No man could tell any reason for the division into factions, but the division was there, a stubborn fact, continuing through pastorate after pastorate. The lines of cleavage seemed to follow the boundaries of the influence of four men in the congregation whose names I have already indicated. The followers of Smith would not have thanked you for the information that Smith was leading them. Perhaps they were unconscious of the fact, but fact it was. So of the other three. Each leader had superior confidence in his own judgment, and therefore it was a matter of conscience with him to have his own way. Thus there was perpetual strife among the four, and among the four groups of faithful followers.

When a new pastor was to be called, Smith must be on the committee, of course. And Jones must be on the committee, of course. And Barnard must be on the committee, of course. And Bruton must be on the committe, of course.

Before Mr. Kenton had been recommended, there had been a long series of trial sermons from various candidates from a distance. Distance lends enchantment. The Smith-Jones-Barnard-Bruton church was a large church, and the pastorate of it looked well from far away. So there was no difficulty in inducing young and unwary ministers to come and preach for a Sunday. The difficulty was afterward, when the committee of four met to decide. Smith was in favor of trying still more candidates, that he might be sure of the very best available. Jones was eager to have a pastor, and felt that a poor preacher was greatly to be preferred to none at all. Barnard was critical, but thought when Kenton came and preached his trial sermon, the time had come to issue a call. Bruton was delighted with the previous candidate named Harvey, and moved that the committee now proceed to recommend one of the trial preachers. Barnard seconded the motion. Smith opposed in a feeling speech, but Jones voted for the motion, and Smith was defeated. Now Bruton moved that Harvey be recommended. Barnard preferred Kenton, and Jones stood with him. Smith did not wish either Harvey or Kenton, but voted for Kenton to get even with Bruton. So Kenton was recommended in a majority report, while Bruton brought in a minority report in favor of Harvey. Smith explained his position, saying he would still prefer to postpone the call, but if any one was called now, he would vote for Kenton. A vote was taken in the congregation, resulting in a considerable majority for Kenton, but with the wish in the minds of many that he would not stay long.

Kenton felt honored by the call, and gave up a delightful pastorate in a smaller church for the sake of the larger field. He entered heartily and earnestly into the new work, but somehow there was not evident a spirit of co-operation, such as he had been accustomed to see in the churches he had served. It was not long until he was called on privately by Smith, Jones, Barnard, and Bruton in succession. Each sought in a covert and indirect way to bias the preacher's mind against the other three, and to impress him that his only chance of success lay in allying himself with the faction represented by the speaker. Kenton was intensely disgusted, but he managed to restrain himself from any expression of his feeling.

As time passed, and question after question arose for decision by the congregation, the factional spirit seemed to grow more intense and the factional fight fierger.

Each of the four leaders had selected a different place for the Sunday school picnic, and so stubborn was the contention, that it resulted in four picnics at four different places. Unfortunately, all were held on the same day, and at places so remote from each other that it was impossible for Mr. Kenton to attend more than one of them. He discreetly decided to attend neither. His absence was considered an affront by each of the four factions, and all spent their time in conjecturing to which of the other places he had gone, and in intensifying their anger against him. Poor man! He found himself the object of universal dislike. He resolved to endure this patiently for the sake of the church and the work, but it was not many days until he was waited upon by a committee of four, composed of Deacons Smith, Jones, Barnard and Bruton, requesting his resignation on the ground that he "lacked the breadth of sympathy necessary to lead the diverse elements of his large congregation."

It happened that this year would be completed the next Sabbath, and the committee indicated their desire that the church be closed in the evening, and that the morning service be Mr. Kenton's last.

Had Mr. Kenton had more time to re-fleet and more time for feeling to abate, he would probably have preached a farewell sermon of a different sort. But he was smarting with a sense of gross injustice and cruel wrong, and he did what no minister should ever do: he used the occasion to give vent to his personal feelings. He felt that his parishioners needed to see themselves as others saw them, and he endeavored to draw their pictures. He paid his respects to each of the four factions in order, and for one time he roused every member of the congregation. But they were only roused to anger and restraint, and not to repentance and reformation. Not one of them came to shake his hand and express regret at his departure.

It was a great mistake that Parson Kenton made that day. Had he yielded himself to the power of the Spirit instead of yielding himself to personal feeling, he might have melted that cohort of miserable sinners into a band of penitent seekers after God.

FACE TO FACE WITH ONE'S OWN LIFE.

A writer in one of the magazines said recently that if he were a preacher he would raise his voice in behalf of the individual life. He thinks the individual is lost sight of by too many preachers in considering the needs of society in general. The personal human soul is starving while men are discussing the problems of mankind. "If I were a preacher," he says, "I would talk usually just to one person."

Every one who has received any good thing ought straightway to begin giving it out that others may have it too. But one must receive before one can give. So the personal life must come first. You must feed your own soul or you cannot feed another's soul.

This is universally true. There is the duty of helping others,—the strong are bidden to help the weak,—but one must have in himelsf the ability and the resources of helpfulness before he can do for others what they need. If you are to teach others, you must be taught yourself. Before you can lead men, you must know the paths yourself. No one about to climb mountains would accept a guide who had never acquired skill in mountain-climbing in experiences of his own.

You must face life's problems yourself and master them. No one can do it for you. "Each man shall bear his own burden," says the scripture. Another scripture says, "Bear ye one another's burdens."There is no conflict in these teachings that seem contradictory. It is every one's duty, always, to put his shoulder under his brother's load, but always it is true that every one must bear his own burden, and that no one can bear it for him. God's purpose in all the work of the world is the making of men. Here, what is done must be done by the individual himself. Each man must build his own house. The process is going on continually. All experience contributes to it. Tennyson says:

"I am a part of all that I have met."

Every life we touch leaves something of itself in us. Every book we read puts some mark on our character. Every temptation makes us either stronger, if we resist it, or wounds and hurts us if we yield to it. Every sorrow that befalls us makes us better or spoils our beauty. The effect of these experiences upon us is not accidental, but depends upon the way we receive them.

God's purpose in all our life is our edification, to use one of Paul's suggestive words. This up-building is not all wrought in church services, in acts of worship. Christ is building men all the while—in love-filled homes, in places of labor, in daily companionships and associations, as well as at communion tables or prayer-metings. We say that the business of a carpenter is to make the things that a carpenter usually makes. But God's purpose for the carpenter is the making of a man. The work of a farmer, we say, is to till the soil and reap harvests. But the thought of God in the farmer's work, what He looks for as the real outcome, is a beautiful life. If this result is not reached the farmer's lifs is not successful, however prosperous he may be as a farmer. We say that a man's circumstances make him; but at the center of all the circumstances the real, determining factor is the man himself. Whether the hard knocks you experience through the years make a man of you or wreck your life depends upon the way you meet them. It is you, not your circumstances, that will determine the outcome in your life.

There is need, therefore, for personal preaching at this point. It will not do to tell men merely that their lives are plans of God, that God thought about them before he made them, and then made them to fill a certain place and do a certain work. This is not the whole truth. The other part of the truth is that they have now to fulfil this divine purpose and live out this divine plan. We can spoil God's beautiful plan for our life is we will,—every man does who lives in sin, rejecting the will of God for him and taking his own way instead. We can fall far below God's perfect plan for us by living indolently, self-indulgently. Every man is required to do his best if he would measure up to the divine plan. An English writer says the three words, "That will do," have done more harm than any other three words in the language. Men get easily into the habit of looking at something they have made or done, and, though knowing it is not what it ought to be, or what they could make it, yet indolently let it pass, saying, "That will do." Thus they suffer their work to deteriorate in quality and fall far below God's plan, which requires the best.

It is said that the great violin maker, Stradivarius, would never allow any violin to leave his hands which was not as nearly perfect as he could make it. George Eliot makes Stradivarius say:

"If my hand slacked,
I should rob God,—since he is fullest good,—
Leaving a blank instead of violins.
He could not make Antonio Stradivarius' violins Without Antonio."

It is true we rob God when we do any of our work less well than we could do it. God will help us to do our best, but we must work with him. He will not do our work without us. He will not do our best for us if we work indolently. "He could not make Antonio Stradivarius' violins without Antonio."

Thus at every point we need this lesson of individuality. We must meet life as individuals. We are responsible in a certain way for the good of all men. We owe a duty to "the other man" which we dare not fail to pay. But we must not forget that our first duty is to let God have his full way with ourselves. Keeping other people's vineyards will not be enough if meanwhile we have neglected our own. Doing a great work for others is not enough if we have not let God care for our own life.—S. S. Times.

TWO PICTURES.

A story is told of an artist who began to search for something that he could get an ideal of Heaven from. He wished to paint a picture of the Home or something to represent its beauty and splendor. For four or five years he gazed at the sunrise, the many and beautiful scenes of the day and the lovely sunset, but no picture seemed to present itself that would satisfy his desire.

At last as he was walking down the street one day, he met a small boy with a sunny face, wearing a bright smile and seeming to be as happy as anyone could be. The artist, after getting a good look at the boy, returned to his room and painted, from imagination, the boy's face. For days and days the artist was busily engaged placing every little finishing touch on his master-piece. But as he worked on this, his ideal of Heaven, the thought of what he could paint to represent Hell came to his mind. So, here another search was begun, but like the first, it proved to be a hard task. After ten or twenty years had past, the artist visited a jail where several prisoners were confined. In the strongest cell was found a man who was a murderer, a bad man indeed. The prisoner's face was marked with every line of crime and dissipation.

Here as the artist stood and looked at a man, who, in his estimation, and from the countenance of his face, was the vilest of the vile; a picture of hell.

The artist returned to his room, as before, and began to paint his ideal of hell. When the picture was finished, he placed it, together with his ideal of Heaven, in a conspicuous place, and as people thronged the streets, day after day, passing the pictures and making inquiries about them, it was discovered that both pictures were of the same person.

Now, why the reason? "Sin! sin!! sin!." I hear a hundred voices shout out.

Sin makes mother weep, children suffer, and the world mourn. Sin makes beautiful and promising young men become beggars and criminals, and causes their souls to go down to an awful hell. Sin fills our jails, our asylums, our orphanages, and crowds our homes with suffering and sorrow. But it is needless to enumerate the consequences of sin. Just stop and think how it crucified the Savior of the world, and you can not estimate the other desperate deeds it has done. C. B. R.

THE ABSORBED LIFE.

One who has begun to show what life means when self has died and is replaced by Christ longs to become so completely lost in Christ that there is nothing more to be yielded up to Him. This will evidently not come to pass for any one until the bondage of the corruption of this body is finally done away with. But it is a good goal to have ever before us. The complete and satisfying merging of ourselves in Christ may be likened to a saturated solution in chemistry, when a liquid is impregnated with a dissolved solid until no more of the latter can be taken up. Some definitions of "saturate" are strikingly suggestive of our longings for the fulness of union with Christ: "To fill the substance of, as by absorption, so thoroughly that it will hold no more; to fill to the utmost extent of the capacity for absorbing or retaining." Again, in chemistry, "to satisfy the affinity of." What a blessing it is to hunger and thirst, when we know that we shall be filled! What a comfort that Christ's New Covenant has in it such a daring word as "filled unto all the fulness of God"! That is our goal, and our assurance. How eagerly should we abandon every thing that hinders or delays us in its final attainment!—S. S. Times.

IRREGULAR THOUGHTS ABOUT HEAVEN.

(Among castaway manuscripts of N. Summerbell I find matter somewhat like the following:—)

Heaven, in physical science, signifies the whole expanse surrounding the earth, with its planets, comets, nebulae, and suns.

But men have ever held that in this beautiful expanse, somewhere, there dwelt God, or "the gods", in a celestial empire. All agreed (Plato, Aristotle, Epicurus) that the most elevated part of the heavens was the divine dwelling.

In the religions of the Greeks and Romans none were admitted to this celestial abode but heroes of virtue, and these became demi-gods. In this, was there a shadow of the doctrine intruded into the Garden of Eden, that if men would eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil they should "be as gods"?

The Bible teaches that previous to Christ the "third heaven," the Paradise of God, was not open. Jesus himself said, "No one hath ascended into heaven, but he that descended out of heaven, the Son of man, who is in heaven" (John 3:13). On the day of Pentecost, Peter said, "David ascended not into the heavens" (Acts 2:34). And Paul said, "The Holy Spirit this signifying, that the way into the holy place hath not yet been made manifest, while the first tabernacle is yet standing" (Heb. 9:8); and, "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holy place by the blood of Jesus, by the way which he dedicated for us, a new and living way, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh", etc. (Heb. 10:19—20).

And the first promise of immediate entrance to heaven agrees with such words: for it was by Jesus himself on the cross, who said to the penitent thief, "Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise".

How Jesus cherished companionship!

He prayed to his Father, when near his death, saying, "Father, I desire that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me" (John 17:24). And he even promised his disciples the sweet words, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also" (John 14:3). And in the Garden of Gethsemane he seemed to desire that his disciples watch with him, even though he went a little way from them to pray. The communion service itself is a rite binding us to Jesus very closely.

And Jesus wants us with him in heaven.

And it was not long after Jesus died till the heavens were opened to Stephen the Martyr, and he saw Jesus standing on the right hand of God, ready to welcome him, and cried, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

BIBLE FOR CHINESE EMPEROR.

The Chinese Christians about a dozen years ago presented the dowager empress with a magnificent copy of the Scriptures translated into Chinese. It was a fine example of modern penmanship, the writing being on silk and the covers of the Bible being of silver. The gift was graciously received and her majesty read the book. This excited the emperor's curiosity and he ordered one of the eunuchs to obtain for him a copy of the New Testament.

The books formed part of the loot of the Forbidden City in 1900. The emperor was a close student of the Testament, which was freely annotated by him. The Bible was found in the empress's chamber and the Testament in the emperor's study. The future ruler has been presented with another and less pretentious copy, but this has cost £800. The regent in accepting the gift at the hands of the American Minister promised his excellency that as soon as the emperor had mastered his rudiments he shall study the sacred writings.—London Globe.

—Prof. E. C. Pickering reports that a photograph of the spectrum of the comet Kiess was obtained at Harvard on July 7, with the 8-inch Draper telescope, which showed the two bands 3883 and 4737 bright, and nearly equal. In Daniel's comet of 1907 the former band was much the fainter of the two. Commodore T. E. De Witt Veeder, superintendent of the U. S. Naval Observatory at Washington, states that Kiess' comet was observed on July 13, and that it was visible through an opera glass.

A four-year-old boy was attending his first vaudeville performance. Everything went well until the low comedian appeared with his dialect and horse-play. The child burst into tears and could not be comforted. At last he sobbed out, "He thinks he's funny—but I don't."

—Robert Causey, of Tabernacle, died last Friday morning after a lingering illness with Addison's disease, which is a rather uncommon malady. An obituary notice is printed elsewhere.

THE MINISTRY OF THE SHINING LIFE.

BY REV. TIMOTHY P. FROST, D. D.

"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."—Matt. 5:16.

Let us approach this saying of Jesus by an Old Testament path. It is in the book of Daniel that we read: "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." That the wise and those who turn many to righteousness are the only persons who shall thus shine is not affirmed. It is conceivable that some of the foolish, according to the accepted standards of this world, and some who fail to turn many to righteousness, will be partakers of this starry glory. The luminosity of the persons may not be a halo thrust upon them as a reward of soul-winning. It is not wholly, nor perhaps chiefly, because they turn many to righteousness that they shine. Rather do they turn many to righteousness because they shine. They shine as stars because they are stars; because they have light in themselves. Shining is by a law of their nature. It is of the character. They are inevitably luminous. One of them might be some Robinson Crusoe, cast away on a lone island, without even a man Friday to whom he could talk religion, thus having no opportunity to turn anybody to righteousness. But he would shine forever for all that. Or, if not a castaway, shut out from human society, he might be like Noah, who was a preacher of righteousness among a people in sore need of righteousness, but who does not appear to have succeeded in turning many to righteousness.

TURNING PEOPLE TO RIGHTEOUSNESS

is a thing which the shining life is likely to do. That is why I am preaching about it. It is an evangelistic force, and an unanswerable argument for Christianity. Precisely that truth shines forth from the text. According to these words of Jesus about Christians as the light of the world the shining life produces this result—that men, looking on it, glorify the Father in heaven. And the only thoroughgoing way of glorifying Him is by becoming like Him. No formal worship, no amount of gloria singing or glory-shouting will do it so long as men are persistently unlike Him. Jesus glorified the Father by being like Him, by doing the works of his Father among men. So it is by beholding somewhere the glory of the Lord, and becoming changed into the same image from glory to glory, that we glorify Him.

There is no difficulty in understanding how the shining life is an evangelistic force. It helps other lives to shine, makes them want to shine, makes it easier for them to do it, shows them how they may. Of course there are persons who would not shine with heavenly light if they could. They choose darkness rather than light. But there are others, who, when they behold the shining life, are attracted to it, and desire to become connected with the power which makes it bright with the glory of the Lord.

Whatever shines, not only is different from things which do not shine, but also, is seen to be different. A simple and obvious fact, but worthy of attention. The arc light, for instance, which lights the street, is seen to be different from bricks, stones, and other objects which do not shine. Men who see its light know that it is connected with a plant which makes it shine. The laborer who "homeward plods his weary way" in the early evening of the short winter day may not know where the plant is, or understand how it works; the wonders of electrical learning may be a sealed book to him; but he knows that there is a light and power plant somewhere which makes this light shine. He knows that this thing, so bright that no man with eyes in his head can help seeing it, is dependent upon an unseen source for its glow.

So it is with the Christian who really is a light to the world. Men see that he has a life which differs from their life. They are convinced that its source is a power with which they are not connected as he is. They are also aware that it is the soul work in that life which tells. Not merely the works of the hands, or of the tongue, but the works of the soul. There is something throbbing at the power center of that life which makes it unlike other lives.

This brings us to a certain issue presented in the volume of testimony which we call the Bible. According to this testimony God is pledged to do certain things for persons who meet certain conditions. The testimony is gathered up from a variety of individuals whose lives are scattered along a period of more than a thousand years, and centers in God's Son, Jesus Christ. This Son of God pledges Himself to do a certain thing in those whose life is wholly given up to Him, namely, to transform them, to bring to pass a new creation in them, so that old things pass away and new things come, so that they are brought into the righteous and blessed life of sons and daughters of God. Furthermore, he declares that people with whom the transformed associate, and whose lives are not given up to Him, will know that the lives thus given up are thus transformed and do differ from lives not thus surrendered. They will know that there is a power and quality in those surrendered lives not found in other lives.

Now, does Jesus Christ so transform the lives given up to Him as to make it evident that they are not of the worldly sort, or does He not? That is the issue. We have no disposition to evade it. We could not if we would. The unbelieving world is too intelligent and too shrewd to be fooled at this point. If the Master cannot do this then Christianity is doomed. Something bearing the name, some noble system of ethics, some humane ministry, some religious philosophy or philosophy of religion, may persist for a time, but Christianity will perish and deserves to perish. It will have lasted its little day, and have done its work, partly beneficent, and then will go its way like other delusions. But, on the other hand, if the Master does make new every life wholly given up to Him, there is only one way in which Christianity can fail. Its failure can come only by the failure of men and women and children to yield themselves to Him for transformation. Especially disastrous would be the failure of any large number of those who bear His name to be given up to His transforming power. The time has come when the world will accept no other evidence of the truth and power of Christianity than the evidence of a transformed life. That evidence the world will accept, and must accept, if it be presented. If those who are not given up to Him see that others who are given up to Him are transformed according to the testimony of the book, they will believe the book, and some of them will seek that kind of life.

The people of the churches cannot save the world by proxy or by machinery. The experiment, wherever made, does not work out to a triumphant success. The world can be saved by no other means than by saved lives, and the people must furnish these lives in their own persons. They cannot accomplish their task by maintaining Sunday schools, hiring pastors, holding meetings, securing evangelists, and conducting evangelistic campaigns, supporting societies of several kinds for propagating the Gospel, engaging in various forms of social service, and promoting reform movements. That such activities are good and useful, and even necessary, there need be no question. But the one thing without which all of this is largely or wholly a failure too many of the people in the churches, it is to be feared, are not doing. If we would win men, we must give ourselves up to Christ without reservation. We must cease having our way in business, politics, pleasures, or any nook or corner of the life. Christ must have His way everywhere. The entire life must be handed over to God for that purpose. We must put into the world and keep in the world a life which is radically different from the worldly life. We must repudiate the worldly mood, temper, spirit, attitude, and methods. We must cease to go with the world and to be like it. We must become unlike the world and move

APART WITH GOD.

Because the Christian religion is not a philosophy, but a life. Of course there is a philosophy of the life. Men must have a philosophy of everything that interests them under the sun, or in the sun, or above the sun. But our religion does not depend upon our philosophy to any great extent. Rather does the philosophy depend upon the religion. As when you see an eagle in the air, if you are interested in eagles and in flying and you are a thinking person, you may get a philosophy of the eagle's flight. The flying is the source or at least the occasion of your philosophy, not the result of it. Your philosophy does not make the slightest difference with the flying, or exert the least influence upon it. It cannot change the flop of a wing or the movement of a feather. Neither is it probable that the eagle has any philosophy which affects his flight. So when a human soul mounts up with wings as an eagle, you may have a philosophy of that soul flight, but it flies without much aid from the philosophy, even though it be your own soul that flies. More than one philosophy of that soul's religion there may be. Probably there will be about as many philosophies as there are persons who do any real thinking about it. But the religion goes on its heavenly way in spite of all the philosophies. They change. As a vesture they may be folded up. The religion abides. They are of men. It is of God. Yes, the shining life, at heart, it is pretty nearly the same yesterday, today and forever.

The world is to be won by it, so far as the world is to be won to Christ, and without it the world cannot be won and held to the Christian faith. The saving of the world, so far as it is committed to us, is not chiefly a matter of movements and of methods, but of life. It is a matter of character made dynamic by the Spirit of God. I hope I shall not be misunderstood, and yet I must take some chances. "Necessity is laid upon me, yea, woe is unto me," if I preach not this Gospel. The greatest need and the strongest hope of the kind of evangelization which promotes the kingdom of God with power is not foreign missionary effort, or home missionary effort, or city missionary effort, as usually understood and presented, or social service of the organized variety, or evangelistic campaigns, or the entire series of kindred movements. Of great use they are. Essential most of them, or all of them, may be. But with all these movements we shall go on at a poor, dying rate, without the power of a transformed life, wherever Christians perform their tasks or seek their pleasures. Something more is needed from us than to send missionaries abroad and promote elevating schemes at home. That something is to live a life aglow with the glory of God and His righteousness in every place and in every relation.

These shining lives vindicate the Bible, so far as it is to be vindicated by anything outside itself and its God. It cannot be vindicated alone, or chiefly, by books, arguments, and all the fruits of scholarship, useful as they are, and mighty as they are, in the life of any age. This is not to be understood as an utterance concerning the personal needs of the scholars themselves. How the Bible is to be vindicated in their thinking, I do not attempt to set forth. I refer to people outside the learned clan. Men to whom the Bible is a living book, which needs no vindication, may find the arguments of Christian scholars to be comforting to faith and useful in promoting many things for which the Bible stands; but people whose faith is shaken, and who wonder whether these Biblical writers wrote from God or of themselves, are not likely to have their doubts settled by historical or philosophical arguments in behalf of the divine authority of the book, because on the other side are plentiful and scholarly arguments in support of its purely human character. Though they look into books which make it appear that the Bible is from God, they may forthwith look into other books and magazine articles which make it appear that the Bible is from men alone. But when they look into human lives, and behold the spiritual prophecies of the Hebrew seers, the words of Jesus and the words of the apostles fulfilled in those lives; when they behold the spiritual wonders of the Bible lived before their eyes, there they look upon an argument which cannot be refuted. Such fulfillment of prophecy will vindicate the book from the follies of its defenders and the attacks of all its foes.

These shining lives also

VINDICATE THE CHURCH.

Not that a church made up of them is necessarily a busy factory. It is more like a power plant to furnish energy for factories near and far. Many people think that a church should be organized and equipped for conducting a variety of educational, hygienic, recreative and philanthropic activities within its own boundaries. All proper and profitable, no doubt, if it can be managed without diverting attention from the chief work of the church. A live church is not first of all a hive of religious industry so much as an inspirer of religious industry in many hives. It is a source of energy for religious industry in the midst of all industries, an upper room where disciples sit with the Master, a place where the Holy Spirit comes upon them and moves them with pentecostal power. The chief work of the church is to light up lives with the glory of the Lord and make them potent with energy from Him. They gather in the church to receive light and power into the life, then go their ways, one to his farm and another to his merchandise, that, thus lighted and empowered, they may be lights in every dark or dusky place. The church should send them forth so aflame that they will go on setting others aflame until the whole world is ablaze with their kind of light. In this age of specialists the church of the living God will vindicate itself by specializing the promotion of the shining life.

This is the greatest manifestation of the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Through it the exalted Christ makes His appeal to men. There is no little lamentation over the scarcity of men in religios meetings. It is said that we must enlist personal workers to go out and accost men on the highways, and in the haunts where they work or play, and win them to Christ by direct appeal. Doubtless there is too little direct Christian appeal from a burning heart. Something may be accomplished by inviting men to Christ in one's own words and in quotations from a marked testament. But they will not be brought into the kingdom of God in large numbers by Christ in our talk of Christ in a book, even though that book be the Book of books. Forth from the churches should come people inspired for more effective work than evangelistic talking in missions and on the street corners. Such evangelism may yet be needed, but it is far from being the most fruitful mode of evangelism for our age. The churches should inspire their hosts to do evangelistic living, to practice the presence of God and the religion of Christ, in every detail of the daily life, and thus light up all the world's business and all its other affairs with the glory of Godlike righteousness.

If Christ were to come into the present world and live as he did in the ancient world, much the same things would come to pass which were witnessed when he used to walk in Judea and Galilee. He would win some and repel others, thus making a division among the people, as sheep from the goats. Some would be convinced of the divine power and quality in His life, and would seek the life offered by Him, willing to sacrifice their all to it. Others would be ready to crucify Him, and get Him out of their way.

Well, He went away that He might come again in the lives of His followers. If one Christ would win some people in one land, what would a few scores of Christ lives do in Congress and in State Legislatures? What would a few dozens do in the faculty, and a few hundreds in the student body, of a great university? What would a few hundred thousand of them do in the homes, the pleasure resorts, and the business affairs of our land? Evangelism in meetings is not working in these

PASTORS AND PEOPLE.

PRESIDENT'S APPOINTMENTS.

Asheville, Aug. 6.
Buncombe, Aug. 8-13.
Ivy, Aug. 15-17.
Yarboro and Anderson, Aug. 19-22.

When it can be done I shall be glad for pastors to have a circuit rally and have all the churches on the charge largely represented.

Very truly,
W. E. Swain.

Stanley Circuit.

The third quarterly conference of this Circuit will convene at Mill Grove on Saturday before the third Sunday in August. Preaching at 11 A. M. by Rev. W. D. Reed. Quarterly Conference in the afternoon. A full turnout of the official brethren is much desired.

E. G. Lowdermilk, Pastor.

High Point.

It has been some time since there was any report from the High Point S. S. For the month of July the attendance was as follows: 191, 217, 214, 220, 227, making an average of 214 for the hot Sundays of July. Our attendance is usually better than that, and will be better from now on through the fall season. Our picnic will be held on August 10th.

In His Name,
A. G. Dixon.

Reidsville, N. C., R. F. D. 5.

Mt Carmel, Granville Circuit.

Our special meeting began last Sunday. The success is great thus far, having held the fourth service with three or four conversions. These were: one a young man, one a young lady, and one a father.

Of what good is a Sunday school? I can safely say had it not been for our successful S. S. these two young people would be worldly beings today. Now, isn't this worth all the effort that all have put forth during all the year? There are several more in our midst that are unsaved, some of whom are husbands and fathers. These we hope to get. This makes the fourth consecutive week that Bro. Bethea has been engaged in this work, but he is still "good."

Polk Garrett.

Friendship, Haw River Circuit.

We decided last Sunday to discontinue out Sunday school until the first Sunday in September. Most all of the special meetings will be over by then. We hope to start then with a large attendance.

We were glad to have Rev. Pritchard with us Sunday, although it was his vacation day, but he gave us a small talk, which was much enjoyed. Our special meeting begins the second Sunday in this month. We will meet at 10 o'clock and hold prayer service. We are hoping for a good revival during this meeting.

Blanche Weatherly, Rep.

Kistler's, Cleveland Circuit.

Our meeting at Kistler's closed last Thursday. We had a glorious meeting. Good results were visible in a revival of the church and eight conversions. One accession only. The thought occurs to us, what a meeting we could have had if we all had done our whole duty in work and prayer. Surely we would have had a more glorious revival. Bro. Loudermilk was our pulpit help, doing most of the preaching. It seemed that he was very sorry to leave any one unsaved at the close of the meeting.

Meeting commenced at Friendship yesterday, two services. Pray for us that the word of the Lord may have free course.

Lolan Ivester, Reporter.

Pine Grove, Oak Ridge Circuit.

Our pastor filled is appointment last third Sunday. His subject was Faith. It was one of his best sermons. It is only a little over a month until our special meeting, the first Sunday in Sept. Dear readers, remember us in prayer that we may have a good meeting, that the Lord will be with us. Our Sunday school is doing very well considering our small number.

On last Thursday Mr. I. W. Ingram departed this life. Just at the close of day his long life ended. He was 82 years old the twentieth of last April. He lived to a ripe old age. He leaves his second wife and one son, R. H. Ingram, and one daughter, and a large number of grandchildren and great grand children and friends to mourn his departure. His first wife preceded him some ten years. He has two children on the other shore. He was truly a good man, a member of the Friend's church a number of years. We shall miss him.

Farewell, grandpa, but not forever. May we meet on the other shore where there are no woes, no more wounded limbs, no more death on that bright and happy shore.

Bro. Lowdermilk preached his funeral in the Friend's church Friday at 3 o'clock. The body was laid to rest in the cemetery near Kernersville, in the presence of a large number of relatives and friends.

Quarterly Conference held here last Saturday, July 22nd. The churches were all represented. Our pastor preached for us at eleven o'clock A. M., and Quarterly Conference in the afternoon. Our special meeting began the following Sunday. Our pastor preached for us at eleven o'clock and Quarterly Conference in the afternoon. Our special meting began the following Sunday. Our pastor, Rev. J. W. Self, preached on Sunday and Monday, then Rev. Mr. Loy came and gave us good soul stirrings sermons. We had a great revival with fifty-seven conversions and ten joined our church and were baptized and received into full membership on Thursday night, when our meeting closed.

Congregations were always good and attentive, and the good sermons preached by both our pastor and Rev. Mr. Loy were much interesting and enjoyed by all present. We were glad to have Mr. Luther Hartis from Antioch with us during the meeting. There were several from the other churches with us Saturday and Sunday, whom we were glad to have visit us. We feel much blessed and thankful for the good that has been accomplished here, knowing that there was some great work needed. Pray that we may still continue to do better, and that we may hold out faithful, and that our Sunday school may be better than ever before, and that much interest may be shown by both old and younng.

Leila McKee, Rep.

Pinnacle.

Our special meeting began Sunday, July 23rd, and closed the following Friday evening.

Bro. Kennett, of Stokesdale, in assisting Bro. Hunter did excellent preaching which resulted in a very great revival. There were sixteen conversions and seventeen accessions to the church.

Our Sunday school is growing in both number and interest. We have new song books, "Hallowed Hymns."

Miss Maud Hunter, who has been right sick, we hope is improving. Reporter.

Lincolnton, N. C.

We wish to say our work here is getting along nicely. We have our new church so we can hold service in it. Rev. H. W. Braswell has had Rev. D. A. Braswell here for six days preaching in the new M. P. Church and he has been doing some fine work. Wonderful impressions have been made. Our new church has three coats of paint on the outside and by the time this is before the public two coats of paint will be on the inside. Many thanks to those who have contributed to this good work.

We organized a Sunday school with this poor unworthy writer as superintendent, W. H. Arthur assistant, J. A. Jenkins secretary and treasurer, Miss Lucy Gales over the advanced department, Mrs. W. H. Arthur over the junior and Miss Martha Gales over the primary department. Our school opened last Sunday at ten o'clock, with promising results.

The teachers are all high-toned Christians and I think this means much for the success of a Sabbath school. We also had our own Sabbath school supplies to commence with.

While we have had much opposition all through our past days here, we feel that the victory is ours and God shall have the glory.

We expect to start a prayer meeting soon as the painters are through painting the inside.

I wish some one would give us a prescription that will make a church (I mean an M. P. church) thrive and grow in its infancy. I am waiting. I would be so glad to hear Bro. J. H. Moton preach in our new church—not only him, but many others. Bro. H. W. Braswell has a prescription that never fails to keep order in and around church when given in time.

D. B. Johnson.

Shady Grove, Tabernacle Circuit.

The morning of July 9th dawned clear and beautiful, a day that seemed exactly befitting the life of the little ones that were going to entertain the large audience assembled. The program was carried out by the children in such a way as to impress every one that they deserve honor and praise. Everything came up to our expectation except the collection, which amounted to only $7.00, but when we remember how Christ blessed the widow's mite, we know that their offering, though small, will be helpful in furthering the blessed Gospel of Christ.

The special meeting began Sunday, the 24th, with a very helpful sermon at 11 o'clock by Rev. C. H. Whitaker, and in the afternoon by Rev. E. A. Plyler, who was Mr. Cecil's pulpit help during the following week, and who preached such good soul-stirring sermons that the church was greatly revived, and three precious souls were born into the kingdom of God.

The entire church join in thanking Mr. Odel Ingold for the nice book racks he made and presented to us. They are exceedingly nice, and we appreciate them, and appreciate the spirit in which they were given.

We ask the prayer of every one that we, though small in number, may do our work faithfully, and when our trials in this world are over, that this little band from Shady Grove may all stand, united, without the loss of one, around the great white throne, and hear our judgment, "well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joys of thy Lord."

Frances B. Lineberry.

Granville.

Closed our meeting at Union Chapel Thursday, July 27. Bro. Moton did faithful, effective work. A great interest in every service. Conversions every service. There were about seventy conversions and reclamations; twenty-nine joined the church, others to come. The greatest meeting in years, so some of the older ones say. Men as old as 70 years were converted, down to the Sunday school children from the primary class. It reached all classes. A former pastor said Union Chapel had been asleep for years. She seems to be awake now. We thank God for the victory. We are so glad Bro. Moton came. People did personal work that were never known to do such before.

Meeting commenced at Mt. Carmel yesterday with a good interst at each service. Quite a number of requests for prayer. People began to do personal work in first service. Have no pulpit help here, but some good workers. We are praying for and expecting a great revival. Pray for us. Mrs. Bethea and I leave Norfolk Friday for Boston on Merchant and Miners' S. S. "Juanita" en route to Northfield to attend General Conference of Christian Workers (Moody's School). A three weeks' vacation has been granted for this. Hope to give you some jottings of interest by the way. May the Lord continue to bless our beloved Zion.

Sincerely,

N. G. Bethea.

Bethesda Church.

Our revival meeting began Saturday, July 22, and closed Sunday, 30th, and was full of the spirit of God from start to finish. This was one of the noblest meetings we have ever had at Bethesda. Our pastor and Bro. E. H. Mullis conducted the services at 11 o'clock A. M. and 8 P. M. Those two men are wonderful workers in the vineyard of the Lord, and had the co-operation of the people. Large congregations at every service. There was a wonderful spiritual good accomplished at this meeting. We had about 42 conversions, 12 accessions to the church. Our people have many reasons to thank the Lord for his goodness and mercy to us. O Lord, may this revival continue in our hearts. God forbid we should depart from it. It is a blessing to have such ministers of the gospel with us as Bro. Mullis and our dear pastor W. P. Martin. Bro. Smith, with some of his choir from Rose Hill, came down Saturday, furnishing nice music till Monday. After Monday the music was furnished by Miss Thomas, of Columbia, S. C. Miss Thomas is a noble singer and fine organist, and we believe a Christian lady. We thank Bro. Smith and all the good for their help in our meeting. Revs. Martin and Mullis are conducting a meeting at Bear Creek this week. May the God of mercy be with them, and may the seed they sow produce abundant fruit.

Failed to tell you that we have a well at last through the faithful efforts of Messrs. M. J. Morris and A. E. Carter. Mrs. J. E. Glasgow and daughters gave us a pulpit stand, Miss Moss presented us with a suite of chairs for the pulpit. We highly appreciate all those things.

Bro. Taylor filled his appointment here first Sunday, and is now helping in a meeting near his father's home. Mrs. Taylor is visiting her mother, Mrs. Huffine, of Kernersville, who has been suffering much of late with asthma.

Mrs. Mabel Gordon, of Lawrenceville, Va., and two children, are visiting Mrs. J. E. Glasgow.

Mr. Lenoid Carter and wife, of Scotland Neck, are visiting Mr. A. E. Carter. Mrs. Isaac Robertson of Newport News, visited friends in this section last week.

Miss Julia Carter has returned home from a visit among friends of Enfield and Whitakers.

Mr. Ed. Carter lost that fine sorrel horse of his last Friday.

Rev. T. A. Williams filled his regular appointment here the 5th Sunday at 11. He preached an excellent sermon, his text, Luke 8:35.

A Sunday school convention was held at Stony Knoll the 4th Sunday. Had a good time and a large crowd present.

Miss Rosa Douglas, who has typhoid fever, is improving, we are glad to learn. Rev. T. A. Williams will preach for us again first Sunday in September.

Hester Baker.

Graham and Haw River Tidings.

Last Sunday was President's day with us. In the morning at Haw River, Dr. Swain preached a most excellent sermon to a large and very attentive congregation. After the sermon the church was dedicated with the usual impressive service. The Haw River people are looking upward and forward.

In the afternoon at Graham the congregation was not so large as at Haw River, but very attentively heard the good sermon Dr. Swain preached. Again at night there was a good number in the Graham church who came to hear the gospel preached. Sunday school attendance last Sunday was 84 at Graham and 83 at Haw River.

On last Saturday the third quarterly conference convened in Graham church. The attendance was the best of any conference this year. Both churches were well represented, besides a number of visitors were present. The usual business was conducted in a very harmonious and satisfactory way. Bro. J. C. Morris was declared the delegate elect to our next annual conference. Dr. W. R. Goley was chosen alternate.

Geo. L. Curry.

Forsyth Circuit.

Our third quarterly conference was held at Pleasant Hill church Saturday before the third Sunday with very small attendance. Business transacted as usual in the spirit of love. S. M. Speas was elected delegate to Annual Conference, R. M. Cox alternate.

TO DO WELL.

God has provided well for the human family on his part, and thus the way is open for all to do well. "Cease to do evil; learn to do well," means the whole thing. If we would look well in the direction of heaven, we must look well to all the interests of earth. Our private affairs, and the commonwealth are essentially belonging together.

Well-doing means that there is no merit by poverty—and that aristocracy deserves no favors. Innocence deserves favors—and our labors should be directed so as to be well able to look after the comforts of innocence.

We do not all know how it was that Israel was left to suffer four hundred years in Egypt under the iron hand of tyranny—but we do read that "where the spirit of the Lord is there is liberty." However, do we live too well? No, we North Carolinians do not live too well.

If we are voluptuous, or successful in any bad way, that is not living well.

We have promise "of the life that now is," provided we do well. It is providential to have a rich commonwealth, so that every individual may be safe and able to do well.

There is no vanity at all about well doing, in any direction—but vanity comes by the reverse of well-doing. All this is evident, and as plain as the bright light. This article means no reflection to the one that started the thought for these lines,, but it does mean to say that it takes an industrious people to keep up a common wealth; and that they, the people, are the "set" who are able and well able to look after their own interests. It means to say that "commonwealth," and "mutual rights" are belonging together, and that we must understand these things in order to be well able 'to do well."

The above, in order to be remembered, was noted Sunday morning, after reading article on page three in late M. P. Herald. The expression "Easily" started up these thoughts. Also, after the first of this writing I heard of several cases who were greatly in need of help. They are very sick, but the need of food and clothing, and the need of medical help, is not the trouble, but lack of being waited on. Those who reported made the full expression by saying "there are not enough trained nurses," and this is a fact, there are more of the trained needed in order to take good care of the sick—and more of the training is needed throughout all the branches of life.

The standing idle is one of the great troubles. On account of the standing idle many, who ought to do better, fail to take the M. P. Herald; and on account of the same trouble many fail to read while the literature is in reach. Many well-able families who take no religious paper at all could do better, and live better, and even "make more" by taking two or three religious papers.

One of the above class that read no religious paper was so glad when she got happy at the "big meting" that she said "I don't want no riches, I don't want no riches." I'm glad of that late article as above referred to, and I write this in order to say that the riches that the pious well-meaning woman thought she did not need are all needed. The idea of a class is that good houses and rich lands and good clothing and an all around good living belong to "uncertain riches," but if these things are belonging to vanity, where must we get our living so as to claim the promises that God has made in relation to these things—to have "all those things added."

Those who make all they can, and save all they can, (if so), and then keep all they can, (if so), and squander all they can, may be living too easily,(as Arabs) but there is a lack of ease, and a great lack with all such classes. Bear in mind the fact that there is a great lack somewhere (and even all around) that comes from the want of mutual rights. The thing that would first respect the just and help the needy, and sympathize with the innocent, is belonging to the things for us to think on. Good society, safe and well-founded, is, or would be, a great thing in this land of (boasted) liberty. But where church members wink at whiskey, shipped in, and such like wickedness, there is a lack of liberty, and the majority of the people have no thought about mutual rights. I expect to weave mutual rights right often in with my lines, so as to have something of the best of seasoning—the best of woven work in connection with the material.

The right of a class, perhaps, was the main thing in view when I started to write this article last Sunday morning; however, the Sabbath is the day to read; to read the Bible, and to pray, to worship, to attend especially on the duties at the church—and inside of the week days we are sure that we have a right to do our writing. Please excuse these last casual lines. The way some of us are able to take a hand in writing, and meddling with the editors, is to note what we think of—and to think about how not to say some things, while we see that there are many things worthy of being said.

That certain class is the class to look after—however the interests of other classes. Whether your ability is much or little, do what you can to keep the common people up and going. You think that you can't live without the life of the people called common people. One way to do all this is to keep mutual rights all alive, and to make much of it. The wise leader is not afraid of mutual rights—surely he is not. If you are you have not got confidence in the very people with and by whom you must live. Bear in mind that this mutual life is not to be by the blood and flesh and bones of those by whom we must live, but by their intelligence. I've seen intelligent people treated as though they were worse than brutes. They that thrive by the gains of strong drink are treating intelligence worse than a quiet boy would treat a dog. The beast that feeds on flesh knows no better than to devour the whole prey, bones and all for a living. The mission of mutual rights is to lift suffering humanity up on an equal, as well as possible, while the beast-like must stay down under the rule of the united intelligences. Influences, however lawful, that come in the way of intelligence and the uplift of suffering humanity are beast-like, more or less—and rather more.

Intelligence is the life of liberty, and is just grand to think about, and reads like poetry. Intelligence is great for the family, for the church, and for the nation. One little innocent intelligence is as a world to itself, but needs care and tutoring, and all the privileges of the mutual helps possible, so as to be enabled to grow up and become one of us in this wide social world of mutual rights. However, all are notup, but are creatures "groaning and travailing in pain." The higher order, liberality, is lacking.

The liberal and the mutual is the great lack, even in the church, that it be better able to lift up those who are not on the level.

The common people must be treated as the best of intelligences. We have the acts and the authority of the Son of God to urge for this—and it must be so.

The common people, because of darkened counsel, are failing to move well on in the way of life and light and liberty. One of our oldest teachers on farming asserted the fact that the farmers knew more about their work than they could do. The expression holds good in any direction. However, there are men in all the branches of life who are so well to do as not to stand back behind their knowledge, but are able to go forward. The great trouble about this well-able class is that they belong to the characters, mainly, who make all they can and save all they can and then keep all they can and all just for themselves. Selfish things, they are the most cumbersome and the deadest weights in the world. The great and costly institutions are needed, but all these things should be so shaped and built up that the lowest class in society will reap the first benefits of the lifting up.

God makes himself first, and then the human comes next in his sight—and the infant and the feeble at any age have just about the first claims to be looked after. When we pay our taxes the debt is first due the pauper—and such dues should be in the consideration, but this is not now quite the case, and will not be(at the late rate)unless those who are well "able to do as well as they know" will, by the grace of God, come out from under the bonds of mammon and act out the law of self-denial. There is wonderful liberty in sight, and even near, and life and light and hope and prosperity, but who is liberal enough to advance with his sufficiency for these things? The individual is the man, and let everyone go forward. W. F. Grabs.

days so successfully as in some former days. We need more than we have of the ceaseless evangelism of the shining life out of meeting. And in this blessed ministry every Christian not only may be, but must be, his own evangelist.

Now, lest we be discouraged by reason of the dimness of our light, let us remember that not every Christian is born of God to sudden and overpowering luminosity. There can be no question of the power and desirability of the mighty passion of a burning heart. Those who have it are among the sons of the mighty. But, after all, it is, in considerable degree, a matter of temperament. To some of us the fervor of an Isaiah or a Paul is unattainable. Were it desirable, it would be impossible for the point. But the steady glow of honesty, kindness, generosity, and obedience to the heart always to be heated to the melting-will of God—that the world may see in every Christian. If one cannot be a volcano, one may be a glow-worm.

Moreover, though feeble at the beginning, this may be an increasing glow. It may begin as the dawn begins. As you watched for the morning there was a time when you knew that it had not come. Night was yet in full possession of the world. Then, for a little while you were not quite certain whether the morning had begun or not. After that you knew that there was a light in the east streaming up from the sun far below the horizon. From that time the morning brightened into day. So the Christian life may begin and progress. At first people may not feel sure that they see in it anything divine. But after a little while, in the midst of much that is imperfect and far short of the moral and spiritual splendor of the full-orbed Christ, they behold a quality which can be accounted for only as coming in some way from the unseen Lord. Then, ever after that new creation begins to appear, the world should see, and by the grace of God may see, an increasing glow in that life. "The path of the righteous is as the dawning light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." Immediate perfection is not essential to spiritual power. People who are acquainted with God's ways in nature and in grace, will expect to wait many days for that which is in part to be done away and that which is perfect to come. But, as I have been reiterating at considerable length, the world does expect to see, and has a right to expect to see, something in the life given up to Christ not to be seen in the life not given up to Him. And if the feeble glow is continually growing brighter, and the life is constantly taking on the beauty of the Lord as the years go by, that increasing glow will be divinely winsome. Through that life the Christ will continue to draw some part of the human world to Himself.—Zion's Herald.

Lesson for Next Week.

2 Samuel, chapters 19, 20, 21, 22.

Question 75 (in last week's paper) is assigned to Mrs. W. E. Swain, 76 to Clyde Auman, 77 to Mrs. B. F. Norman.

Answers to Assigned Questions.

72. By 2 Sam. 12:31, I understand that David tortured the people of Rabbah by cutting them with saws and other sharp instruments, and by making them pass through the fire, the last named being perhaps similar to the practice of making children pass through the fire to Moloch. "The cruelty of these executions belongs to the barbarous manners of the age, and was provoked by the conduct of the Ammonites, but it is of course utterly indefensible under the light of the Gospel. If Rabbah was taken before David's penitence, he may have been in an unusually harsh and severe frame of mind. The unpleasant recollection of Uriah's death would be likely to sour and irritate him to the utmost." (The Bible Commentary.) Mrs. Geo. L. Curry.

DIED.

A Good Young Man Gone.

Moody O. Wall, son of W. F. and S. E. Wall, was born Oct. 8, 1892, and died July 28, 1911. He professed religion and joined the M. P. Church at about 12 years of age, and lived a consistent Christian life to the time of his death. He leaves a father, mother, two brothers, two sisters, and a host of friends who mourn because of his departure.

Moody was an affectionate son, smart and industrious. He was attentive to his church and Sunday school. The Baraca Class of our S. S. has lost one of its best members, and the entire class joins the family in mourning his departure. A pall of sadness now hangs over one of the best and most loyal homes of our church in Denton. There is a void in the hearts of these good people that the world can never fill. How sad the parting! But by an eye of faith we look beyond. We see them getting up at the last and final day of judgment, and as they clasp each other's hands to part no more, the sadness of the earthly parting will be forgotten in the joy of having met again. If faithful, you will meet Moody again.

The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. W. Hulin and the writer, and his body was laid away in the cemetery in Denton. Geo. L. Reynolds.

Naomi Swarford.

Naomi Swarford was born Sept. 17, 1823, and died July 27, 1911. She was therefore 88 years, 10 months and 9 days old. She married at the age of 18 to Willie Swarford. To this union were born 13 children, 6 sons and 7 daughters. All of these have crossed over but one son and three daughters.

She was converted at the age of 24 at Clovers' Hill M. E. Church, where she joined with her husband, remaining in this church till they moved out of reach. Then they joined the Big Hill church of same denomination. She moved her membership to the M. P. Church with her husband 27 years before her death.

Her husband died 26 years ago. He was a church member thirty years.

Her life was an open book. No one that knew her ever questioned her religion.

In her last days she was dependent on others to help her get around. But she never complained. She was ready when the end came. H. W. Braswell.

Smith.

Edward Smith was born July 11, 1890, departed this life July 18, 1911, aged 21 years, 7 days. He was not a member of any church, but made a bright profession before he died. Asked his people to meet him in Heaven. His body was laid to rest in Oak Grove cemetery to await the resurrection morn. Young men, give your hearts to God while young and in health. T. A. Williams.

Causey.

The subject of this sketch, R. L. Causey, on last Friday, July 28, at 5:45 A. M., in Clay Township, near Tabernacle Church, departed this life at the age of 44 years, 7 months and 4 days. For the last two years the deceased had been in failing health, and about ten days before his death he was taken fearfully ill, and intense suffering was his until death took him. He was not married, but leaves a bereaved father and mother, brothers and sisters, and a large number of friends to mourn his departure. He has been engaged the better part of life farming, and was active and industrious, endeavoring to make honesty the guiding star in every transaction of business. The writer was present the last five days of his life on earth, and he seemed to entertain a sure, strong hope of immortality beyond this vale of tears. In a very conscious hour with him, I asked him if all was well with his soul, and he replied in a clear, positive way:

"It is well," and continued by utterances like these: "I love God because he first loved me." "My faith is in my blessed Redeemer." "I am trusting my Savior who died for me," and at another time he called his sorrowing mother and other members of the family to his bedside and said: "My suffering will soon be over. I am going to die, and oh, how blessed it is. Meet me in heaven."

To the bereaved, sorrowing family and friends I would say, Let us forget the faults and mistakes and short comings that belong to the natural man, the flesh, and see our departed brother faultless before God's eternal throne. When an army is to be made up, the recruiting officer examines the volunteers. He tests their eye-sight, he examines their lungs, he measures their stature. They must be just right or they are rejected. I have a commission from the Lord himself, whose infinite, scrutinizing eye is upon the living, and when we meet the conditions (repentance and faith) we will be added to the great regiment of redeemed souls that have gone on before, and taken their places amid that great cloud of witnesses that hover about the throne of our blessed Redeemer and Savior. Glorious consolation! These are not dead, they have only moved on, and with more love than that with which they greet us on earth, they watch us from their high place, and their voices cheer us in our struggle for the sky. Hail, blessed spirits, you have passed the flood and won the crown! With weary feet we press up the shining way, until in everlasting reunion we shall meet again.
